The cautioners in cash accounts may put an end to their responsibility when they please, by giving notice to the bank, and to the person in whose name the account is kept. The former is the essential notice. But the death of the cautioner does not discharge his bond: the bond binds the parties, their heirs and successors; and it still subsists against representatives, not merely for the debt as it stood at the cautioner's death, but prospectively, as if they were the original obligants for what may become due under the credit till the recall of the responsibility.³ Notice ought to be given to the representative of the [370] obligation: for as it happens in most cases that the heir has no means of knowing that such engagements have been undertaken by his predecessor, the hardship may be very great of a sudden and unforeseen demand in consequence of such an undertaking; and although it cannot be said that such notice is necessary to continue the responsibility,⁴ a court will examine very strictly into the equities of a claim in which this has been neglected.

Although the stipulation in the bond will entitle the bank to summary diligence on the certified account showing a balance (p. 382), a claim in bankruptcy must be made in the ordinary way, by producing the bond, with a certified copy of the account, and the vouchers of that account. The claim, of course, may be made against each obligant to the full amount, so as to draw, on the whole, the full sum of the debt and nothing more.

In suretyships having a prospective operation, as in cash-credits, standing guarantees, etc., it is important to mark the effect of a change of the persons concerned in the transactions.

1. Where there is a change on the part of the creditor; where a cash-credit bond, for example, is granted to a banking-house, the partners of which happen to be materially altered during the currency of the credit, do the cautioners continue responsible, notwithstanding such change, and without any notice or any renewal of their engagement? It would be a great hardship even on the customers, if on every change all the bonds of credit of a banking-house were to be renewed; but there does not seem in law to be any necessity for this, and generally there is a stipulation against it in the bond. See below, Partnership.

² [The amount of the obligation in a cash-credit bond is sometimes extended by a letter guaranteeing an overdraft to a certain amount. Such a letter is held to have the same character as to continuity as the original obligation. Sir W. Forbes & Co. v Dundas, 1830, 8 S. 865; Houston v Speirs, 1834, 12 S. 879.]

³ Commercial Bank of Aberdeen v Callender, 1801, Hume 88. There John Durno had a cash-credit, with Barclay and Callender as co-obligants. Callender died; and the bank having, as usual, required a new cautioner, Leslie of Summerhill signed a bond of corroboration. Durno exhausted the credit, and failed; Leslie also failed, and Callender's executors were called on by the bank. They pleaded: 1. That the bank had kept the obligation latent from them till after Durno's failure; 2. That Leslie came in Durno's place. But the Court repelled the defences.

Paterson v Calder, 5 July 1808, 14 Fac. Coll. 235. The principle of the determination was, that the representatives were, 'as principals, indisputably liable; and as cautioners, they were liable on the precedent of Sir W. Miller's case.'

⁴ [British Linen Co. v Monteith, 1858, 20 D. 557.]

2. Where there is a change on the part of a company, for whose use and in whose name the credit is to be operated on, the responsibility will be more easily discharged. The same inconvenience cannot here be stated as in the renewal of all the cash-credit bonds of a banking-house; while the confidence reposed, the very occasions of cash operations, the whole character of the debtor whose dealings are guaranteed, undergo a radical change.¹ The death or retiring of an old partner, or the adoption of a new one, if known to the bank, will discharge the cautioner; unless there is either a renewal expressly of the cash-bond, or at least an implied assent to the change, in consequence of distinct notice given to the cautioners.²

SUBSECTION IV.—OF LETTERS OF CREDIT OR GUARANTEE.

Guarantee may be taken as the generic term, comprehending both letters of credit and engagements to be answerable for debt. The nature of the engagement is an undertaking to be answerable for the payment of a debt, or for the price of goods, or for the balance arising in a course of dealings, or for the performance of an undertaking, by another person, liable in the first instance. It has commonly in contemplation future rather than past transactions, but not unfrequently is applied to a series of dealings of which some have already taken place. It is distinguished from a formal cautionary obligation chiefly by the looser epistolary form of the writing.³

[371] The doctrine of the nature and construction of contracts and obligations, already laid down, is applicable to this engagement. In England, the statute of frauds (29 Car. II. c. 3, sec. 4) denies action on any collateral obligation for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another, unless upon a note or memorandum thereof in writing signed by the party;⁴ while it is held not to apply if the promise be not collateral, but an original and absolute undertaking to pay the debt.⁵ In Scotland the rule is, that no cautionary obligation or guarantee can be constituted by parole agreement; so that an acknowledgment or a reference to oath will not constitute an effectual guarantee. But this is not carried so far as in England the words of the statute have compelled the Courts to go. If goods be furnished, or money paid, or indulgence given from the immediate execution of diligence, on the faith

² Spiers v Royal Bank, 1822, 1 S. 554. The account here was to be kept in the name of Archibald Macnab & Co., which then consisted of two partners. One of them retired, and announced this in a newspaper; others were assumed; but the firm remained unchanged, and no notice was sent to the bank of the shifting of partners. The cautioner was held liable; for although it was said the bank took in the newspaper in which the change of partners was announced, no notice was proved. [Morrice v Scott, 1831, 9 S. 480; Bowie v Watson, Macknight, & Co., 1840, 2 D. 1061.]

³ [By 19 and 20 Vict. c. 60, sec. 6, 'all guarantees, securities, or cautionary obligations made or granted by any person for any other person, and all representations and assurances as to the character, conduct, credit, ability, trade, or dealings of any person, made or granted to the effect or for the purpose of enabling such person to obtain credit, money, goods, or postponement of payment of debt, or of any other obligation demandable from him, shall be in writing, and shall be subscribed by the person undertaking such guarantee, security, or cautionary obligation, or making such representations and assurances, or by some person duly authorized by him or them, otherwise the same shall have no effect.' This provision, and the law relating to it, are treated in detail in a note appended to this section. See 9 Geo. IV. c. 14, sec. 6.]

of the engagement, though verbal, and with the knowledge of the person so engaging, the obligation will be effectual by the law of Scotland.¹

1. LETTERS OF CREDIT, strictly speaking, are mandates, giving authority to the person addressed to pay money or furnish goods on the credit of the writer. They are generally made use of for facilitating the supply of money or goods required by one going to a distance or abroad, and avoiding the risk and trouble of carrying specie, or buying bills to a greater amount than may be required. The debt which arises on such a letter in its simplest form, when complied with, is between the mandatory and mandant; though it may be so conceived as to raise a debt also against the person who is supplied by the mandatory. 1. Where the letter is purchased with money by the person wishing for the foreign credit, or is granted in consequence of a check on his cash account, or procured on the credit of securities lodged with the person who grants it, or in payment of money due by him to the payee, the letter is in its effects similar to a bill of exchange drawn on the foreign merchant. The payment of the money by the person on whom the letter is granted raises a debt, or goes into account between him and the writer of the letter; but raises no debt to the person who pays on the letter, against him to whom the money is paid. 2. Where not so purchased, but truly an accommodation, and meant to raise a debt against the person accommodated, the engagement generally is, to see paid any advances made to him, or to guarantee any draft accepted or bill discounted; and the compliance with the mandate in such case raises a debt both against the writer of the letter, and against the person accredited.

2. LETTERS OF RECOMMENDATION AND GUARANTEE.—There is a species of letter of credit, used both in foreign and in domestic transactions, which is of the nature of a proper guarantee, or cautionary obligation, where the writer of the letter gives assurance of the responsibility of a third person.

The chief difficulty is to distinguish these from mere letters of recommendation. A guarantee raises a credit on the pecuniary responsibility of the writer of the letter; a simple recommendation infers no responsibility on him whatever, unless the representation shall turn out to be fraudulent and false. It would appear, 1. That when the person who writes in commendation of the character and credit of another, does so in consequence of an application on the part of him who is about to engage with that other in transactions, his expressions are to be interpreted largely in his own favour, and so that the [372] friendly information thus drawn from him may not entrap him into a guarantee.² 2. That he will be liable for the consequence of wittingly deceiving another into a transaction with one unworthy of credit. This, however, is a case difficult to be made out. The examples of it which are to be found in the books, are in cases where the recommendation was spontaneous.³ 3. That a recommendation spontaneously given, if expressed in general terms, speaking merely of the respectability, regular conduct, and good credit of the person introduced, is an introduction only, not a letter of credit.⁴ But where there is a distinct ² See much discussion on these points in Haycoft v Creasy, 2 East Rep. 92 et seq. See also M'Iver v Richardson, 1 Maule and Selw. 557, where the Court construed the letter to be an answer to inquiries made, but to import only an offer to guarantee, which required acceptance. See also Symmons v Want, 2 Starkie 371.

³ Balfour, Junor, & Co. v Russell, 8 March 1815, 18 Fac. Coll. 335. This was a case of misrepresentation of a trader's circumstances, the writer being quite aware that he was in a state of great embarrassment. He was held responsible for the debt.

Corbet v Gray, 1794, 1 Ill. 207. This was a similar case decided in the same way. Farquhar Gray wrote to Corbet of a man whom he knew to be in labouring circumstances, that 'he had requested my line of introduction to somebody in the trade in Glasgow; and if you and he can agree as to the price, I have no doubt of your dealing to a considerable extent.' [Ross v Lindsay, 1820, Hume 116; Wilson & Corse v Wood, 1797, Hume 85.]

allusion to a particular transaction, and an assurance of safety in entering into it, this, where spontaneous, is held to amount to a guarantee,¹ even where it is only a colloquial or verbal expression of assurance.²

3. GUARANTEES are often granted of single bargains or transactions relating to cash or bills; and there is no set phraseology in which they must be expressed. The chief point is, that the particular transaction shall be so described as to comprehend distinctly the claim of indemnity that is grounded on it, and that the condition of acceptance or otherwise shall have been complied with.³

In the stamp laws there is an exception from the duties for agreements, or minutes, or memorandums of agreements, of 'memorandums, letters, or agreements made for or relating to the sale of any goods, wares, or merchandise.'⁴ And under one of the earlier Acts, having the same exception, it was held that a guarantee of a purchase of goods did not require a stamp.⁵ But letters of guarantee for intromissions, and other similar engagements, require a stamp.

[373] It is a rule, that one who takes a guarantee is bound to inform the surety fairly of the nature of the contract to which his credit is to be interposed, and not to avail himself of a private compact which does not appear on the face of the guarantee to be known to the surety.⁶

LIMITATION OF GUARANTEES AND LETTERS OF CREDIT.—It is important to observe any limitation in respect of the transaction, the person or the time to which a guarantee may be meant to extend. The language used, the nature of the transaction, and the plain understanding between the parties, must all be taken into consideration. But the general rule is, that the strict words of the agreement, where intelligible, must be adhered to, and at all events never carried beyond the plain and manifest intent of the party.

I. LIMITATION IN RESPECT OF THE TRANSACTION.—It seems to be settled by decided cases,—

1. That where any particular transaction is specified, or distinctly pointed at, the guarantee can be held to extend only to that transaction: as, where a letter of credit is subjoined to an order for goods, the guarantee is confined to that order.⁷

Observe, however, the distinction taken in the case of M'Iver v Richardson (see above, p. 389, note 2), where the assurance is to be construed merely as an offer to guarantee, and where acceptance is necessary.

⁵ Warrington v Furber. In this case Furber proposed to purchase Manchester goods to the value of £1070 from Martin, and offered the guarantee of Warrington, who gave an unstamped letter of guarantee for the price at a credit of six months. The goods were furnished on this credit, and a bill drawn at six months. The buyer failed, and Warrington paid £1000 under the guarantee, and brought his action for indem-nification. One defence was the want of a stamp, and the question whether it did not fall under the exception of the 23 Geo. III. c. 58, sec. 4, as a contract relating to the sale of goods? The Court held that the law did not limit the exception to the case of an immediate sale of goods between buyer and seller, but by the very words extended to agreements relating to the sale of goods. 8 East 242.

Pidcock v Bishop, 3 Barn. and Cress. 605. Here Bishop guaranteed the payment of £200, value to be delivered to Tickel in pig-iron. There was a private agreement that, besides the market price of the iron, Tickel should pay 10s. on every ton toward extinction of an old debt. This was held a fraud on Bishop, varying the degree of his responsibility.

In Ranken v Murray, 15 May 1812, F. C., one difficulty with the Court was, what should be the extent of such an engagement? Lord President Blair said, and the Court concurred with him, though the point was not necessary in the judgment: 'One difficulty is, Where is this to stop? But it

2. That where the expression is general, for goods to be furnished from time to time, or for any dealings, to a limited extent, the guarantee will be limited in respect of the sum, but extended to successive transactions, and held in mercantile phrase to be a STANDING or CONTINUING GUARANTEE.¹ But care must be taken that the expressions indicate an engagement for goods to be furnished successively, or from time to time.²

3. That where the guarantee is unlimited in extent, the discretion of those to [374] whom it is addressed is strictly referred to.³

4. That a guarantee for the payment of goods to be supplied, will apply to goods agreed to be sold the day before, but not delivered till after.⁴ But where the words plainly point to subsequent transactions, or rather where they do not plainly comprehend past transactions, the guarantee will not cover dealings prior to its date.⁵

5. It is sometimes difficult to distinguish whether a transaction be fairly comprehended within a guarantee which describes in general terms what is intended to be done; as where one agrees to guarantee a loan or accommodation to be granted to another, supposing it to relate to some future accommodation, but where truly it is intended only to settle past accounts. If the words be clear, they must guide the determination; if not, the obvious meaning and understanding of the parties must be taken, not carrying the engagement beyond the strict words.⁶

appears to me that this guarantee only applies to the first transaction under the letter, the object of which transaction was to enable Shannon to open his shop for business.' [See Grant v Campbell, 1 May 1818, 6 Dow 239; Scott v Mitchell, 1866, 4 Macph. 551.]

Mason v Pritchard, 1820, 2 Camp. 436. A guarantee, 'for any goods he hath, or may supply my brother with, to the amount of £100.' Baron Wood held it necessary to give notice to stop the guarantee after any furnishings, if there was a design to limit it further than to the £100. And the Court of King's Bench refused a rule holding it a cautionary guarantee.

Bastow v Bennet, 3 Camp. 220. A guarantee 'to the extent of £300 for any tallow or soap to be supplied.' Lord Ellenborough said: 'Without the word any, it might perhaps have been confined to one dealing to the amount of £300; but as it is actually worded, I am of opinion it remained in force while the parties continued to deal on the footing established when it was given.' [See Kemble v Mitchell, 1831, 9 S. 648; Veitch v Murray, 1864, 2 Macph. 1098; Caledonian Bank v Kennedy's Trs., June 1870; Sm. Merc. L. 7th ed. 470.]

² Melville v Hayden, 1820, 3 Barn. and Ald. 593. The guarantee here was 'the payment to A. M. to the extent of £60, at quarterly account, bill two months, for goods to be purchased by him of D. M. There had been goods delivered for three quarterly accounts, and paid. The default was in the fourth, and for that the action was brought. Abbot, Ch. J., held at the trial that the guarantee was at an end before the goods of the fourth quarter were furnished. The Court of King's Bench held this to be law, there being here no provision for guaranteeing goods to be delivered from time to time.

[Tennant & Co. v Bunten, 1859, 21 D. 631. The guarantee was for payment of any purchases not exceeding £200 sterling in all within four months. Held that it covered a balance due on successive purchases made within that period.]

⁶ Glyn v Hertel, 1818, 8 Taunt. 208. Here a mercantile house was largely indebted to its banker, for which the banker held the Company's note with security bills. The account being in a very unsatisfactory state, the banker insisted for payment or further security, and made application to the aunt of one of the partners to become security. The letter to her led to the conception that ready money was to be advanced to the house. The guarantee desired to be sent was, 'to guarantee the transactions in the account of S. M. & Co. with your house, to the extent of £5000.' The letter actually written was, 'I will be answerable to the extent of £5000 for the use of the House of S. M. & Co.' On receiving this, the note was cancelled, and the security bills delivered up. The bills were then redelivered with a new note, but no money passed. The Court held the guarantee to contemplate only a future loan, and that the transaction did not amount to a loan of money, so as to charge the defendant.

6. That which is a necessary part of the transaction guaranteed, comes under the guarantee.¹

II. LIMITATION IN RESPECT OF THE PERSON.—Guarantees and letters of credit are limited to the persons to whom they are addressed, in whose discretion the writer is presumed to have peculiar confidence. So, 1. A letter addressed to one person, authorizing him to introduce the bearer to dealers, will not authorize another to introduce him, to the effect of making a guarantee by the writer.² 2. A letter of credit addressed to a dealer will not [375] authorize him to send the bearer of it to another dealer.³ 3. A letter of credit to A will not authorize B to furnish the goods.⁴ 4. A letter of credit addressed to a company will not authorize dealings with that company after a radical change in it.⁵ But probably the doctrine already stated, relative to credit bonds with companies,⁶ would be held to apply even to guarantees. 5. A guarantee of furnishings to be made to a company will not authorize furnishings after a radical change in the partnership; though, if such furnishings are made bona fide, and in ignorance of any change, the guarantee will be effectual.⁷

an obligation from his employer to pay six instalments of £100 each at certain times, 'and the balance when the work is completed.' Memorandum added by the architect in these terms, 'I hereby agree to see you paid the above instalments,' held not to import an obligation to pay the balance.]

¹ Sime v Duncan & Co., 1824, 2 S. 604, N. E. 516. Duncan endorsed Leach's bill; Leach failed to pay it; and the holder agreed, on a guarantee by Duncan & Co., to give indulgence to Duncan, by raising money on bills in the meanwhile, and pushing Leach. The guarantee was in these terms: 'As you seem to apprehend loss from your friendly interposition in the business with Leach, we therefore guarantee you against this.' The original bill was not paid, and more debt was accumulated on the bill transactions for intermediate accommodation. Duncan & Co. acknowledged their liability for the original bill, but refused to pay the balance. The Court held them liable for the loss attending the drawing of bills, originating from Leach's bill remaining unpaid.

² Stewart v Scott, 1803, Hume 91. Three persons applied to Scott for a letter of recommendation to corn-dealers in Leith. He gave them a letter to Mr. Sandeman, begging him 'to introduce the three gentlemen, who will deliver you this, to any of your corn or grain merchants, assuring them of their safety in what bargains they make with them.' And the three names were subjoined. Two only of those persons went to Leith; and not finding Sandeman, they went direct to a corn merchant, Stewart, and opened the letter to him, allowing him to take it as their recommendation. He sold them a whole cargo of oats, price £1849. It was an imprudent bargain; and Stewart brought his action against Scott on the above letter as a guarantee. The Court was very doubtful whether it was a guarantee, or anything else than a mere letter of introduction. But assuming it to be a guarantee, they held, 1. That Scott had relied on all the three persons, and on their mutual discretion in the proceedings to be taken under his letter. 2. That he had mainly relied on Sandeman's discretion to introduce his friends to proper dealers. 3. That it was (if a letter of credit at all) limited only by the discretion of the persons directly referred to acting in conjunction. Accordingly Scott's defences were sustained.

³ Philip v Melville, 21 Feb. 1809, 15 Fac. Coll. 204. Melville recommended Yetts to Durie for a supply of spirits, adding: 'I am sure she will pay you at the time she may fix with you; so you are quite sure with her, as Mr. Gordon can also inform you.' Durie wrote on the back of the letter of credit an assurance to C. & J. Philip, that, not having the article himself, he had sent Yetts with this letter of credit, on which they might rely. C. & J. Philip furnished the spirits, and Yetts failed. They brought their action against Melville. The Court held: 1. That Melville's was an effectual guarantee of the transaction if made with Durie. But, 2. They held unanimously, that a letter of credit addressed to a particular person is limited to him, and that the writer must be held to have granted it in reliance on his prudence and discretion in acting upon it; that such a letter contains no general power to interpose the writer's credit or transmit his guarantee; and that this is specially to be observed, where the general terms of the letter make the personal limitation the only restraint on the responsibility of the writer.

⁴ See preceding note.

See the same doctrine strongly stated by Lord Ellenborough in Strange v Lee, 3 East 484. [Elton, Hammond & Co. v Nelson, 24 June 1812, F. C.; Bowie v Watson & Co., 1840, 2 D. 1061.]

⁶ [See 19 and 20 Vict. c. 60, sec. 7, supra, p. 388.]

III. LIMITATION IN RESPECT OF TIME.—Although guarantees do not fall under the limiting statute of 1695, c. 5,¹ they are strictly limited in respect of time by the words made use of. 1. In a single transaction, if the surety has engaged on the footing of a credit of a certain extent in point of time, the creditor can in no sense extend the time without the surety's consent; and, on the other hand, the time cannot be abridged.² But often the time is specified, without the terminus a quo being distinctly set down; as, for example, a person binds himself to guarantee 'the due payment of a bill of A B for six puncheons [376] of spirits at three months.' It seems, in such a case, that the custom of trade will regulate the date of the bills, or terminus a quo; that in an inquiry into the custom, it is either the universal custom or the local usage which is to be followed; and that the surety will not be held to authorize such an extension of credit in point of time, as, though frequent, is only given as an indulgence,—this being too arbitrary to be adopted in a court of law.³ 2. Where it is of the nature of a standing guarantee, it will subsist till recalled, or till circumstances alter, unless there be some limitation of time expressed.

It has been questioned, Whether the endorsation of a bill which has been guaranteed by a separate letter, accompanied by delivery of the letter of guarantee, will give to the endorsee the same right as if the letter itself were a negotiable instrument, passing without any latent qualification? It is generally held by bankers, that when they thus acquire right to the guarantee, they are entitled to demand payment from the surety, as if the letter had originally been addressed to themselves; and this has been adjudged by the Court of Session, in reliance on such understanding.⁴ Before the point can be held established, a much more deliberate inquiry must be made into the usage; if, indeed, any usage can establish a point against the principles of law, which this seems to be. It may be, that the very design of expressing the guarantee by letter, instead of endorsing the bill, is to preserve to the writer the full benefit of his remedy against the person to whom the letter is addressed; and it is anomalous at once to confer on such an engagement the privileges of an endorsible and negotiable instrument, and yet not to give to the granter of it the benefit of that strict negotiation which is the counterpart of the privileges of bills.

Guarantees are frequently undertaken in consideration of a premium paid. This is of the nature of an insurance of solvency; the price of the risk of which, though it may be difficult to ascertain it on any settled principle, the parties themselves may be permitted to

⁴ Sir W. Forbes & Co. v M'Nab, 29 May 1816, 19 Fac. Coll. 137. In this case Cubie had bought from Wilson a quantity of salt, for the price of which he accepted a bill; and M'Nab gave to Wilson a letter of guarantee, in which, after describing the bill, he used these words: 'Which I hereby guarantee to see regularly retired when due.' Sir W. Forbes & Co. discounted the bill on seeing the guarantee, and the letter was delivered up along with the bill. In the meanwhile, M'Nab, the surety, had a letter from the bill-holder acknowledging that the letter of guarantee had been granted, and adding: 'The goods for the bill not having been delivered, I hereby free and relieve you from all the consequences attending the said bill.' The action was by Sir W. Forbes & Co. against M'Nab upon the letter; and the Court held the letter to be effectual to Sir W. Forbes & Co. Lord Meadowbank, Lord Glenlee, and Lord Robertson doubted very much of the letter being transferable with privileges, like the bill of exchange itself. An inquiry into practice was thought to be proper; but the inquiry was made only by way of written answer from bankers to a case, and the persons applied to gave opinions, but no evidence of practice. These opinions seem to be objectionable on two grounds, when considered as the foundation of a judicial decision: 1. They stated no facts or practice; and, 2. This was a question of law, for merchants could only say that in practice the delivery of the letter was held a transfer of it. It still remained, in point of law, to be determined what should be the legal effect of such transfer; whether the letter so transferred to the banker could, in his hands, produce any other effect than if it had remained in the hands of the original holder? And on this point the question appears to be extremely doubtful. [See More's Notes on Stair, p. 107.] settle. It does not appear that any question at law has been raised on such undertakings; but many examples of it are in the English books,¹ and many occur in consultation. This is a sort of transaction which has lately been introduced into Scotland, and which may be [377] attended with beneficial effects in periods of alarm to mercantile credit. It is difficult to find any principle on which effect can be denied to such a transaction, while del credere commission (which is just a guarantee of solvency for a premium) is supported. There is, however, one old case in Scotland, in which the Court held the stipulation of a premium for undertaking the risk of a borrower's insolvency to be contra bonos mores, though not usurious.² Such a judgment would not probably be pronounced now, unless there should appear to be collusion and usury in the transaction.³

DISCHARGE OF GUARANTEE.—The principles already stated concerning the discharge of cautionary obligations hold with respect to guarantees. 1. The acquittance of the principal, the giving of time, the renunciation of any collateral security, the discharging of diligence actually done, will free the guarantee.⁴ One who guarantees a bill will not be acquitted by the bill not having been duly presented, if the acceptor had previously become a bankrupt;⁵ but if he had not become bankrupt, this neglect will discharge the guarantee.⁶ 2. As to the notice to which one who guarantees a bill or note is entitled, although our early cases seem to imply an obligation to give the same notice as to an endorser of the bill or note, this does not accord either with later determinations or with the English cases. The rule deducible from the English cases seems to be, that it is only where the neglect to give notice has produced loss or prejudice to the person who has guaranteed the bill, that he is entitled to relief from his engagement.⁷ The Scottish cases seem to have gone at one time even further than this.⁸ But the rule followed in England, as being most consistent with the principles of this class of obligations, will probably be followed in such cases hereafter.⁹

GUARANTEE ON DEL CREDERE COMMISSION.—Merchants who conduct business for others, as factors or otherwise, sometimes engage to guarantee their dealings (or to stand del credere, as the phrase is) on receiving a certain commission. This is called a del credere commission. But to a certain extent factors are, by their implied undertaking, held to guarantee the payment of their principal's money without this extraordinary commission.

[378] To 'stand del credere' in any transaction is an engagement to be answerable as if the person so binding himself were the proper debtor. This seems to be the correct legal import of the undertaking; and it is as nearly as possible the meaning of the Italian phrase which we have adopted. Where a factor employed to sell goods receives a del credere commission, he is liable to the principal for the price to be recovered, whether he ever receive

So, in Philips v Astling, 2 Taunt. 206, the guarantee was in these words: 'We undertake to guarantee a payment of £500, at £5 per cent. say, by a bill drawn,' etc. No doubt was moved as to the validity of this undertaking.

² King v Kerr, 1711, 2 Fount. 631. Kerr applied to Simpson for a loan of 800 merks, who refused to lend it without caution; on which Kerr applied to King, who agreed to become security for the debt on Kerr giving him a bond for £100 Scots, in consideration of 'trouble, risk, and hazard.' Kerr paid the bond regularly, and the cautioner was never called on. He, however, demanded payment of his bond, and Kerr defended himself on the plea of usury and illegal contract. The Court did not find it direct usury, to infer the penal effects, but that it was turpe lucrum et pactum contra bonos mores, and declared the bond null, and assoilzied from it.

it or not. He is placed, in relation to the principal, precisely in the same situation as if he had actually received in loan the money of the principal; and no payment that would not be effectual as between debtor and creditor, will discharge his responsibility.¹ This sort of guarantee is not, on the one hand, a cautionary obligation, in the common sense of that expression; for the factor with a del credere commission is liable directly, and without any benefit of discussion. Neither is it, on the other, to all intents and purposes a delegatio debiti; for if the guarantee fail, the principal is entitled to resume his character, and recover from the proper debtor if he have not previously paid to the guarantee.²

A del credere engagement may be undertaken by a factor employed to sell the goods of another; or by a bank agent; or by an insurance broker, who engages underwriters to insure a risk for his principal; or by one who undertakes to remit money; or generally by any one whose interference is necessary in the conduct of a transaction involving the credit and responsibility of persons who may be unknown to the principal.

In the case of a foreign factor, where the principal cannot possibly know the buyers, it seems to be held that when nothing is said as to commission, a del credere commission is to be paid, and the sales guaranteed.

A del credere guarantee may be undertaken not only expressly, but also by implication.³ Where goods are sent to a factor on the footing of a del credere commission, and he keeps the goods without declining the guarantee, it will depend on his following the rules of mercantile practice relative to offers and acceptance whether he shall be held bound.⁴

Under an engagement of this nature, 1. The factor is entitled, he being himself [379] solvent, to claim on the bankrupt estate of the buyer, or underwriter, or banker, whose credit he has warranted. 2. If the factor or broker fail before payment by the proper debtor, the principal may claim on the estate of the proper debtor. 3. The principal is entitled

This judgment was affirmed in the House of Lords, 1796, 6 Brown's Parl. Cases 280, 3 Pat. 525.

² In Grove v Dubois, 1786, 1 Term. Rep. 112, it was laid down by Lord Mansfield, 'that this is an absolute engagement to the principal by the broker, and makes him liable in the first instance.' [But the doctrine there delivered has undergone some modification. 'It was at one time thought that an agent acting under a del credere commission was not merely in the same position as a surety, responsible only in case of the default of the purchaser, but that he was liable to his principal in the first instance. But that doctrine has been questioned, and at last overturned by subsequent authorities, which have settled that he is in the position of a surety.' Smith, Merc. Law, 7th ed. p. 120, citing Morris v Cleasby, 4 M. and Selw. 566; Hornby v Lacy, 6 M. and Selw. 166; Cumming v Forrester, 1 M. and Selw. 494; Baker v Langhorn, 6 Taunt. 519. Observe, however, that a factor is not a cautioner in the sense of an obligation in writing being necessary to bind him. Smith, ut supra.]

⁴ Watson & Co. v O'Reilly & Co., 1826, 4 S. 475, N. E. 480. Goods were sent to Jamaica, saying, 'We expect you will charge no more than 5 per cent. for selling and guaranteeing.' The letter was received 23d October, and answered 24th November, declining the guarantee. It was sent by the first regular mail packet; but two private ships, authorized by 39 Geo. III. c. 6 to convey letters, had sailed in the interval. The Court held the answer to be in time, and that there was no guarantee.

to enter his claim for the whole debt on the estate of him who agrees to stand del credere, at the same time that he enters his claim on the estate of the proper debtor.¹

IMPLIED GUARANTEE.—It has been supposed, that when a factor or agent of any kind has actually received the money of his principal, he is in the same case, in the remitting of it, as if he had agreed to stand del credere. But this is not strictly true. He undertakes to manage the remittance, as the other parts of the transaction, with all due discretion and fidelity; but he does not undertake the responsibility of a proper debtor, as in the other case. In making his remittance, therefore, he is free from responsibility, 1. If he follow the directions of his principal, or the course which his principal has sanctioned; or, 2. If he remit the money, either by one of the chartered banks, or even by a private banking-house of established good credit at the time,² acting as carefully for the principal as for himself; or, 3. If he remit in the way settled by common mercantile custom or local usage.³ But where he departs from any of those modes of remitting, he will be held to guarantee the solvency of those through whom the remittance is made.

When the agent pays the money which he collects into his general account with his banker, and his banker fails, he is liable, because the money is thus exposed to all the risks of his own trade, and as if still in his own drawer;⁴ but where he places the money specifically for security in a bank, in his principal's name, till he has an opportunity of remitting, he will be safe, provided the bank was in established credit. Or if he draw in favour of his principal on his general account, and his draft is accepted, it would seem that the effect must be the same as if he had carried the money to the banker for the specific purpose of buying a bill for his correspondent; which will discharge his responsibility, if the banking-house be at the time in established credit.⁵ Where the factor takes a bill in his own name, [380] and endorses it to his principal, he is presumed by his endorsement to guarantee the remittance.⁶

SECTION V.—OF JUDICIAL CAUTION.

Bonds of caution in judicial proceedings may ground a demand against the cautioner, where they have been made for securing appearance in an action, or payment of the sum in the expected decree. Or such bonds may become the ground of a claim of relief by the cautioner against the estate of the person for whose appearance or obedience to the judgment he has become surety.

I. BONDS OF CAUTION DE JUDICIO SISTI.—As the practice in Scotland does not on all

² Knight v Lord Plymouth, 3 Atk. 480.

Baines v Turnbull, 1795, M. 1486, is to be regarded as a special case. Before any general doctrine can be established, going so far as to decide such a case against the factor paying in moneys on account of the principal to a banker in established credit at the time, a very serious reconsideration of the principles would be required. Bell, Fol. Ca. 220.

The view taken in M'Kenzie's Trs. v Jones, Fox, & Co., 1822, 2 S. 82, N. E. 75, seems to confirm the doubts which I have ventured to express. There Gaffney, as agent for Sharp & M'Kenzie, sold cotton to Park & Brothers, who agreed to pay in bankers' bills. He took these drafts on their bankers, not accepted; and they were dishonoured. Gaffney did not stand del credere. [See Sm. Merc. Law, 7th ed. 119; Add. on Cont. 6th ed. 427.]

³ Russell v Hankey, 1794, 6 Term. Rep. 12. The custom of trade was held to rule this, which was a very strong case, where a person in the country having sent bills of exchange to his London bankers to receive payment, they took in payment the acceptor's check on his banker; but it turned out that the banker on whom the check was drawn had no account with the person who drew it. The London bankers were held exonerated, in respect of the custom of trade. [But see Ramsay, Bonnar, & Co. v Mackersy, 9 March 1843, 2 Bell 30, reversing 2 D. 1003.]

⁴ Massey v Banner, 1820, 1 Jacob and Walker 241. This doctrine fully laid down and illustrated by Lord Chancellor Eldon.

occasions of this sort seem to have accorded exactly with the principles of Scottish jurisprudence, a few preliminary observations may be proper before stating the result of the authorities.

Bail in civil cases is of two kinds—either for appearance or for payment. In the civil law it was distinguished (and we have adopted at least the terms) by the expressions of ‘satisfactio de judicio sisti’ and ‘satisfactio de judicatum solvi.’ The former bound the sureties to present the party in judgment; reum judicio exhibere; neque necesse fuit litis exitum expectare.¹ The latter bound them absolutely to the payment of what should be awarded against the person for whom they engaged.²

In Scotland, the caution de judicatum solvi is recognised only in maritime actions, [381] before the Court of Admiralty, and this by special statute, 1681, c. 16.³ Caution de judicio sisti is competent in meditatio fugæ warrants;⁴ and in actions of a mercantile, but not maritime, nature before the Admiralty. Much has been said in favour of a right of imprisoning strangers under a meditatio fugæ warrant, till caution should be given judicatum solvi; but from the first case to the last this has been uniformly refused.⁵

¹ By the civil law, the prosecutor was bound to find caution that he should prosecute within two months; that he should abide the issue of the trial; and that he should pay to the defendant, if he failed, a tenth part of the sum claimed (Nov. 96, c. 1). The defendant was bound to find caution de judicio sisti, which by the old law was fully complied with by presenting him in court, without abiding the sentence, but which Justinian declared should imply, ‘quod in judicio permaneat usque in terminum litis’ (4 Instit. xi. sec. 2). In those causes where, in the latter periods of the law, it was not necessary for the parties themselves to appear, but competent for them to delegate a procurator, the procurator of the pursuer was not admitted unless he had a mandate; in which case, if the mandate was clear and express, he was not bound to find caution; but if he had only a presumed or general mandate, his caution was ‘rem ratam habiturum dominium.’ The procurator of the defender was not admitted without caution de judicatum solvi. (Inst. loc. cit. sec. 5.)

² Voet. lib. 2, tit. 8, sec. 16.

The bail required by the English law to liberate from the arrest upon the capias ad respondendum, is merely de judicio sisti, according to the original meaning of that term in the Roman law. The bailees are taken bound to the sheriff, in a bond to a certain amount, with this condition, ‘that if the said A B do appear before the Justices of our sovereign lord the king at Westminster, on the morrow of the Holy Trinity, to answer C D of a plea of debt of £— sterling, then this obligation shall be void,’ etc. Upon the return of the writ, accordingly, or within four days after, the appearance must be made either by the debtor’s body being brought up or by putting in new bail to the action. The new bail must be at least two in number; and after justifying themselves by oath to be housekeepers, worth double the sum for which they are bail, after payment of all their debts, they enter into a recognizance in court, or before the judge at his chambers, or before a commissioner in the country, jointly and severally undertaking that, if the defendant be condemned in the action, he shall pay the costs and condemnation, or render himself a prisoner, or that they shall pay it for him.

³ Blackstone 291. He proceeds to draw the distinction between the obligation of the fidejussores in the civil law de judicatum solvi, and the special bail to the action in England;

the former being ‘bound to see the costs and condemnation paid at all events, whereas the English special bail may be discharged by surrendering the defendant into custody within the time allowed by law, for which purpose they are at all times entitled to a warrant to apprehend him.’

⁴ [This is abolished by 13 and 14 Vict. c. 36, sec. 24.]

Herries v Lidderdalles, 1755, M. 2044. Herries having come from abroad to this country, of which he was a native, his creditor applied for a warrant against him, on the ground of his having fraudulently come here to avoid his debts. The sheriff imprisoned him till he should find security, not only de judicio sisti, to answer in courts, but de judicatum solvi, to pay whatever should be awarded against him. The cause was brought before the Court of Session; and although Herries’ situation as a foreigner settled abroad was strongly founded upon as strengthening the necessity for caution de judicatum solvi, the Court ordered Herries to be set at liberty upon finding caution judicio sisti. It was observed from the bench, ‘that an arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa is usual in most countries, and in our country; but to oblige a defender to find caution judicatum solvi is not usual, except in maritime cases, before the Admiral Court; that it seemed unreasonable one should be obliged, at the commencement of an action, to give the pursuer more security than he had before; and that it would be dangerous to commerce and to personal liberty if a debtor were always obliged, when found in a foreign country, to find caution judicatum solvi.’

The principle of the Scottish law, upon which all the proceedings against a debtor as in meditatione fugæ are grounded, is widely different both from the principle of the Roman and from that of the English law. Those laws require the actual presentment of the debtor himself in court. By the law of Scotland, this does not seem to be necessary.

It was a principle in the very constitution of the Roman judicial proceedings, that the parties should be personally present, and not be represented by a procurator; for neither as an actio legis,¹ nor as implying the solemn contract of litiscontestatio,² could these proceedings admit of a procurator. The satisfactio de judicio sisti, therefore, implied an actual presentment of the person; and when the old forms were relaxed, still a procurator for the defender could not be admitted without caution de iudicatum solvi.³

But as an ordinary step of judicial proceeding, no man is in Scotland bound to appear personally in court, except in a criminal action.⁴ All that he is bound to do, whether a native or a foreigner, is to remain within the country; in the farthest corner of which the arm of the law will reach him for the purposes of personal execution, unless he have acquired a right of exemption, by privilege, personal protection, or the sanctuary. If he is not meditating removal from the country, no circumstance whatever can entitle the [382] creditor to insist on bail for his actual appearance. If the creditor swear to his suspicion, and bail is found, it is only to secure the creditor against what he has sworn he suspects,—namely, a fraudulent departure from Scotland; and by this bail the defender is restored to the same state as if there were no ground for suspicion. But in the absence of such suspicion, no warrant can be granted for enforcing personal appearance. In short, if the debtor be preparing to escape from the country, the law will stop him in his flight. But he cannot be obliged, upon a charge of such design, whether well or ill founded, to tie himself to a particular spot; to appear in court at the call of his creditor, which the law does not require him to do; or to forego any legal privilege within the country, which he may either at that moment possess, or be in the legal capacity of acquiring. Neither can a creditor, who has no ground for suspecting flight from Scotland, apply; and it is only against such flight that the law has provided.

The difference in principle between the obligation contained in a bond of presentation, and the caution proper to sustain an action, is very obvious. The liberation on a bond of presentation is a redemption from proper imprisonment in execution; the necessary consequence of which is, that the cautioner in the bond becomes (like the special bail in England) the jailor of the debtor, entitled to insist upon presenting him personally in a particular place, and liable for the debt should he fail so to do. But a cautioner in a commencing action is in a different situation: his creditor has no right of execution against the debtor, who is not a redeemed prisoner, but a person under bond not to leave the country, and that is all. The invasion which the law has been forced to permit of the common rights of the subject, had no other object than to vindicate its own authority—to prevent a person from escaping from the execution of legal diligence. If a judge, as in the case of Watson and Mollison, is to be punished for giving a warrant against a man who was only going to leave the part of the country where he dwelt, the law should not be so inconsistent as to authorize caution to be insisted for, that shall have the effect of preventing him from thus changing his residence; or which shall hurry him back from the remotest corner of Scotland, to present himself before his creditor, who is bound at common pursuer may apply to the judge ordinary; and upon making oath that the defender is in meditatione fugæ, he will obtain a warrant to apprehend.⁷

³ The English law proceeds to the same end upon another principle. The arrest of a defendant in England is grounded on the fiction of a trespass, for which the person is to be detained in order to punishment. The acceptance of bail is a temporary relief, enabling the defendant to go about his concerns in the meanwhile, under the easier imprisonment of his bailees, whom the law regards as his jailors, bound to present him corporally in court for judgment and execution.

law to follow him with his diligence, and entitled only to insist that he shall not leave the territory over which the force of that diligence extends.

According to just principles, caution de judicio sisti should not prevent the debtor from taking the privilege of sanctuary, or claiming any intermediate protection which may have been granted to him, or any privilege of peerage or of parliament, to which he may have succeeded or been elected. Against these privileges the meditatio fugæ warrant was never meant to be a defence. And if no warrant could be taken out to interdict such privileges, or to prevent a debtor from applying for protection, neither should a warrant issued upon other grounds, and for the purpose of warding off other dangers, act as a prohibition against the taking of sanctuary, or petitioning for personal protection. And so caution de judicio sisti ought not, by implication, to secure the creditor against evils which could not be made the object of a direct application. Here, again, the distinction is plain between the bond of presentation and caution de judicio sisti. In the former the debtor is enlarged, under the condition that he shall be restored to his creditor, at a particular time, a prisoner—as accessible to his diligence as ever. In the latter, the defender never was a prisoner further than in being confined within the country; and the creditor's rights are uninjured if he remain within it. In the former case the principal as well as the cautioner is truly debtor in an obligation ad factum præstandum; and the sanctuary would seem to give no protection against the cautioner in demanding the person of the principal. If the import of the caution de judicio sisti be, that the cautioner shall present the debtor in court (and the form of the bond is so), upon the same principle the cautioner should be entitled to bring the [383] debtor out of the sanctuary; but otherwise the cautioner can have no title to take the debtor from the sanctuary.¹

FORM OF THE BOND IN PRACTICE, AND EFFECT OF IT.—But in practice the form of the bond is much more favourable to the creditor. It in general is, that the creditor 'shall appear personally, and attend personally, at all or any of the diets of court.' And it rather seems to be held as law, that a pursuer is entitled to demand caution in those terms. It has been decided, 1. That under such bonds the cautioner is liable unless the debtor be presented personally in court, unprotected, and as open to diligence as at the time of his apprehension on the warrant de meditatione fugæ.² 2. That the pursuer may make his requisition either during the litigation or after decree, at any time before the lapse of the period allowed for extracting the decree, or even at any time before extract.³ It is held,

² Cowan v Aitchison, 1797, M. 2061; Tasker v Mercer, 1802, M. App. Caut. Jud. Sist. No. 8. [In this case the Court were divided in opinion, and the law is not to be considered as settled. Shaw's Bell's Com. p. 295, note (a).]

In Brown & Co. v Wilson, 1790, M. 2059, decree went in absence against the defender, but was not extracted. At a considerable interval afterwards, a new action was raised against the debtor, and concluding upon the bond against the cautioner, and the sheriff of Dumfries found him liable. When the cause came into the Court of Session by advocacy, 'the opinion of the Court was, that by the mere act of obtaining judgment, without requiring the cautioner to produce the body of the defender, the security of the creditor was not entirely at an end; but that such a requisition might be made that any action beginning in an inferior court is not concluded by decree pronounced there, if it shall be removed into a higher court by advocacy: the decree is not final, nor the action at an end, till the proceedings have been extracted, or, in other words, the record made up and signed by the clerk.¹

The obligation of the cautioner when the bond is forfeited, is to be answerable for the debt, according to the decree, with costs of suit, and such interest as may be adjudged to be paid. And in bankruptcy the claims will accordingly be made to this extent. The pursuer will, however, be obliged to establish his ground of action, which will not be taken for granted merely from the debtor's absence.

The cautioner's obligation may be extinguished in four several ways: 1. If the debtor die during the course of the action. 2. By the cautioner giving the creditor due notice, and presenting the debtor in court, and protesting for freedom.² 3. If the creditor at any [384] time, even before decree, require implement of the bond (in which he will be indulged on showing cause, and allowing a reasonable time for performance), the cautioner may be free, on accompanying his presentment of the debtor with a protest to that effect, so that the creditor may be put upon his guard. 4. If the pursuer do not, before extracting the decree, require the presentment of the debtor's person, he is presumed to be satisfied that he has no ground for suspicion, and that no other precautions are necessary for securing him: the cautioner, therefore, is free.

When, under a bond of caution de judicio sisti, the creditor requires the debtor to be produced, or the cautioner gives notice, and presents the debtor under protest for freedom, he must either suffer imprisonment to abide the decree, or find new caution. The caution after decree has an object somewhat different from that de judicio sisti, in so far as the creditor now meditates the execution of personal diligence. But it is not caution judicatum solvi that the pursuer is entitled to demand: it is merely that the debtor's person shall be produced at any time within such space as may enable the creditor to execute diligence against him.³ It still may be suggested as a doubt, whether the creditor can be entitled to demand more than that the person of his debtor shall be secured within the country; since the creditor can have no sort of title to any extraordinary privilege which another creditor holding personal diligence would not enjoy.

II. BOND OF CAUTION JUDICATUM SOLVI.⁴—This is an obligation on which no creditor is entitled to insist, except in maritime causes before the Court of Admiralty. That Court at any time before the elapsing of the period allowed for extracting the decree.' They freed the cautioners.

Stewart v Frazer, 8 July 1809, 13 Fac. Coll. 404. The Court here held that the requisition might be made even after the lapse of the time allowed for extracting, if before actual extract (though in that particular case the decree was not ready for extracting); the proper limitation to the endurance of the cautioner's obligation consisting in the remedy which is open to him, by producing the defender and protesting.

² Stevenson v Chisholm, 11 March 1812, 16 Fac. Coll. 552. Where the bond was, that the defender should appear personally, and also personally attend at all or any of the diets of court when required, Lord Craigie, after ordering an inquiry into the practice of the sheriff courts, held it 'to be the general result of the inquiry now made, as well as the true purpose and meaning of caution de judicio sisti, that the cautioner, after action brought, and after due notice to the pursuer, may produce in court the person for whom he is cautioner, to the effect that the pursuer may either obtain caution of new, or have the defender put in prison, according to the discretion of the Court in which the action has been brought.'

³ Sir James Cockburn v Inglis, 1776, M. App. Caut. Jud. Sist. No. 1.

Two cases were decided in 1790, in which, at the final pronouncing of decree, the creditor was found entitled to insist for caution to produce the debtor's person, during such time as should be requisite for carrying the decree into execution by a caption. Masterton v Hutton (n. r.), and Duncan, petitioner (n. r.).

has, by 1681, c. 16, a privilege 'to cause parties become enacted and find caution, not only for compearance, but for performance of the acts and sentences of his court.' By the bond the surety binds himself 'as cautioner and surety de judicio sisti et judicatum solvi acted in the Books of the High Court of Admiralty for B, in a process presently depending before the judge of the said High Court at the instance of C against the said B; and I, the said B, oblige myself to free and relieve my said cautioner of his cautionary obligation above written, and of all damages and expenses he may sustain thereby.'

1. The cautioner is thus liable for all that the defender may be adjudged to pay by the decree of the Admiral. 2. He is not freed in consequence of the judgment against the defender being brought by suspension or reduction before the Court of Session.¹ 3. He has been held not to be freed by a decree of absolvitor, while it is still under trial by review in the Court of Session.² And, 4. In Lord Stair's time it was held that the cautioner's obligation was discharged by the defender's death before sentence;³ and considered on the analogy of imprisonment, in room of which it comes, this seems just. But in Kilkerran's time, the point having come to be reconsidered, the Court, looking to the practice of Admiralty, and also to that of other trading nations, reversed the rule, and held the [385] cautioner bound, and that it was competent to call the representatives by an edictal citation.⁴

III. BOND OF CAUTION IN SUSPENSION OR ADVOCATION.—The bond in a suspension is, 'that the suspender shall make payment to the charger, or to any other person to whom payment shall be ordained to be made, of the principal sum, etc., as contained in the decree and letters of horning, in case it shall be found by decree of the Court of Session that he ought so to do, after discussing the suspension.' And there is added an obligation 'to pay whatever sum the Lords shall modify in name of expenses, in case of wrongous suspending.'⁵ By the recent Judicature Act,⁶ bills of advocacy against final judgments of sheriffs and other inferior judges are to be passed on caution only for expenses. The bond in an advocacy is, 'that the advocator shall make payment to A, or to any other person, etc., of the expenses incurred in the inferior court, and also of such expenses as may be incurred in the Court of Session, in case it shall be found that he ought so to do.'

The cautioner is not freed by the death of the suspender or advocator;⁷ nor even by the decree being turned into a libel.⁸ But he will not be liable where, at the time of suspending or advocating, there was sufficient ground for so doing, though this has afterwards been removed.⁹

Cautioners in such bonds have not the benefit of the septennial limitation.¹⁰

SUBSECTION VI.—OF BONDS OF PRESENTATION.

The occasion of this bond is the execution of personal diligence against a debtor. The purpose of the cautioner's interposition is to allow the debtor time to settle the debt. And the effect of the bond is to restore the person of the debtor to the operation of the creditor's diligence, as at the time of the cautioner's interposition; or otherwise to secure the creditor in payment of the debt, with interest and expenses.¹

The responsibility on such bonds was formerly much less strict than at present.

1. Not only death, but sickness, or inevitable accident, will excuse the cautioner, provided the debtor is presented as soon as the impediment is removed;² but no impediment will serve as an excuse to which the voluntary act of the debtor has contributed.³

2. Formerly, what was called a modica mora was allowed,⁴ but the presentation must now be at the very hour appointed.⁵ The prisoner is by the cautioner's interposition redeemed from actual imprisonment, on the sole condition that he shall be presented at a [386] particular hour, and at an appointed place, and the creditor has a right to insist on strict observance; for the whole effect of his diligence may be defeated by the debtor being allowed one hour's indulgence longer.⁶

3. It may well be doubted, notwithstanding an old case to the contrary,⁷ whether the cautioner is liable, should the debtor be taken in the meanwhile on another caption; for this is in one sense an inevitable accident, and the creditor has all the benefit that he could have had by himself imprisoning the debtor, there being no preference by priority of personal execution.

The claim against the cautioner under this species of bond is for the debt, interest, and expenses; leaving him to operate his relief against the principal debtor as he may.⁸

obligations 'to answer for the debt or default of another person,' were withdrawn from the statute; and to remedy this Lord Tenterden's Act (9 Geo. IV. c. 14) was passed, which requires (sec. 6) that an assurance or representation on which credit is given, shall, to found action, be in writing, and signed by the party charged with the debt, or his agent, etc. (See Pasley v Freeman, supra; Eyre v Dunsford, 1 East 318; Haycroft v Creasy, 2 East 92; Evans v Bicknill, 6 Vesey 174; Clifford v Brook, 13 Vesey 181; Hutchinson v Bell, 1 Taunt. 564; Tapp v Lee, 3 Bos. and P. 367; Hamar v Alexander, 2 N. R. 241; Smith v Harris, 2 Stark. 47; Foster v Charles, 6 Bingh. 396; Fell on Guarantee, 231; Martin's Treatise on Lord Tenterden's Act, ch. 3.) To assimilate the Scotch to the English law in matters falling respectively within the Statute of Frauds, sec. 4, and Lord Tenterden's Act, sec. 6, was the purpose of sec. 6 of the Scotch Mercantile Law Amendment Act, which provides, that 'from and after the passing of this Act, all guarantees, securities, or cautionary obligations made or granted by any person for any other person, and all representations and assurances as to the character, conduct, credit, ability, trade, or dealings of any person made or granted to the effect or for the purpose of enabling such person to obtain credit, money, goods, or postponement of payment of debt, or of any other obligation demandable from him, shall be in writing, and shall be subscribed by the person undertaking such guarantee, security, or cautionary obligation, or making such representations and assurances, or by some person duly authorized by him or them, otherwise the same shall have no effect.' On the other hand, the Statute of Frauds, sec. 4, required the agreement, not merely the cautioner's promise, to be in writing. By the law of England, all agreements not under seal require proof of a consideration to support action on them, no action lying on nudum pactum. Hence, in Wain v Warlters (5 East 10, 1 Smith 299), and Lyon v Lamb (Fell, App. 3), the Courts held the written statement of the consideration essential to a guarantee available under the Statute of Frauds, as parole evidence of what was essential to the agreement was excluded thereby. Numerous guarantees, drawn by unskilful persons, fell to the ground through neglect of this technicality. In Scotland, nudum pactum (except where the granter is insolvent) is no ground of invalidity in an obligation; and as regards promises within the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds, the English law has been assimilated to the Scotch by sec. 3 of the English Mercantile Law Amendment Act (19 and 20 Vict. c. 97) to this extent, that the consideration for a guarantee need not appear in writing, but not to the extent of validating gratuitous guarantees.

The ruling principle of the Mercantile Law Amendment Acts is to remedy 'inconveniences felt by persons engaged in trade in matters of common occurrence in the course of such trade,' by reason of the difference of the laws of England and Scotland in those matters. (See preambles to both Acts.) But the enacting portions of the Scotch Act as to cautionry are not limited to cautionry in course of trade: they apply to 'all cautionary obligations,' to 'all representations and assurances;' and so do the English Acts to which assimilation was meant to be made. The opinion intimated by Mr. Fraser, that the Scotch Act is confined to cautionary obligations 'in matters of trade and commerce' (Fraser on Parent and Child, Guardian and Ward, p. 515, note b), seems a mistake. Unfortunately this valuable Act is so ill drawn, that the exact extent to which the English law of cautionry has become our law is left in great uncertainty also upon another important point. The Statute of Frauds requires the agreement to be 'in writing,' otherwise 'no action' shall lie on the cautioner's obligation. The English courts, in expounding these words, have uniformly regarded writing rather as a necessary evidence of the contract than as a solemnity. (Theobald, Law of Principal and Surety, p. 23; Chitty on Contracts, 65.) They have held it not necessary that the agreement should in the first instance be reduced to writing—not necessary that it should be constituted, but merely that it be proved by writing. Any writing or memorandum or note signed by the party to be charged, or his agent, which contains, either expressly or by reference, the terms of the agreement, is sufficient—though it be merely a recognition or admission ex post facto of its terms—if made before action brought on it, notwithstanding that the promise was originally verbal, and the writing was not made until after the promise has been acted on. (Chitty, p. 66; Pitman on Pr. and Surety, p. 77; Leake, Contr. 146; Longfellow v Williams, Peake, Add. Ca. 225; Bill v Bament, 9 M. and W. 36.) 'The memorandum is necessary,' says Mr. Smith (L. C. vol. i., notes to Birkmyr v Darnell), 'only to evidence the contract, not to constitute it. The contract, as was observed by Tindal, C. J., in Laythoarp v Bryant, 2 Bingh. N. C. 744, is made before any signature thereof by the parties.' (See generally on this subject the notes to Birkmyr v Darnell.) The phraseology of the Scotch Act is, that the obligation shall be in writing, 'otherwise the same shall have no effect.' Does this make cautionry a literarum obligatio with us? Must it be constituted in writing? Is there no obligation till there is writing? If it is given verbally, and acted on, and the verbal promise afterwards proved by the cautioner's written admission, will it have 'no effect?' Would that merely show that the creditor had been relying on what was no obligation at all? The words seem strong to that result. But the result is one not to be adopted except of sheer force. Cautionry never was a literarum obligatio by the law of Scotland. Stair (i. 17. 3) and Erskine (iv. 2. 20) treat it as one of those contracts which are constituted by consent alone, though in many cases proveable only by writing. (See Dickson, Evid. sec. 597 et seq.) There is nothing in the scope or purpose of the Act that leads us to suppose that a radical change in the nature of the contract of cautionry was meant to be introduced. Looking to this—to the object as declared in the preamble—to the analogy of the English decisions on the Statute of Frauds—and to the fact that holding writing necessary to constitute, and not merely to evidence the contract, would render many of what are available guarantees in England nullities in Scotland, and instead of assimilating the two laws would create a new dissimilarity between them,—the proper construction of the statute seems, in spite of the words, to be that an obligation not originally constituted in writing shall be of no effect as a ground of legal action or exception, unless its terms are evidenced by writing; not that a verbal cautionary obligation is per se null and void, but only effectual through writing where it requires to be established as the debtor's. If this is not the meaning, the Act ought to be amended at once. Again, it may be a question whether the cautioner's admission on oath of a verbal obligation, followed by rei interventus, would constitute a ground of action. The Statute of Frauds seems as clear as our Act, to the effect that nothing but writing will avail to set up the verbal promise as a ground of action; yet the Courts of Equity in England have held that cases where there has been part performance of the parole agreement are excepted out of the Statute of Frauds, not by words, but by its very object, which was to prevent, and not to encourage and assist fraud, and have decreed for specific performance. Again, although in Bill v Bament, and Fricker v Thomlinson, 1 Man. and Gr. 773, the Common Law Courts have held that the written memorandum must exist before the action, and that in that respect it differs from mere evidence, yet in equity an admission in the party's pleadings of the terms of a verbal agreement takes it out of the Statute of Frauds. (See, on both points, the cases in Chitty's Equity Index, s.v. Statute of Frauds, Part Performance, and Specific Performance: and also on the former point, Story, Eq. Jurisp. secs. 759, 760; Nunn v Fabian, 35 L. J. Ch. 140; Law Rep. 1 Ch. 35; Massey v Johnson, 1 Ex. 241, 252. As to the latter, the cases of Edmonston v Lang, M. 17057; Walker v Duncan, Hailes 985; Wallace v Wallace, M. 17056; More's note to Stair i. 17. 3—must be kept in view. As to which quære?) It seems probable that on the latter point our courts would follow the equity practice. As to the other point,—the sustaining of rei interventus as a ground for giving effect to a cautionary obligation not evidenced by writing,—it is not so clear that our judges would assume the same powers of dispensing with the statutory proof required by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act as the English Equity Courts have assumed in overriding the Statute of Frauds. It is clear that if they do so at all, it will, as a general rule, only be where the terms of the verbal obligation are proved by the oath of the cautioner, and not by parole; for, as the law stood before the Act, no other mode of establishing the obligation was competent, even though rei interventus had followed, unless in cases where the guarantee was interposed as an integral part of a contract about moveables, itself proveable by parole. (See Dickson on Evidence, p. 388, and cases there.) But if parole proof be not absolutely excluded by the statute, and the courts exercise the nobile officium assumed in Chancery, the proof of the verbal contract, in cases of rei interventus following a guarantee interposed as part of a contract proveable by parole, might probably be by parole. Cases where the interposition of writing is, by the communings of parties, made a condition suspensive of any final consent, will of course be excepted from any attempt to apply the doctrine of rei interventus. (See Dickson on Evidence, secs. 603, 835.) And, in general, cases where, by the law as it stood before the Act, rei interventus would not have been pleadable to validate the imperfectly proved obligation.

The question, whether our courts are shut out by the Act from creating exceptions to it where there has been part performance unequivocally referable to the verbal cautionary obligation, at first sight appears to be just a question as to their right to repeat in this case what they have already done in dispensing with the formalities required by the Acts 1540, 1579, and 1681, for the sake of substantial justice, in cases where rei interventus has taken place on the faith of verbal or improbative written obligations which would otherwise have been ineffectual. The difference, however, probably lies in this, that the restriction to writing as the ordinary modus probandi of facts not proveable by parole, does not arise from these statutes, but from the jealousy with which the common law of Scotland from the earliest period regarded the testimony of witnesses. And the statutes appear to have in view, not the prescribing of writing as the indispensable modus probandi, but, assuming what had been settled by the common law as to that matter, to have aimed simply at prescribing the formalities which should be observed in writings. But then the common law, while excluding mere parole evidence, and requiring writing if there was nothing but the agreement founded on, recognised another habile mode of proving such obligations by the oath of the party, or even in certain cases by witnesses coupled with rei interventus to prevent the chance of misapprehension as to the parties' intention, and supply demonstration of their final and deliberate intention to be bound. This alternative mode of proof the Acts anent the authentication of writings did not touch, but left to the common law. The object of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act is probably to prescribe writing as the exclusive modus probandi, and to shut out all other proof. Compare Porter's Trs. v Stout, 11 Dec. 1816, F. C., and Tait, Ev. 228. Of course the Act does not decide that, in any given case of cautionary obligation, the mere signature of the granter or his agent is all that is requisite. Whether the writing must be holograph or tested in terms of the old Acts, remains to be settled by the rules in force before the Act.

With regard to the construction of the requisites of authentication as to the writing and signature, so far as they are contained in this Act, the English decisions on the Statute of Frauds will be in point, except so far as they turn on the word 'signed' which is used there, and also in the English Mercantile Law Amendment Act, while our Act employs the more definite word 'subscribed.' Under the word 'signed,' various modes of adhibiting the names of the party to a document have been sustained in England; as, e.g., where the name was written by the party in the body of the writing, in such a way as to authenticate the whole, but without any subscription, it being clear that the want of subscription did not arise from the writing being left unfinished. (Knight v Crockford, Esp. N. P. R. 190; Lemayne v Stanley,

3 Levinz 1; Coles v Trecothick, per Lord Eldon, 9 Ves. jun. 249; Stokes v Moore, 1 P. W. 771; Saunderson v Jackson, 2 B. and P. 238; Welford v Beazeley, 3 Atk. 503.) So Lord Eldon held even a printed name at the top of an invoice sufficient 'signature;' 'for if a man be in the habit of printing instead of writing his name, may he not be said to sign by his printed as well as his written name?' (Saunderson v Jackson, 2 B. and P. 238; Schneider v Norris, 2 M. and S. 286.) And a mark is enough. (Schneider v Norris, supra; Harrison v Harrison, 8 Ves. jun. 185; Addy v Grix, 1 Ves. 6, 3 Atk. 503.) But 'subscribed' with us has always, under the old statutes, meant signed in the party's handwriting below or at the end of the deed (Tait, p. 70). And the same doctrine is held in America, in those States which, in their revision of the Statute of Frauds, have substituted 'subscribed' for 'signed.' The effect of the alteration is ruled to be, that the signature is required to be in the party's handwriting, and at the end of the deed. (Story, Contr. sec. 1015, note (u), vol. ii. p. 677, citing New York Revised Statutes, p. 2, c. 7, t. 1, sec. 8; Davis v Shields, 24 Wendell 322, 26 ibid. 341; Vielie v Osgood, 8 Barb. 130. But see contra, James v Patten, 8 Barb. 344.) Suppose the document to run: 'Mr. A B presents his compliments, and begs to say that he will be responsible to C D for all goods supplied to E F?' Or a regularly subscribed letter, with a guarantee in the unsigned postscript? Or one of the memorandums now so common among merchants, with a printed heading in this form: 'Memorandum from A B, merchant, etc., to — —?' Then follow the terms of the offer or order, which are rarely subscribed. These cases will fairly raise the question whether we are to adhere to the etymology of the word, and reject the writing because the party has written his name to the document, but not under it; and whether we can adopt Lord Eldon's doctrine in Saunderson's case, so far as regards the requisites of the Act, leaving cases that also fall under the old Acts to be regulated by them quoad ultra. (See Leake on Contr. pp. 148–9.) In England, it is settled that the signature must express the name of the party; a descriptive signature, as 'your affectionate mother,' in a letter addressed to a son, being insufficient. (Selby v Selby, 3 Mer. C. R. 2.) Next, who is to be considered 'a person duly authorized' to sign? The party receiving the obligation cannot be the agent to sign the obligation for the party giving it, though in writing out the document the former be under the eye, and draw it up to the dictation of the latter. (Wright v Dannah, 2 Camp. 203. See Farebrother v Simmons, 5 B. and A. 333; Bird v Boulter, 4 B. and A. 443; Dixon v Bromfield, 2 Chitty 205.) And the same reasoning would apply to the principal debtor for whose behoof the promise is given. But Blackburn, J. (Sale, p. 76), says that the cases quoted are very doubtful law. A person legally incapable of acting in his own individual capacity, or of protecting his own individual interests, may be an agent to sign. (Watkins v Vince, 2 Stark. 368; Emerson v Blonden, 1 Esp. 142; Palethorp v Furnish, 2 Esp. 511; Lindus v Bradwell, 17 L. J. C. P. 121; Lord v Hall, 19 L. J. C. P. 47; M'Michael v Barbour, 3 D. 279; Pothier, Oblig. sec. 449; Stair i. 12. 19; L. 7, sec. fin. D. de Inst. Act.) So persons attainted or outlawed. (Chitty, Contr. 171, 195.) An agency to sign cannot be delegated, though the terms of the contract have been adjusted by the principal. (Henderson v Barnewall, 1 Younge and Jer. 387.) The authorization may be express or implied, or it may be by subsequent ratification or adoption. (Watkins v Vince, Bailey v Culverwell, 8 B. and C. 448; Trueman v Loder, 11 Ad. and E. 589; Maclean v Dunn, 4 Bingh. 727; Poth. Mand. sec. 29; Stair i. 12. 12.) The authority may be given verbally, and proved by parole, provided the writing itself does not make the alleged agent appear to sign as personally liable; for to admit evidence to show he was only an agent for another, would be to contradict the writing, or prove the true contract by other evidence than the statute allows. If the agent is by competent evidence shown to be duly authorized, the signature of his own name, or of the principal's, will equally bind the principal. (Emmerson v Heelis, 2 Taunt. 38, 46; Acebal v Levy, 10 Bingh. 376; White v Proctor, 4 Taunt. 209; Watkins v Vince, supra; Kenworthy v Schofield, 2 B. and C. 945.) As to the form and substance of the 'writing' in which the obligation must appear, the note or memorandum may consist of several documents, if they are sufficiently connected together by internal reference. It is not necessary that all be signed by the cautioner. A letter referring to certain unsigned conditions, or to a letter of the other party, was held to incorporate the documents referred to, so as to make complete written evidence of the terms of the contract. (Dobell v Hutchinson, 3 Ad. and Ell. 355; De Beil v Thomson, 3 Beav. 469; Johnson v Dodgson, 2 M. and W. 653.) But if, while recognising the existence of an obligation of the general nature stated in the letter referred to, the writer, without stating what the terms of it were, should disaffirm the terms stated in the other letter, this will not be enough. (Cooper v Smith, 15 East 103; Routledge v Grant, 4 Bingh. 660; Smith v Gurman, 9 B. and C. 561.) The documents taken together must amount to a statement of the substance of a specific agreement, and not merely show in general that there was an agreement upon some terms, leaving them to be ascertained by parole. (Rose v Cunningham, 11 Ves. jun. 550; Clerk v Wright, 1 Atk. 12.) Nor will the writing be enough if it refer to any other terms which do not appear in the writing itself, or some document referred to in it. (Boys v Amherst, 6 Mad. 316.) It is not necessary that the reference to the other writing be intended as an admission, if in point of fact it is an admission of its correctness, for a person may well enough furnish evidence against himself. The writing need not be addressed to the other party. (Moore v Hart, 1 Vernon 110, 201; Wankford v Fotherby, 2 Vern. 322; Bateman v Phillips, 15 East 272.) In Welford v Beazeley, 3 Atk. 503, Lord Hardwicke held a letter written by a man to his own agent, setting forth the terms of agreement with the plaintiff, enough to satisfy the statute. There is no need for an express or explicit reference to a separate document to incorporate it, if it can without parole be connected with that signed by the party to be charged from what appears in the papers themselves. (Coles v Trecothick, 9 Ves. jun. 250; Clinan v Cooke, 1 Sch. and Lefroy 22; Tawney v Crowther, 3 Bro. Ch. C. 161, 318; Brodie v St. Paul, 1 Ves. jun. 326; Richards v Porter, 6 B. and C. 437; Archer v Baynes, 5 Ex. 625; Boydell v Drummond, 11 East 142; Saunderson v Jackson, 3 B. and P. 238 (as to which, see Evans' App. to transl. of Pothier on Obligations, vol. ii. p. 202, and Fell, p. 59); Jackson v Lowe, 1 Bingh. 9; Stead v Liddard, 1 Bingh. 196; Allen v Bennet, 3 Taunt. 169; Ridgway, 3 De G. M. and G. 677, 694; Kenworthy v Schofield, 2 B. and C. 945.) But parole evidence, though not admitted to create a connection between two documents not avowed by the documents themselves, will be admitted to identify the document which is the subject of reference. (Allen v Bennet, 3 Taunt. 169; Western v Russel, 3 Ves. and B. 187; Hindle v Whitehouse, 7 East 558; Powell v Dillon, 2 B. and B. 416; Clinan v Cooke, 1 Sch. and Lefr. 22.) It is not necessary that the writer use any words of direct obligation: a mere narrative of the terms of a past verbal undertaking is enough, even if it be for the purpose of asserting that now, from failure on the other party's side, or other intervening circumstances, they are no longer obligatory.

The essentials of the agreement must be stated; that is, the subject-matter of it, the extent of the liability created thereby, and the names of both parties to it. 'In order that any agreement or memorandum should be sufficient under the Statute of Frauds, it is absolutely necessary that the names of the parties to the agreement should appear on its face. Certainly it is not necessary that both parties should sign it: it is sufficient if it be signed by the party to be charged thereby. . . . Not only is that the fair construction to be put on the statute; but when we look at the mischief intended to be prevented, it is clear that a writing which constitutes a liability on one side, without stating the name of the other party to whom it was given, would lead to the very thing the statute was intended to prevent, viz. fraud' (per Cockburn, C. J., in Williams v Lake, 29 L. J. Q. B. 1). In this case, a guarantee delivered to a builder for the price of the building he had undertaken to erect for parties named, but which had not his name on it, was held insufficient under the statute. (See, however, Bateman v Phillips, 15 East 272; Champion v Plumer, 1 N. R. 252; Graham v Musson, 7 Scott 769; Fell, p. 43; Pitman, p. 76; Lawranson v Mason, 3 Wauch's Amer. C.; Burnett v Burnett, 1859, 21 D. 813, 818, per Lord Curriehill.) As to parole evidence to identify the debt guaranteed, see Shortrede v Cheke, 1 Ad. and Ell. 57; and as to how this is distinguished from creating, or adding to, or explaining the obligation, Haigh v Brooks, 10 A. and E. 309; Holmes v Mitchell, 28 L. J. C. P. 301.

There has been a great deal of subtle disquisition in England to determine what are and what are not, in the sense of the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds, promises 'to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person;' or, in other words, what are collateral obligations. The words of our Act, 'guarantees, securities, or cautionary obligations made or granted by any person for any other person,' are not quite the same; but no doubt they will create as much questioning as the Statute of Frauds has done as to the precise nature of the obligations referred to. 'Guarantee' and 'cautionary obligation' are the same thing, though in the rubric of Wilson v Tait, 1840, H. L., 1 Rob. 137, it is incorrectly stated to have been held that there was a difference between them. All that was determined was, that the mere use of the verb 'I guarantee,' as it was used in the letter forming the ground of that action, did not create a proper cautionary obligation, accessory to an obligation by another, but one amounting to a clear substantive obligation to pay on demand, and in the first instance, and not merely upon the failure of the other obligant. 'A guarantee,' as Mr. Fell defines it, 'is a promise to answer for the payment of some debt, or the performance of some duty, in case of the failure of another person, who is in the first instance liable to such payment or performance' (Fell on Guarantee, p. 1); and this is exactly what cautionary is, if we add that the promise is given by way of accession to the principal debtor's obligation—that is to say, that it has as its causa that which is the causa of the principal debtor's obligation, and not any separate and independent cause of obligation peculiar to the cautioner himself. The cautioner might have become bound by other contracts for the identical sum or identical factum which the principal debtor is bound to pay or perform; but his obligation is not one of cautionary if it has a cause different from that of the obligation of the principal debtor. This essential characteristic of proper cautionary is clearly explained by Pothier, Tr. des Oblig. sec. 446, who employs it to discriminate between cautionary and the obligation of a mandator pecuniæ credendæ. The English lawyers mark the same characteristic by the term 'collateral.' (Theobald, pp. 1-3; Reid v Nash, 1 Wils. 305; Fell, p. 14, sec. 7, and p. 21, note; Pitman, pp. 3-26; Burge's Commentaries on Suretyship, pp. 20-29, and the cases passim.) The Statute of Frauds does not define the obligations to which it applies by any legal denomination: thence considerable uncertainty,—some taking it for granted that the words were meant as a description, not perfectly accurate, of collateral obligations, or what we should call cautionary obligations or guarantees;—others, that they include all promises, whether collateral or not, coming within the range of their literal significance; and in reviewing the English decisions, the courts seem to oscillate somewhat between the two canons of construction. In using these decisions as precedents applicable to our Act, this must always be kept in view. A promise to answer for the debt or default of another, is not necessarily a cautionary obligation or a guarantee. The phrase appears to include all cautionary obligations and guarantees; but there are obligations which are not guarantees or cautionary obligations, and yet are literally 'promises to answer for the debt of another.' Some of these latter obligations the English courts, oscillating as we have mentioned, have included in, others of them they have excluded from, the Statute of Frauds. The undertaking of a del credere agent is a promise to pay another's debt, if that other—the principal debtor—at maturity, and on being applied to, does not. Yet it is not a cautionary obligation. It is, however, certainly within the letter of the Statute of Frauds; yet the English courts have held it not within the meaning of that statute, and not to require writing to prove it. (See Couturier v Hastie, 8 Welsb. Hurl. and Gord. 40, 9 Ex. 102: In H. L. 25 L. J. Ex. 253; and other cases, infra.) On the other hand, take for example the obligation of a mandator pecuniæ credendæ—of him by whose order I have lent money to a third party;—his obligation to repay me creates a liability of precisely the same nature as a del credere agent's,—a liability to pay the debt of another, who is my principal debtor, if he at maturity fails to do so. This also is not a cautionary or accessory, but an original and independent obligation, as Pothier (ubi supra) clearly shows; and yet the English courts have held this obligation to fall within the Statute of Frauds, apparently because the mandator's promise is strictly and literally a 'promise to answer for the debt of another,' though it is difficult to assign any legal reason for excluding a del credere agent's obligation from the statute which would not be equally applicable to that of a mandator. (See e.g. Mowbray v Cunningham, where Lord Mansfield held this obligation not to be within the Statute of Frauds, as being an original and independent, and not a collateral or accessory obligation; but this was overruled in subsequent cases mainly on the words of the statute, taken literally. See Fell, p. 19; Matson v Wharram, 2 T. R. 80—per Buller, J.)

Consequently, while the English decisions often acutely mark the distinction between collateral or accessory obligations and original obligations, and supply us with valuable material for discriminating between cautionary obligations and obligations which are not truly so, we must beware of concluding in every case where they find an obligation to be within the Statute of Frauds, that they hold it to be what we should call a cautionary obligation. Our Act proceeds, not on the English plan of describing the operation of the obligations it applies to, but upon the plan of giving them their legal denominations—as 'cautionary obligation,' 'guarantee'—remitting us to other sources to find what precisely these denominations include. If the framers of the Act had taken care to use nothing by way of denomination which had not a precise legal definition—nothing which did not designate a specific and distinct kind of obligation of which the differentiæ are ascertained—there would have been no difficulty. As to 'guarantees' and 'cautionary obligations,' there can be no difficulty. But 'securities for another' is an unhappy phrase. 'Every contract of suretyship is substantially and in fact,' says Mr. Pitman (p. 2), 'a guarantee;' but it seems that in England the word 'guarantee' is chiefly applied to denote contracts of suretyship contained in writings not under seal. The other word, 'securities,' used in our Act, is much looser, and indeed not susceptible of any very precise legal definition at all. 'Securities made or granted by any person for any other person,' are words which may mean simply obligations for another, and yet even in this sense they do not define any specific kind of obligation for another; or they may refer to those cases where a personal obligation for another is coupled with a conveyance of some real or personal property in security thereof; or they may extend to a case which sometimes occurs (see e.g. Napier & Co. v Bruce, 1840, 2 D. 556; Pothier, Nantiss. secs. 7, 16), where a pledge of personal property is made by one person to secure a creditor against the default of another person, his debtor, but without any personal obligation on the pledger to answer for the debt. (Cautum intelligitur sive personis sive rebus cautum sit, L. 188, De V. S.; but there is no cautionary obligation in such a case between pledger and pledgee.) The subsequent phrase, 'person undertaking such guarantee, security, or cautionary obligation,' points to a personal obligation, and probably to an obligation ejusdem generis with guarantees and cautionary obligations,—an obligation subsidiary and accessory to, and corroborative of, some principal obligation which it secures. It is probably just equivalent to 'suretyship.' It cannot mean an independent obligation for a debt also due by another principal co-debtor; for one who grants such an obligation does not, in doing so, 'undertake a security,' as no man can be security in an obligation which is his own direct debt.

The word had better have been left out, as no doubt attempts will be made to bring in under it obligations which are not cautionary obligations or guarantees at all, as if it had been the intention of the Legislature to introduce into the law of Scotland not only the uncertainties of the English statute, but a good many others of which the English statute is not susceptible. Assuming, however, as there seems warrant for doing, that the Scotch Act applies only to PROPER CAUTIONARY OBLIGATIONS, we shall next indicate some of those cognate obligations which do not fall within this denomination, yet are apt to be confounded with obligations falling under it.

1. There must, in order to the existence of a cautionary obligation, be a lawful principal obligation, civil, or at least natural, on which it is dependent. (L. 478, D. de reg. Jur.; L. 16, sec. 3, D. de Fidejuss.; L. 70, sec. fin., D. d. t.; Pothier, Obl. sec. 366; L. 16, sec. 1, D. Ad. Scum Velleianum.) In Harris v Huntbach, which turned on the Statute of Frauds (1 Burr. 373), where a person engaged nominally as surety on behalf of an infant incapable of any liability for the debt—a loan—he was held to be substantially the only contracting party. Such a person knows that the other is not responsible, and his undertaking is therefore to be answerable at all events. 'There is no remedy against the infant,' it was argued. Therefore it is an original, not a collateral undertaking; and so the Court held it to be. The general principle deduced from this and similar cases by the English writers, is, that if the person undertaken for is not liable, owing to his incapacity to incur responsibility, the defendant's promise cannot be considered collateral, and so does not fall within the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds, nor would it apparently be within our Act. (Chitty, Cont. 45; Pitman, pp. 4-13; Story, Cont. p. 396; Theobald, p. 49; and the opinions of Bayley and Holroyd, J., in Edwards v Kelly, 6 M. and S. 204. See Pitman 13-14, and cases there.) Hence, query, if Lord Stair's doctrine (i. 17. 11) as to the liberation of cautioners by the nullity of the obligation of the principal who is a pupil or insane is sound; see Brodie's note, pp. 165-6. Many of the civilians put the principle on a broader basis than Voet (xlv. 1. 9 and 10), to whom Brodie refers. They say, that where one interposes for another, whom he knows to be incapable of obligation to the creditor, he must be held to have the intention of binding himself 'non tam ratione fidejussionis quam ratione suæ solius promissionis . . . eoque qui fidejussores dicuntur non tam fidejussores quam principales rei habendi sunt.' (See Bachovius ad Treutler, vol. ii. Dis. 28, Thes. 3, p. 444; Hunnius ad Treutl. Vol. Poster. Dis. 28. 3. 20, p. 877; Vinn. Comm. in Inst. p. 639, and the DD. quoted by them.) Pothier (Obl. sec. 393) tries to limit the cautioner's liability to those cases where there is a subsisting natural obligation, but overlooks the broader ground that his liability in such cases is not accessory at all. He seems to have been swayed by Cujas (see Pand. Justin. vol. iii. p. 331, notes 6 and 9), who, in common with the majority of the later doctors, perversely misinterpreted L. 25, Dig. de Fidejuss., which appears plainly to imply the doctrine of Harris v Huntbach, and was so understood by Accursius, Bartolus, and all the earlier doctors (see Bachov. ut supra). See also, on this subject, Shaw v Maxwell, M. 2074; Nimmo v Brown, M. 2076; Blackwood v Forbes, 10 D. 920; Johnston v Romano, M. 2076; Buchanan v Dickie, 1828, 6 S. 986; Kinghorn v Cle- land, M. 2075; Ewing v Malloch, 1 Fount. 132. Our early cases do not always hit the precise principle.

2. The principal may have been originally liable for the debt, and another may become liable for it, not as an adpromissor or cautioner, but as an expromissor; i.e. his obligation may be accepted by the creditor in room and discharge of the original debtor's obligation. (Vinn. Inst. pp. 637, 181; Smith, Merc. Law, p. 465.) He may have an action of relief against the original principal, yet he is not a cautioner quoad the creditor (Vinn. l.c.; Stair i. 17. 3), and his obligation will not be within the Mercantile Law Amendment Act. Whenever the new obligation extinguishes the prior one, it is held not to fall within the Statute of Frauds, and requires no writing. (See Fell, p. 16; Pitman, 13, 23; Theobald, 42; Chitty, 457; Lane v Burghart, 1 Q. B. 933; Goodman v Chase, 1 B. and Ald. 297; Reader v Kingham, 32 L. J. C. P. 108, and cases there.) So, an agreement to convert a separate debt into a joint debt is not within the Statute of Frauds, the effect of it being to create a new debt in consideration of the former being extinguished, and the two parties being co-principals therein. (Ex p. Lane, 1 De Gex 300.) So, where the original vendee of goods, contemplating inability to pay for them, transferred them with consent of the vendor to another, who verbally undertook to pay the price, the Statute of Frauds was held not to apply, there being no longer any principal obligation on the original buyer, and the second being liable only as for a new debt of his own, not for the other's former debt. (Browning v Stallard, 5 Taunt. 450. See Walker v Hill, 5 H. and N. 419; Brunton v Dullens, 1 F. and F. 450; Lacy v M'Neile, 4 D. and R. 7.)

3. A cautionary obligation, as accessory to another principal obligation, must arise ex eadem causâ with the principal obligation, and not from an independent cause of obligation, proper to the alleged cautioner himself. (See Poth. Oblig. sec. 446.) Wherever the obligation of a person for payment of a debt which is also due by another, arises from a cause or consideration passing between him and the creditor distinct from that of the principal or original debtor's liability, whether that distinct cause should have existed contemporaneously with, or have come into existence subsequent to, that of the principal debtor's liability, it is not cautionary. This liability may be contingent and conditional on the failure of the proper debtor to pay; the alleged cautioner may have the beneficium ordinis as a mandator pecuniæ credendæ and a del credere agent have; he may, like the mandator, be entitled to all the exceptiones in rem which the proper debtor has; he may be entitled, like him, to the beneficium cedendarum actionum;—yet, if his liability be founded on a consideration proper to himself, distinct from the cause of the demand which the creditor has against his proper debtor,—if he contract, in respect of this separate cause, to pay as on his own duty or obligation, and not merely as the surety of the other,—then his obligation is not a proper cautionary obligation, and is not within the Statute of Frauds or the Mercantile Law Amendment Act. In Castling v Aubert (2 East 325), the plaintiff, a broker, held policies of insurance under lien for indemnity against acceptances for his principal's accommodation. Defendant succeeded him in his agency, and required the policies, which plaintiff gave up on the defendant's verbal undertaking to indemnify him against the acceptances. Defendant pleaded the Statute of Frauds; but the Court unanimously held it not to apply. The defendant's undertaking liability was the price at which he purchased the plaintiff's waiver of his lien, and it was therefore an obligation of his own, rather than a promise to answer for the liability of his principal. As Lord Tenterden explains the case in Thomas v Williams (10 B. and C. 664), 'the defendant's promise was founded on a new consideration, distinct from the demand that the plaintiff had against the third person, although its performance would have the effect of discharging that demand and releasing that person.' So, in Williams v Leper, 3 Burr. 1886, a broker, about to sell a tenant's effects for behoof of creditors, gave a verbal obligation for the rent due by the tenant, to induce the landlord to waive his right of distress and lien over the effects, so as to allow the sale to proceed. The promise was held not within the statute. So, a debtor being arrested on a county court commitment (which does not discharge the debt like an arrest on a writ of capias), a verbal promise, in the nature of a bond of presentation, to redeliver the prisoner or pay the debt, was held, the prisoner having been released and not redelivered, nor the debt paid, not to require writing within the Statute of Frauds, the promise being for the promiser's own debt. Reader v Kingham, 32 L. J. C. P. 108. So Bampton v Paulin, 4 Bingh. 264; Barrell v Trussell, 4 Taunt. 117; Edwards v Kelly, 6 M. and S. 204; Anstey v Marden, 1 N. R. 127. So in the American case of Johnson v Gilbert, referred to by Cowen, J., in Woolff v Koppell, 5 Hill's N. Y. Reports 458. See Mallet v Bateman, 33 L. J. C. P. 243; notes to Forth v Stanton, 1 Wms. Saunders 210; Reid v Nash, 1 Wils. 305; Fitzgerald v Dressler, 29 L. J. C. P. 113, and cases there. Upon the same principle, it was decided that the undertaking of a factor or broker under a del credere commission, to answer to the principal for the solvency of the vendee or debtor with whom he deals on the principal's behalf, is not within the Statute of Frauds, and does not need proof by writing. In Grove v Dubois, 1 T. R. 112, Lord Mansfield and Buller, J., held it to be an absolute engagement, rendering the broker liable in the first instance; but in Morris v Cleasby (4 M. and S. 566), Lord Ellenborough corrected this idea, holding the liability conditional only on the vendee's failure to pay. (See also Hornby v Lacy, 6 M. and S. 166; Cumming v Forrester, 1 M. and S. 494; Baker v Langhorn, 6 Taunt. 519.) But though the broker has the beneficium ordinis, it does not follow, as Lord Ellenborough seems to hold, that therefore his obligation is one of guarantee or cautionry. On that opinion of Lord Ellenborough's, Mr. Theobald (p. 65) held that a del credere obligation was within the statute, and that it must be in writing. But it is not specifically a cautionary obligation or a guarantee: it is part and parcel of the contract of mandate which has intervened between him and his principal. Naturally, an agent is not liable for supervening insolvency, without negligence on his part; but it is not inconsistent with the nature of mandate, that the agent by special stipulation should charge himself with the extra risk of that or any casus improvisus not within his ordinary liability, just as he may by the same means exempt himself from liability for everything but fraud. (Poth. Mand. sec. 50; L. 39, D. Mand.) He may undertake that he will not contract on the principal's account with any one who shall not be absolutely solvent, and may thus relieve the principal from the onus of proving negligence or fault in any case. But still he remains merely a mandatory, and does not become a cautioner for the debtors with whom he may deal, any more than he does when his liability to answer for the insolvency of a person dealt with arises from his negligence or from fraud. His liability to the principal habet causam propriam different from the causa of the debtor's liability to the principal, which is what no proper cautionary obligation has. This is the view taken by the American judges in Swan v Nesmith (7 Pickering 220) and Woolff v Koppell (5 Hill's N. Y. Reports 458), in which it was held that the contract of a factor acting under a del credere commission is not within the Statute of Frauds. The very able judgment of Mr. Justice Cowen in the latter case, after referring to Castling v Aubert, etc., brings the matter to this, 'that all such contracts have an immediate respect to the agent's own duty or obligation. The debt of another comes in incidentally as a measure of damages,' i.e. his obligation habet causam propriam distinct from that of the other's obligation. His reasoning was entirely adopted by Parke, B., and the other judges of Exchequer, in Couturier v Hastie (8 Ex. 40); and they also put their judgment on the principle of Castling v Aubert, that the object of the extra commission being given was in consideration of greater care and greater responsibility, and though it may terminate in a liability to pay the debt of another, that is not the immediate object with which the consideration is given. (See observations on Couturier's case in Wickham v Wickham, 2 Kay and J. 478, and Mallet v Bateman, 33 L. J. C. P. 243.)

The same principle discriminates between the obligation of a cautioner and the obligation of a mandator pecuniæ credendæ, or, in other words, the obligation that results from a mandate to lend money. Lord Stair (i. 17. 3) refers to this as a method of constituting an improper kind of cautionry. Certainly nothing at first sight can look liker cautionry. But it is not cautionry; and as the principle will be found of practical value, it is proper carefully to develop it. When A gives a mandate to B to lend money or sell goods to C, A is the mandator pecuniæ credendæ (D. de Fidej. et Mand.): if B accept the order, there intervenes between A and B a regular contract of mandate, by force of which, when B executes the order, B as mandatory is bound, actione mandati directâ, to assign to A all that he as mandatory acquires ex causa mandati, and therefore to assign to A the action or claim which arises to him, B, from the loan or sale made to C in execution of A's mandate, as acquired by B ex causa mandati. On the other hand, A is obliged to B, actione mandati contrariâ, to reimburse and indemnify him in the sums which he has disbursed in execution of A's mandate, and so becomes answerable to B for the amount of that debt which C has contracted to B, by receiving the loan or purchasing the goods from B. Here there is a close resemblance to cautionry: as Lord Stair puts it,—'When the mandant giveth order or warrant to contract with any other party to that party's behoof, that party is the principal debtor, and mandant is cautioner' (i. 17. 3). But though both A's and C's obligations are for the same sum of money—the precise amount B has lent,—and though C owes it absolutely for himself, and A not so much for himself as for C, yet A's obligation is not a pure accession to C's: it has a cause different from C's obligation, viz. the contract of mandate which has intervened between A and B, which is not a mere accessory contract, as cautionry is. A is bound ex causa mandati; C, ex causa mutui or empti. A payment by A to B of the sum is not a payment of C's debt to B, but of his own proper debt, as mandator, to B. When a cautioner paid without requiring an assignation, the Roman lawyers held the debt as extinguished; for, being not a debt of the same thing, but the very same debt—the ipsissimum debitum of the principal debtor, to which the cautioner had only acceded—it was extinguished by the cautioner's payment. It only subsisted after the cautioner's payment, where non in solutum accepisset sed quodammodo nomen debitoris vendidisset creditor (L. 31, D. de fidej.; Poth. Obl. sec. 522), and the character of the transaction as a sale of the debt required therefore to belong to it ab initio; otherwise, if the money had been paid by the cautioner in solutum, the debt was gone, and no assignation would revive it ex intervallo. In Scotland, an assignation ex intervallo would generally avail, unless where there was a discharge of the debt itself, or the rights of third parties interfered. Yet see Garden v Gregory, 1735, M. 3390. But, on the other hand, the Roman jurists held that though the mandator, A, had repaid B, without any request for an assignation, or anything to make it a sale of the nomen debitoris, the payment did not extinguish the debt between B and C: it only extinguished A's own debt to B; and B remained, notwithstanding the payment, still creditor of C ex causa mutui, not indeed to the effect of being able to recover to his own profit, but to that of A, or to the effect of being able to assign his right of action to his mandant whenever he should require it (L. 28, D. de Mand.). Another difference, which would hold good with us, is, that the claim of B against A, arising strictly ex causa mandati, and not being founded on cautionry by A for the debt of C, would not fall under the septennial limitation of cautionary obligations. See Caves v Spence, 1742, M. 11021, a pure case of mandatum pecuniæ credendæ, where the septennial limitation was held not to apply. So, while C's debt might be lost by the triennial prescription, that would not, if there was no fault in B, extinguish B's claim against A as mandator, which is not liable to that prescription. But if A had been a cautioner, the extinction of C's debt to B by the prescription would necessarily extinguish A's, as being the identically same debt. Again, the duties as to preserving and ceding actions and securities, which B as mandator owes to A as mandant, are not precisely the same as they would be if B were creditor, and A a cautioner for C. (See, on this, Poth. Mand. sec. 47; Oblig. sec. 521.) As to what amounts to a mandatum pecuniæ credendæ, see Poth. Oblig. sec. 446; Stair i. 12. 2; Poth. Mand. secs. 15 and 16; L. 2, D. de Mand. As to the right of a mandator p. c. to the benefit of discussion, see Poth. Mand. secs. 70 and 84; Oblig. No. 440. If, then, claims of this kind are not cautionary obligations, they will clearly not fall within the 6th section of our Mercantile Law Amendment Act. Wilson v Ratray, 13 Jan. 1779, F. C., was a case of the kind, which the Court treated without doubt as a case of mandate. Still, the distinction between a cautionary obligation undertaken to the intending cautioner before the principal debtor's obligation is actually incurred, and a mandatum pecuniæ credendæ, may become very nice. Fidejussor et præcedere obligationem et sequi potest (Inst. iii. 21. 3); and, as Vinnius (Inst. p. 643) observes, 'Præcedens fidejussio mandato non absimilis est.' The distinction between a cautionary obligation undertaken for another after the debt was incurred, and a request by A to B to supply C with goods or money, coupled with a promise to pay if C did not, struck both Lord Mansfield and Buller, J., very forcibly. In Mow- bray v Cunningham (cited in Jones v Cooper, 1 Cowper 227, and by Buller, J., in Matson v Wharram, 2 T. R. 80), Lord Mansfield held that a promise made before the debt accrues was not within the statute; but in Jones v Cooper he said: 'There may be a nicety where the undertaking is before delivery, and yet conditional as this is.' (The verbal order was by defendant to plaintiff for goods to be furnished to Smith, accompanied by a verbal promise in these words, 'I will see you paid if Smith does not;' and Smith was made debtor in the plaintiff's books.) 'It turns singly upon the undertaking being to pay in case the other did not pay.' And the promise was held within the Statute of Frauds. But the obligation of a mandator pec. cred. is no less conditional on the failure of the principal debtor than a cautioner's obligation is, and the test decides nothing in this case. (Novell. iv. sec. 1; Poth. Oblig. sec. 446.) In Matson v Wharram, Buller, J., said that if this were a new case, his leaning would be against holding the statute applicable, but that it was too late to shake the authorities. See Birkmyr v Darnell, 1 Salk. 27, 2 Lord Raymond 1085; Anderson v Hayman, 1 H. B. 120; Pitman, p. 4, and cases there. But this is a point where we must remember the difference between the wording of the Statute of Frauds and of our statute. In any question under our Act, whether such a case is one of verbal precedens fidejussio or of mandate, two points will occur. 1. That in dubio the construction should be such ut res magis valeat quam pereat. 2. The analogy of the test employed by Pomponius in Dig. xvi. 3. 13 to decide between Deposit and Mandate—viz. which is the primus contractus? Till the goods are supplied there is no principal debt, and can be no cautionary obligation. The words quoted above from the Institutes must, as Vinnius observes, be understood 'ita tamen ut præcedens fidejussoris obligatio tum demum vires capiat quum et principalis obligatio, cujus illa accessio est, constituta est. Interim vero in pendente esse obligationem fidejussoris sciendum est.' Vid. Dig. v. 1. 35; Poth. Oblig. No. 399. So, in Jones v Cooper, it was urged that there was no debt under the promise until the goods were supplied, and a liability incurred by the principal debtor. An order given, though merely accepted and then neglected, might take effect as a mandate; but as no principal debt would exist till it was fulfilled, it could not till then take effect as cautionry. An obligation capable in its own nature of producing an effect before the existence of any principal debtor or principal obligation can hardly be cautionry. See Theobald, pp. 51–3; Pitman, pp. 4–8. See also Thomas v Cooke, 3 B. and C. 728—per Parke, B. As to the general rule of distinct consideration, see Parsons, Elem. Merc. Law, p. 74.

4. Correi or co-principals are not cautioners, even for the excess beyond their respective shares, but are only quasi cautioners in respect of their having similar rights of relief inter se, and a similar right to the beneficium cedendarum actionum. These rights of relief arise, not because they are cautioners, but on the various special grounds incident to the different transactions from which their liability arises. Thus, in the case of co-purchasers, joint-adventurers, etc., that one who has paid the whole has his action of contribution against the others ex socio. Where one only of the correi has received money, the others have relief against him ex mandato, or on the natural obligation of recompense (Poth. Oblig. sec. 282; Stair i. 8. 2–9), not because they are cautioners. The right to the beneficium cedendarum actionum arises to them and to cautioners from the same natural grounds of equity. Co-obligants bound in solidum are all directly and immediately, and in the first instance, bound to the creditor. Cautionary obligations are conditional on the failure of the principal debtor. The creditor may select any one of the correi to demand payment from him as if he were the only debtor. (Poth. Oblig. sec. 270.) It is settled in England that the Statute of Frauds applies only to engagements in which the promiser is liable conditionally on the default of some other person. (Story, Contr. sec. 861; Chitty, 455; Fell, p. 18.) So, by the law of Scotland, where the liability is not conditional on the failure of another, but immediately exigible, the obligation creating it is not a guarantee. (Wilson v Tait, 15 S. 221, H. L. 1 Rob. 137; Howison, M. 11030.) Where a party permits himself to be considered expressly as a joint-purchaser of goods which are intended for the sole use of another, his obligation—as not merely a collateral, but an original obligation—as, in short, that of a correus in solidum, and not of a cautioner—is not within the Statute of Frauds, even although the want of any real interest on his part in the purchase is known to the creditor at the time of the transaction. See the case of Scholes v Hampson & Merriot, reported by Mr. Fell, p. 27. There Hampson, an intending buyer, was refused goods on credit unless some one would be answerable for the payment. He brought to the sellers one Merriot, who was not, as they knew, connected with Hampson in business, and Merriot requested the seller to let Hampson have what cottons he might want, and agreed verbally that the credit should be given to them jointly, and the invoices were made out in their joint names as co-purchasers. The cottons were delivered to Hampson, who made part payments from time to time, and failed; and the action was against him and Merriot for the balance. Hampson let judgment go by default; the question was as to Merriot's liability. It was objected for him, that he was known not to be a partner, and was only a surety, and that his verbal obligation was, as for the debt of Hampson, void under the statute. But Chambre, J., overruled the objection, holding the case not within the statute, as an original and not an accessory obligation. It does not matter, as to the legal character of the obligation, what the relative liabilities of the parties inter se may be: if the obligation, as in a question with the creditor, is that of a direct obligant, the obligation is not cautionry; and 'the liability of such a contracting party is not affected by the creditor knowing that the debt is not the debt of such party, the creditor not having done anything which may operate as his discharge.' (Such notice only imposes the equitable duty on the creditor of doing nothing to impair his right of relief. Wythes v Labouchere, 3 De G. and J. 593; Pooley v Harradine, 26 L. J. Q. B. 156; Oakley v Pashetter, 4 Cl. and F. 207.) See per Lord Fullerton and the Lord Chancellor in Tait v Wilson, supra. The very definite distinction between cautioners and correi has been thrown into considerable confusion by the opinions of the judges of the Court of Session in Paterson v Bonar (1844, 6 D. 987) and Scottish Ins. Co. v Pringle (1858, 20 D. 465), from misapprehending, as it seems, the meaning of the House of Lords in Macartney v M'Kenzie, 5 Wils. and Sh. 504, who did not mean to say that correi expressly bound as such were sureties, but merely that they had the right of sureties in respect of the beneficium ced. actionum,—sureties only, in England, and not correi, having that right at Common Law (Pitman, p. 183), and the error of the Court below being, that they forgot that correi as well as cautioners by the Civil Law had that right. (Poth. Oblig. 520–523; L. 17, D. de fid.; L. 47, D. de Locat.; L. 95, sec. 11, D. de Solut.; Blackwood v Milne, 1752, M. 3396; Gilmour v Finnie, 11 S. 193.) The House of Lords merely set this error right: they could not mean anything so absurd as to confound the obligations of a correus and a cautioner as identical; but they spoke in the language of the English law, the precise effect of which the judges of the Court of Session (except Lord Medwyn) seem to have misunderstood.

5. To be a cautionary obligation, it must be for the whole or part of the same specific debt for which the primary obligation is undertaken (L. 9, t. 42, D. de fid.), and granted expressly to or in favour of the same person who is creditor in the primary obligation (L. 16, D. d. t.), otherwise it is not within the Statute of Frauds, nor will be within our Act. See Reid v Nash, 1 Wils. 305; Fish v Hutchinson, 2 Wils. 94; Williams v Leper, 3 Burr. 1809—per Aston, J.; Theobald, p. 40; Poth. Oblig. 368–9. So, if A is due B a sum, and B is due C another, and it is agreed between A, B, and C, that A pay C instead of B, and that shall discharge B's claim against A, the promise by A to pay to C is not within the Statute of Frauds; for it is a promise not to pay the debt due by B to C, but to pay his own debt, originally due to B, to C as delegated creditor. (Hodgson v Anderson, 3 B. and Cr. 842.) It is not cautionary, but delegation. So, a promise by one to pay the debt of another on the debtor's order, out of the debtor's own funds in the promiser's hands, is not cautionry, for the promiser undertakes no personal liability of his own for the debt. (Andrews v Smith, 2 Cr. M. and R. 627; Bird v Gammon, 3 Bingh. H. C. 883; Parkins v Moravia, 1 C. and P. 376; Dixon v Hatfield, 2 Bingh. 439.) So, a promise by A to B to pay a debt due by B to C, the promise not being made to C the creditor, but only to B the debtor, is not cautionry, nor within the Statute of Frauds. (Eastwood v Kenyon, 11 Ad. and E. 438; Hargreaves v Parsons, 13 M. and W. 561, 570; Dig. xlv. 16. 1; Reader v Kingham, 32 L. J. C. P. 108; Fitzgerald v Dressler, 29 L. J. C. P. 131.) In Reader v Kingham, the Court recognised the principle (doubted in some cases), that to bring a promise for the debt of another within the Statute of Frauds, the promisee must be the original creditor, or at least the promise must be made to his agent for his benefit; where made to a third person under circumstances in which there would be a jus quæsitum to the original creditor, a narrower question would arise. (See per Byles, J., in Reader v Kingham, supra; Finnie's case, 3 Macq. 75; Peddie v Brown, 3 Macq. 65; Stair i. 10. 5; Smith, M. L. p. 466, note (q).) Mr. Story (Contr. sec. 861, referring to American cases) is of opinion that a person may, by a transaction solely between him and another man's creditor, the debtor being ignorant or perhaps resisting, assume an original and not merely a collateral liability for the debt; and certainly an agreement to insure a debtor's solvency is of this nature, but it is founded on a distinct consideration. Where a creditor pays a cautioner a consideration for guaranteeing the solvency of his debtor, the contract is not properly cautionry, but insurance. (Pardessus, Droit Comm. sec. 585.) The insurer of a debtor's solvency differs from a cautioner in not undertaking any obligation 'for another:' he does not undertake the debtor's obligation, but one arising from a separate

SECTION IV.

OF BILLS OF EXCHANGE AND PROMISSORY NOTES.

Bills of exchange, inland bills, and promissory notes, the simplest of all obligations in form, and the least trammelled with solemnities, are, in respect of performance, the most strict, and in execution the most rapid, of all the obligations known in law. For although in England¹ there is not the same expeditious mode of obtaining payment of a bill as in the case of a bond, warrant of attorney, statute staple, or statute merchant; in Scotland, by means of a legislative provision of great simplicity, bills are enforced by every sort of diligence known to the law, without any necessity for a previous action, and in the most summary way possible.

These instruments may be regarded either as simple modes of constituting money obligations, or as methods of conveying or assigning debts, or as the great instrument of exchange in money transactions between one country and province and another. The only circumstance in their history which it is of much consequence to point out is, that as a branch of practical jurisprudence, or as a circulating medium in trade, bills of exchange were unknown to the Romans; that without their aid foreign trade cannot proceed to any great extent; and that this affords one of the best proofs of the remarkable difference between the state of trade in ancient and in modern times.

1. BILLS OF EXCHANGE are used for transmitting money from country to country, and for adjusting the exchange or differences in the value of the circulating medium of countries with each other, and the premium to be paid according to the balance of trade or the demand in the market for means of remittance. This is the proper mercantile instrument, governed by the general law-merchant, as involving the interests of persons resident in different countries. It is a billet or request in writing, addressed by a person, called the DRAWER, in one country, to his debtor, friend, or correspondent in another, called the DRAWEE; desiring him to pay to a third person, called the PAYEE or PORTEUR, on a particular day, or within a certain number of days, weeks, or months, or on the bill being presented to him, a particular sum. And this being presented to the person to whom it is addressed, and by him signed in token of his agreement or ACCEPTANCE of the order, it constitutes a debt against him in favour of the porteur or payee; completes the assignment of the sum due to the drawer in consideration. See Dig. 45, 116, where 'Paulus notat, non sunt duo rei Mævius et Titius (the debtor and the insurer) ejusdem obligationis; also 12. 1. 42. He has no relief against the debtor, as he does not engage ex mandato of the debtor. He can only recover as assignee of the creditor, who is bound ex æquitate to assign: he has the beneficium cedendarum actionum. He can plead against the creditor all the exceptiones in rem the debtor can plead: his obligation depends on the subsistence of an obligation on the debtor. But still these things, though common to cautionry, do not make insurance cautionry. Whether an obligation, conditional on the debtor's failure, and founded on no separate consideration proper to the promiser, would be considered as not cautionry, because not interposed ex mandato of the debtor, express or implied, but solely at the request of the creditor, is inter apices juris.

6. A proper cautionary obligation must be conditional on the failure of the principal debtor, and not prestable independently of his failure. See Poth. Oblig. sec. 372; Tait v Wilson, 1836, 15 S. 221, H. L. 1 Rob. 137.

7. A person who enters into an undertaking for and on behalf of and as taking burden on himself for another, does not thereby undertake a cautionary obligation. Pardessus, Droit Commenc. vol. ii. p. 94, sec. 586; vol. i. p. 169. His obligation is a principal obligation. If the person for whom burden is taken adopts the obligation, the person taking the burden is not liable, as a cautioner would be, for the subsequent failure by the other to fulfil it. See Gray v Hutton, M. 2270. But Maxton v Crs. of Mackintosh, M. 2133, and Keir v Ferguson, 3 Br. Sup. 435, seem to have confounded this obligation with cautionry; at least the specialties in the cases are not sufficient to sustain the judgments. See also Bushell v Beavan, 1 Bingh. N. C. 103; and the observations of Lee, J., in Gordon v Martin, Fitzgib. 302, 2 Barnard 13, Fell 30, Pitman 16; Gregory v Williams, 3 Meriv. 582.

See further, on what is and what is not a collateral promise in reference to the Statute of Frauds, sec. 4—Fell, pp. 9–34; Theobald, pp. 1–5, and 36–65; Pitman, pp. 2–26; Leake on Contr. 126–30; Chitty, Contr. 462–9; Parsons' Contr. vol. ii. pp. 9–12, vol. iii. 19–27; Parsons' Elem. Merc. Law, pp. 72–5.]

favour of the payee; and has the effect of transmitting the money as if it had been sent by a carrier, and lodged in the hand of the person drawn upon, for the use of him in whose favour the bill is drawn.

[387] 2. After such bills had been in use for some time, and dealers had become familiarized with the use of them, the INLAND BILL¹ seems to have been introduced upon the same model. This instrument is designed for making those payments of the price of commodities sold in the inland trade of a country which it is convenient so to settle, with an allowance of the usual credit, or delay of payment given to dealers in that particular article. Here there are properly only two parties, the seller and the buyer; though a payee is often introduced as in the proper bill of exchange. The former addresses his request or bill to the latter, desiring him to pay the price at a precise day; the latter signs the bill in token of his acceptance. And the bill so completed remains in the repositories of the seller, or is assigned over by endorsement, under the proper discount, in payment of debt or for ready money; and if not paid on the day of payment, it may be put to immediate execution. This instrument furnishes so easy a mode of settling debts and constituting a transmissible obligation, that it has gradually come to be used in all sorts of transactions, whether connected with trade or not.

3. Last of all, though the simplest in form, came PROMISSORY NOTES, which are more strictly appropriate to the purpose of constituting a debt, or settling the price of a commodity bought on credit, or adjusting and reducing to a transmissible form the balance of an account between dealers. Here the debtor, called the MAKER of the note, promises on a particular day, or within a certain time, to pay to the creditor by name a certain sum. This is the form in which bank-notes are conceived, with this difference, that they are made payable to the bearer.²

In the history of bills in England, as well as in Scotland, this progress may be distinguished.³ The privilege of endorsation, by which the usefulness of bills and notes is

² [Besides bills and notes, there is another form of order to transfer money, viz. bank checks. These are orders addressed to a banker to pay a certain sum to the bearer of the check. There is no day of payment, the order being general; and the presumption of knowledge of dishonour applicable to ordinary bills taken by an endorsee after the day of payment, is not held to apply to one receiving a check after its date, though that may be a circumstance to weigh with a jury in evidence. Rothschild v Corney, 9 Barn. and Cress. 390, Bell's Pr. sec. 308. Some points of chief importance in relation to bank checks are now regulated by statute. And first, in consequence of the decisions of the courts holding bankers responsible in the case of payment of a check drawn payable to order on a forged endorsation, a clause was inserted in a Stamp Act, 16 and 17 Vict. c. 59, enacting, 'That any draft or order drawn upon a banker for a sum of money payable to order on demand, which shall when presented for payment purport to be endorsed by the person to whom the same shall be drawn payable, shall be a sufficient authority to such banker to pay the amount of such draft or order to the bearer thereof; and it shall not be incumbent on such banker to prove that such endorsement, or any subsequent endorsement, was made by or under the direction or authority of the person to whom the said draft or order was or is made payable either to the drawer or any endorser thereof' (sec. 19). The risk of loss in case of a check being stolen or fraudulently appropriated being thus thrown upon one of the other parties, a practice was established amongst merchants of writing the name of the banker of the payee, or the symbol '— and Co.,' across the face of the check, to signify that the banking firm drawn on should only pay the order to the payee's banker, or to or through some banker, according to the form of the direction. In a case where a crossed check was stolen, and the words 'and Co.' erased by the thief, and the check was paid, the banker was held free from responsibility. But now, by 21 and 22 Vict. c. 79, the crossing of a banker's check (as defined in sec. 1 of the Act) is held to import a restrictive direction to the effect that the banker upon whom such check or draft shall be drawn, shall not pay the same to any other than the person with whose name such check is crossed, or where no name is inserted to any other than a banker. Sec. 2 enables the lawful holder of a check to cross it in the usual way, or to insert the name of a banker in the blank before the words 'and Co.' By sec. 4, the banker is not to be responsible for paying a check which does not plainly appear to have been crossed, or to have been obliterated or altered, unless he shall have acted malâ fide, or been guilty of negligence.]

³ See Bayley on Bills of Exchange, p. 1; 9 and 10 Will. III. c. 17; 3 and 4 Anne, c. 9.

In Scotland, 1681, c. 20, giving the privilege of summary execution to foreign bills of exchange; 1696, c. 36, extending the privilege to inland bills; 12 Geo. III. c. 72, extending the privilege to promissory notes, made perpetual by 23 Geo. III. c. 18, sec. 55. ['Although a promissory note, while in its infinitely increased, followed in the same order, being first admitted in bills of exchange, taken to order; afterwards to bills of exchange, even without being taken to order; afterwards to inland bills; and finally to promissory notes.

Bills and notes are mercantile instruments. They are on that account exempted from the more cumbrous forms of authentication necessary in common deeds. But the greater danger of forgery to which they are thus exposed ought to be counterbalanced, by requiring the strictest conformity to such requisites as law and mercantile custom have established in respect to their constitution.

The two great privileges of bills and notes are summary execution and transmission by endorsement. And in respect to both of them, it is important to keep strictly to the forms and evidence which correctly belong to the instrument.

1. In England, payment of bills is enforced only by means of an action. In Scotland, as already explained,¹ a summary process by registration of the protest, having the bill prefixed, is competent any time within six months; an extract of which contains a warrant for issuing the king's letters of horning, which is followed by caption. In cases where the interposition of a judge is required to settle any debateable point, the person against whom the diligence is issued may apply to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills for suspension of the diligence. On cause shown, and on a cautionary obligation being lodged in court (see above, p. 401), execution will be suspended, to the effect of having the matter tried in court. To entitle a bill or note to the privilege of summary execution, it must be without any vitiation or taint apparent on the face of it; and the subscriptions of the parties must [388] be regular and full subscriptions: for although subscription by initials has sometimes been sustained as sufficient constitution even of money obligations, bills so signed are not legal grounds for warrants of summary diligence.

2. The power of transmitting such an instrument by ENDORSATION confers on it great value as a medium of circulation in trade. But this extraordinary facility ought to be confined to proper bills and notes made in correct form.

The ease with which money transactions may be conducted by means of bills and notes, has induced persons to adopt those instruments in the constitution of ordinary money obligations. And although, at first, the courts of law hesitated whether to give sanction to this introduction of mercantile facilities into ordinary transactions unconnected with trade,² it is now settled that there is no distinction in the law of bills and notes, on account of the parties or the transaction not being connected with trade. The law of England and of Scotland in relation to this most useful instrument is now the same, with such slight varieties in practice and operation as necessarily arise from the different systems of judicial proceeding.³

SUBSECTION I.—OF THE FORM AND REQUISITES OF BILLS AND NOTES, AND OF OBJECTIONS APPEARING EX FACIE.

In considering bills and notes,⁴ the first particular to be examined is the form and external appearance of the instrument. But it is an important observation to be kept in mind, that in bankruptcy the debt is to be distinguished from the instrument.

original shape, bears no resemblance to a bill, yet when endorsed it is exactly similar to one, for then it is an order by the endorser of the note upon the maker to pay to the endorsee. The endorser is, as it were, the drawer; the maker the acceptor; and the endorsee the payee.' Sm. Merc. Law, 7th ed. 204.]

² Sarsfield v Witherly, Carth. 82.

³ Since the former edition of this work, there has been published a very good and useful treatise on the Law of Bills of Exchange, Promissory Notes, etc., in Scotland, by Robert Thomson, Esq., advocate. In that work all the cases, English and Scottish, which have been determined on this important subject are digested with great conciseness; and the doctrine, with the distinctions and peculiarities of the law of the two countries, very ably and clearly stated.

⁴ [As to the peculiar rules relating to bankers' notes, see Sm. Merc. Law, 7th ed. p. 219.]

1. Where independently of the instrument there is a debt, it may be claimed and established notwithstanding any objection fatal to the bill. Of this, usury affords an example: the bill may be null under the statute, as usurious; but the debt may notwithstanding be proved by evidence of goods furnished or money paid.¹ So, a bill that is vitiated is good for nothing; but the debt may be proved independently of it.² So also, a bill which has fallen by the sexennial prescription is utterly gone;³ but the debt may be established by other proofs. But,

2. Where the debt exists only by force of the instrument, an objection fatal to the bill seems to annihilate the claim.⁴ This rule seems to apply to an accommodation bill, to which the bankrupt has put his name as cautioner for him for whose use the money was borrowed.

The external requisites of a bill may be referred to the form of words used, the paper on which it is written, the genuineness of the subscriptions, the authenticity of the written instrument itself, or the subsistence of the obligation.

I. FORM OF BILLS AND NOTES.—No particular form is necessary.⁵ Provided the words amount to an undertaking, obligation, or promise absolutely to pay a precise sum of money at a definite time, it is a good note or bill.⁶ A note or bill cannot be drawn conditionally, [389] to the effect of enjoying the privileges of a bill, though when holograph it may constitute a good voucher of debt. It must also be for money, and not for commodities;⁷ and so strictly has this been adhered to in England, that a note payable in money, 'or Bank of England notes,' was held null.⁸

Where there are words added to the obligatory clause of a bill which qualify its terms, and make the bill conditional, they will destroy it as a bill; but where the words are explanatory merely, and touch not the essence of the obligation, they will not have this effect. So, words importing a discharge when paid, do not hurt the bill;⁹ so of a bill addressed to one as cautioner.¹⁰ Finally, a clause of interest does not vitiate the bill; so it has always been held in England.¹¹ On this point there was a great vacillation in the earlier decisions of the Court of Session; but the judges in the latest case recorded repelled

The following illustrations are taken from Smith, Merc. Law, 7th ed. p. 205:—(1.) An acknowledgment of debt followed by the words 'to be paid,' whether on demand or on a specified day, held to constitute a note, in Cashborne v Dutton, Selw. N. P. 8th ed. 371, and Brooks v Elkins, 2 M. and W. 74; and see Wheatley v Williams, 1 M. and W. 533; Ellis v Mason, 7 Dowl. 578. (2.) 'At twelve months after date I promise to pay R. & Co. £500, to be held by them as a collateral security for moneys now owing them by J. M., which they may be unable to receive on realizing the securities they now hold, and others which may be placed in their hands by him;' Robins v May, 11 Ad. and E. 213. The two last-mentioned documents were held to be of the nature of guarantees.]

⁶ The statute 17 Geo. III. c. 30, made perpetual by 27 Geo. III. c. 16, providing that bills and notes under £5 shall specify the name and place of abode of the payee, and be attested by a subscribing witness, and be made payable within twenty-one days, is an English Act not applicable to Scotland. this objection to a bill, moved by the general understanding and practice of merchants regarding the stipulations of interest on bills.¹

The material parts of a bill or note are: the date, at least where that date in any degree regulates the term of payment;² the term of payment; the sum; the name and address of the payee; the name and address of the person drawn upon. These must be clear, correct, and intelligible, in order to entitle the instrument to the summary execution of a proper bill or note.

II. STAMP.—The bill or note must be written on the proper stamp required by law; and it is peculiar to those stamps, that they cannot be affixed, nor, on pretence of mistake, an erroneous stamp corrected, after the bill or note is written. But on this subject reference may be made to what has already been said concerning the stamp laws.³ The consent of the parties will not remove the objection on the stamp laws.

III. SUBSCRIPTION.—A bill of which the signature is forged is no legal ground of action or of diligence, and will not sustain a claim in bankruptcy.⁴ But if one have given sanction and currency to acceptances or endorsements forged by a particular person, as binding on him, he will be liable as having adopted that subscription, and authorized it as his own;⁵ and it would seem that not only action, but summary diligence, may proceed on such a bill, the plea of forgery being effectually met by that of adoption and virtual procuration.⁶

Bills and notes can be effectually drawn, accepted, or endorsed, only by the subscription of the name of the person so drawing, accepting, or endorsing, or by the subscription [390] of a procurator authorized by him. But sometimes illiterate persons become parties to such instruments; and it is necessary to observe how they may effectually bind themselves. In strict law, no bill ever ought to have been sanctioned under any other than the full legal subscription. But considerations of hardship, grounded on a prevailing usage with illiterate persons to sign bills and notes by the initials of their names, and even by marks, and the want of a due discrimination between the admission of such writings as documentary evidence, and the sustaining of them as bills, have led to great confusion in this matter.

1. The subscription of the initials of the parties is not effectual to constitute a bill; but if it appear from the instrument that it was signed before witnesses, an action, or on bankruptcy a claim of debt, will be sustained on evidence, first, of this being the customary mode of subscribing used by the party; and, secondly, that the initials actually were subscribed by him.⁷ Such instruments, however, are properly to be considered as evidence only of simple contracts or obligations, not as bills. They cannot authorize summary execution, because they require extrinsic proof of their authenticity; differing in this respect from forged bills (see above), as showing their defect ex facie.⁸

In one case in Scotland, bills had been to a great extent, and during a considerable course of time, accepted by a forged signature, and at last the forger absconded. In answer to the plea of forgery, it was attempted to make out a case of currency given by acquiescence on the part of the person whose name was forged; and the proof which was chiefly relied on was the notice sent to him as endorser, intimating the dishonour of the bills. But it appeared that the forger had always contrived to intercept the letters, and provide for the bills, so that it was not possible to establish acquiescence against the person whose name had been forged. The action of course failed. Park's Representatives.

2. Neither will a bill signed by a mark be sustained as a ground of diligence,¹ though it may be received as an adminicle of documentary proof in an action.²

If a person sign his name upon a blank paper stamped with a bill stamp, he will be held the drawer or acceptor, as it may be, of any bill which shall afterwards be written above his name to the sum of which the stamp is applicable.³ These in trade are called skeleton bills, and are too frequently in use.

The same rule is applicable to those cases in which, intentionally, or even by carelessness, drawers or acceptors allow a bill to be so altered as to deceive third parties into a belief of their having signed a bill to a greater extent than the actual amount of the original instrument. Where a blank, total or partial, is left in a bill, or the sum is so written as to be capable of alteration without detection, the parties will be liable to summary diligence by the bill-holder. This proceeds not on the principle of mandate, but on the obligation to indemnify loss occasioned by fault or negligence; the fault or negligence being a good answer to the plea of interpolation. And so, if the falsification is so clumsy as not to deceive a person of ordinary vigilance, the exception will be good.⁴

[391] Bills blank in the drawer's or payee's name were formerly held to fall under the Act relative to blank writs; 1696, c. 25. But the view now taken is, that this statute does not apply to the case of bills; and that the acceptance is an undertaking to pay the person who shall have right to the document, like a note payable to bearer.⁵ On this ground even an executor has been allowed, after the death of the drawer, to sign a blank bill found in his repositories, and raise diligence on it.⁶ See below, p. 421.

IV. VITIATIONS AND ALTERATIONS.—Alterations or erasures of bills and notes in material parts, without consent of the parties, are fatal, independently of the objection on the stamp laws. Thus, the alteration of the date of the bill was held to annul the bill.⁷ An alteration initials, and with the subscription of witnesses, was held insufficient to authorize summary diligence.

² Cockburn v Gibson, 8 Dec. 1815, 19 Fac. Coll. 47. Here a bill signed by a mark before witnesses was held not to authorize summary diligence; but the debt not being denied, decree was given in an ordinary action, which had been raised and pursued at the same time with the charge on the bill. [See, as to subscription by mark or initial letters, Dickson on Evidence, secs. 667, 784.]

Little & Co. v Muir, 23 Feb. 1803. A bill in similar circumstances was in Scotland held to be binding, first by Lord Meadowbank, and afterwards by the Court. The plea chiefly relied on was the prohibition of blank writs by 1696, c. 25. But this plea was repelled.

[Grasswick v Farquharson, 1846, 8 D. 1073. Such bills held to be a warrant for summary diligence in Cameron v Morrison, 1869, 7 Macph. 382.]

⁴ Compare Scacchia, Tr. de Comm. sec. 2, gl. 5, quæst. 15, with Pothier, Tr. du Cont. de Change, vol. ii. p. 134.

The decisions of the Court of Session have proceeded on the principles so well laid down by Pothier.

Pagan & Hunter v Wyllie, 1793, M. 1660, where the bill was for eight pounds, but room enough left to convert the eight into eighty-four. It was held binding on the acceptor to the full extent.

Graham v Gillespie, 1795, M. 1453, Bell 105, where an opportunity occurred for drawing the distinction. A bill for £58 having been written out with a blank at the place of the stamp, an opportunity was given to fill up the sum of 'four hundred and' before the words 'fifty-eight,' so as to make the bill appear a fair bill for £458. Another bill was manufactured in nearly similar circumstances, but so clumsily that it was palpable at first sight. Both bills had been discounted by the Thistle Bank of Glasgow. The Court sustained the former, and found the latter ineffectual.

⁶ This was first determined in the negative. Robertson & Ross v Bissets, 1777, M. 1676.

But in 1801 the point was solemnly decided in favour of the representative. Fair v Cranston, 1801, M. 1677.

And afterwards, the Court would not even hear an argument, lest they should seem to unsettle the point. M'Donald's Trs. v Rankin, 13 June 1817, 19 Fac. Coll. 351.

⁷ Murchie v M'Farlane, 1796, M. 1458. The date was here altered from 7th to 17th June. The effect was to prolong the credit.

In England, the case of Master v Miller, 4 Term. Rep. 320, 2 H. Blackst. 141, was of the same complexion. Sm. Merc. Law, 7th ed. 274. The bill was originally dated 26th March, and was afterwards, in the hands of the payees, altered to on the term of payment, from payable at sight to payable one day after date,¹ was also [392] held to annul the bill. An alteration of the sum was held fatal:² the substitution of another drawer³ or endorsee is also fatal.⁴ As to vitiation of receipts on the back, see case below.⁵

Where the alteration is not material, as not on an essential part of the instrument, or merely to correct a mistake, and in furtherance of the original intention, it will not invalidate the bill: thus, to add to order where omitted,⁶ or to convert a promissory note into a bill in conformity with the original agreement,⁷ or to adjust the date as at first intended.⁸

Walton v Hastings, 4 Camp. 223. In England, bill held null for alteration of date from 5th to 10th July.

¹ See Murdoch, Robertson, & Co. v Lee, Rodger, & Co. In this case, an acceptance of £1000 having been given for the purpose of liquidating a balance due on a banker's account, it was, when due, renewed for the principal sum and interest. It was allowed to lie over for some years as the voucher of the debt due; and the cashier of the bank, when he came to demand payment, finding it payable on demand, altered it to payable one day after date, merely to preserve interest. The Court, taking the whole case into view, pronounced judgment, in an action grounded on this bill, for a sum equivalent to the amount of the original bill and interest. 11 Feb. 1800.

In the House of Lords the matter was taken more strictly; and the action as grounded on the bill dismissed, 'but without prejudice to the pursuer's bringing any action on or in respect of the original bill for £1000 granted by Lee, Rodger, & Co., as effectually as if they had amended their libel according to a permission granted by the Court of Session so to do. The Lord Chancellor on this occasion said, that had an action been brought in England upon the second bill, it would have been sufficient, laying all the other circumstances of the case out of consideration, to have stated that the bill, in consequence of the alteration, was not the contract of the parties; that the alteration of that bill (a voluntary if not a criminal act of the pursuer) had annihilated it, and it could not be restored or made a ground of demand.' 26 Dec. 1801, 4 Pat. 261.

[Among modern instances of what is held to be a material alteration, see Mason v Bradley, 11 M. and W. 590, where the name of one of the makers of a promissory note was cut off; Warrington v Early, 2 El. and Bl. 763, where the addition was of the words 'interest at six per cent. per annum' in the corner of a note for the payment of a sum 'with lawful interest'; Birchfield v Moore, 3 El. and Bl. 683, where a place of payment was added to the acceptance, and the acceptor was held not to be liable even to a bona fide holder for value; and Hirschfeld v Smith, 1 L. R. C. P. 340, where an addition was made of the rate of exchange at which a bill drawn on Paris was to be paid. If the alteration be material, it makes no difference that it would operate, if at all, to the benefit of the maker. Gardner v Walsh, 5 El. and Bl. 83, overruling Catton v Simpson, 8 Ad. and El. 136, 1 Smith L. Ca. 6th ed. 832. As regards alterations affecting the statement of consideration or value, a distinction has been suggested which we think sound in principle, viz. that the addition of a consideration where none was expressed is not material, but that an alteration of words importing value received or consideration, so as to express a new or different consideration, is a material alteration. See the cases in Smith, ubi supra.]

In Scotland, Henderson v Hay, 1802, M. 17059. Bill dated October 1799; time of payment made March 1780; altered to what was obviously meant 1800. Sustained.

It is scarcely necessary to state cases, to show the different circumstances in which the consent of the parties will be held as established; but if the alteration is made by the whole parties, or with their full consent, it will be effectual, provided the stamp laws are not violated; and on that ground, perhaps, such a case as that of Bryce may admit of reconsideration.¹

The place of payment of a bill is material in many respects; and where there is an alteration of the instrument so as to add a place of payment in the body of the bill,² or to add a place of payment to the effect of making qualified an acceptance originally quite general,³ or otherwise to convert a general acceptance into a qualified acceptance,⁴ or [393] to substitute a place of payment for that mentioned in the original acceptance,—these will be held as material alterations.

SEXENNIAL PRESCRIPTION.—In Scotland within these fifty years, a limitation of bills and notes has been introduced by statute.⁵ The Act declares, 'That no bill of exchange, inland bill, or promissory note, shall be of force, or effectual to produce any diligence or action, in that part of Great Britain called Scotland, unless such diligence shall be raised, or action commenced thereon, within the space of six years from and after the term at which the sums in the said bills or notes become exigible.' But it is provided, 'That it shall and may be lawful and competent, at any term after the expiration of the said six years, in either of the cases before mentioned, to prove the debts contained in the said bills and promissory notes, and that the same are resting owing, by the oath or writ of the debtor' (secs. 37, 39).

1. The term of six years runs from the last day of grace in bills payable at a fixed term.⁶

2. If the bill be payable on demand, it has been held to be due, and the six years to run from the date of the bill.⁷ The expression in the Scottish statute, 'from the term at which the sums in the note or bill become exigible,' has been held to support the above construction. In England it seems to be held otherwise; a bill payable on demand not giving 'cause of action' till a demand is made.⁸

3. If payable at sight, it is exigible only when it shall have been presented; and there-

In a subsequent case, Fairweather v Alison, 12 Feb. 1817, 19 Fac. Coll. 289, a bill, of which the term of payment was altered by the acceptor in accepting it, was sustained against the representative of the acceptor after his death.

[See King v Creighton, 1841, 4 D. 62, 2 Bell 81. Even if the alteration be made with the consent of all the parties interested, still, if the alteration is material, it creates a new contract, and the bill is liable to objection on the stamp laws. As to what alterations are material in a question of sufficiency of stamp, see 1 Smith L. Ca. 6th ed. 833.]

See Rex v Treble, 2 Taunt. 328; Saunderson v Bowes, 14 East 500, Sm. M. L. 274.

'An acceptance is a material part of a bill of exchange, and may be either general or special. By a general acceptance, the acceptor undertakes to pay the bill at any place where he may be called upon. By a special acceptance, he undertakes to pay at the place named in the bill. This alteration made it a special acceptance.' Bayley, J., thought this a material alteration, 'for it might subject the party to some inconvenience. The holder would present the bill at bank, where of course, under these circumstances, it would be dishonoured; and he might then, after sending by the post notice of the dishonour, immediately sue out a writ and arrest the acceptor.' Mr. Selwyn has quoted a case as establishing a different fore prescription will run only from the presenting.¹ Whether the day of presentment or the last day of grace is the period a quo in such a case, is doubtful. See below, Of Presentment.

4. To preserve the bill from prescription, it is not sufficient to protest the bill, or even to register the protest. There must be within the six years a demand, either, 1. By legal diligence executed;² or, 2. By judicial process raised by the creditor; or by judicial demand, i.e. by an action, neither blank in the summons,³ nor informal;⁴ or by the production of the grounds of debt, and the entry of a claim in a ranking and sale;⁵ or by claiming in a sequestration; or, generally, by claiming in a multiplepoinding, or any other process of competition. Action of suspension by the debtor has not been held to stop the prescription of a holograph bond,⁶ and the analogy seems to hold as to bills.⁷ Judicial proceedings have been held necessary, notwithstanding outlawry.⁸

5. There is a difference between the Scottish prescription of bills and the limita- [394] tion of the English law. By the words of the Scottish Act, the bill is annihilated as a ground of diligence or action, and the proof of the debt confined to writ or oath. In England the limitation may be discharged by any acknowledgment of the debt, even the slightest, and by parole.⁹

According to the words of the Act, there cannot in Scotland, after the expiration of six years, be any action grounded on the bill or note itself. In any action for payment after that time, the debt ought to be libelled: yet this strictness of judicial proceeding has not always been required so rigidly as it ought to have been. The law correctly appears to be, 1. That although the bill may be produced in the way of adminicle or documentary evidence, the proof on which alone judgment can proceed is the writ or oath of the debtor. 2. That if an action is laid on a bill or note after the term of prescription has expired, decree pronounced in absence strictly ought to afford no legitimate ground of adjudication or other diligence; and the debtor should be entitled, without caution or consignment, to suspension of a charge on such a decree. 3. That a reference to oath on such a libel is not, strictly speaking, a reference of the debt; but in the relaxed method of libelling actions in the Court of Session, it has been held an effectual reference to sustain decree.¹⁰ The most important question connected with this point relates to the engagement of one who, as surety for the person truly indebted, becomes a party to a bill or note; and there may seem to be room for distinguishing two cases. 1. Where two or more persons engage as debtors in a bill, without the creditor being aware of the one being the principal, the others cautioners, it has been held not to be enough for one, on a reference to oath, to swear that the money was not received by him, his interference being only as cautioner, and depending on the mere act of his subscription of the document now extinct and annihilated.¹¹ 2. ¹⁰ Laidlaw v Hamilton, 1826, 4 S. 636, N. E. 644. Here the libel was on a bill of £220, dated 24th January 1814. The bill was prescribed. A reference was sustained, and the deposition was, that the bill had been signed by Hamilton, but only as cautioner, and he had never received value. The judges were divided in opinion: some holding that the libel was incorrect, and the debt consequently not established by the oath; the majority, that the bill was only demonstrative of the question whether the debt expressed in the bill was owing, and so the oath intelligible and relevant. [See Christie v Henderson, 1833, 11 S. 744; Paxton v Forster, 1842, 4 D. 1515; Wood v Howden, 1843, 5 D. 507; Darnley v Kirkwood, 1845, 7 D. 595.]

¹¹ Philp v Milne, 1800, M. App. Bill of Ex. No. 9. Here a bill in the hands of an onerous endorsee was prescribed; but the creditor is aware of the engagement being merely as surety, it may be contended, that the co-obligant being not properly debtor, but only engaging as surety, and by a limited obligation, the duration of his responsibility must be measured by the natural course of the engagement, while the creditor cannot rely on any more extended obligation. But the Court has not sanctioned this distinction. In several cases the same rule has been applied which decided the questions with onerous endorsees.¹

[395] 6. It is held in England, that as payment by one of several obligants in a bill is payment for all, so admission by one is admission by all, and the law raises the promise to pay where the debt is admitted to be due.² This is not law in Scotland.³

In Scotland it has been decided, that decree taken within the six years against one of several joint acceptors of a bill, 'interrupts the prescription as to all of them.'⁴

7. No document on the bill or by relative writing will preserve the bill in force, or in strict terms interrupt the prescription. It can have the effect only of establishing the debt itself. But, 1. As this, like the other short prescriptions, is grounded on the presumption of payment, it will not avail the creditor that there is on the back of the bill a marking of a partial payment, or of the payment of interest within the six years; for these do not exclude the presumption that payment was made before the bill was discharged by operation of the Act, in consequence of the expiration of the term.⁵ 2. Such markings, provided they are in the debtor's handwriting, on the very last day of the six years,⁶ or after the expiration of the term,⁷ are bars to the plea of prescription; or rather, proofs of the subsistence of the debt. 3. It seems to follow that such proofs ought not to suffer the limitation proper to a bill; but the Court has considered such a constitution of the debt by relation to the bill, as subject to a prescription as short as that of the original bill.⁸

9. The years of minority of the holder are not computed in the six years (sec. 40 of the Act 12 Geo. III. c. 72).

the joint acceptor, though he had interposed as cautioner merely, not pretending that the bill was paid, but defending merely on the ground of the annihilation of the bill, and the necessity of proving a debt against him. The Court seem to have taken (if the report is accurate) an incorrect view of the law,—'the general opinion being, that the bill was as much due now as on the day it was accepted; and that it was not a relevant defence that it was originally granted without value.'

Gibson v Forrester, 8 June 1820, F. C. Here the case was decided by the Lord Ordinary on the precedent of Philp's. But the Court distinctly placed it on this footing, that proof of the subsistence of the debt was required; and although there was no reference to oath, the want was supplied by special defences, which, as a judicial admission, were held equivalent to oath; and that the import of this defence was an admission of the debt.

See cases, next note.

¹ M'Neil v Blair, 1825, 3 S. 459, N. E. 319. Blair, with the full knowledge of the creditor, became surety for Jeffrey, by subscribing as acceptor of a bill. At the distance of more than six years an action was raised, and the debt was referred to Blair's oath, who swore to the bill having been signed by him as cautioner, with the knowledge of the creditor. The Court held Blair liable, and that his obligation was not limited by the sexennial prescription. This case was appealed, and compromised, by a great sacrifice on the part of M'Neil.

The Court (Lord Mansfield, and Willis, Ashurst, and Buller, J.) held them all liable.

So, in Jackson v Fairbank, 2 H. Blackst. 340, the payment of a dividend by the bankrupt estate of one of the obligants in a note was held such an acknowledgment as to take the case out of the statute as to the other.

See also Ferguson v Bethune (above, note 5); though, as to this point, that case is not reported with sufficient precision to be entirely satisfactory.

SUBSECTION II.—OF THE DRAWING, ACCEPTANCE, AND ENDORSEMENT OF BILLS AND NOTES.

These three points comprehend the main part of the doctrine of bills and notes:—

I.—DRAWING OF BILLS.

1. The subscription of a drawer is necessary in order to obtain a warrant for summary execution.¹ It has already been said, that the representatives of the drawer may sign the bill, if found unsigned in his repositories.² It may be signed by the drawer after the [396] death or bankruptcy of the acceptor,³ or at any time before producing in judgment.

2. The act of drawing a bill in favour of a third party implies an undertaking to the payee, and all acquiring right to the bill, that the person drawn on shall accept, and that he shall pay the bill; or that if he shall fail in either particular on due negotiation, the drawer himself will retire the bill. This evidence may be counteracted by the writ or oath of the holder of the bill.⁴

3. When one draws a bill in a representative character, as factor or otherwise, he must, in order to be free from personal responsibility, limit his draft to that character: for the law holds that the act of drawing the bill affords legal evidence of an obligation against the drawer in his own person; and that recourse, according to a general rule, and without distinction, must be competent upon all bills which do not ex facie bear the exception.⁵

4. Foreign bills are drawn in sets, that they may be transmitted safely. Each set or double of the bill must bear a condition that it shall be payable only while the others there enumerated remain unpaid; as, 'Pay this my first exchange, second and third not paid;' or, 'Pay this my second of exchange, first and third not paid.' All the copies must be delivered to the payee or endorsee, otherwise he may have difficulty in negotiating. The bill that is first presented and accepted is alone entitled to payment, and payment of it discharges the drawee;⁶ so that no banker is in safety to discount one set of a draft before acceptance, without the rest being delivered to him or destroyed, or without taking indemnity against the risk of another being first presented.

5. During the last war, bills drawn or negotiated from France were prohibited to be paid.⁷

¹ Erskine (iii. 2. 28) goes too far in saying that a bill without the drawer's name is null. See Ogilvie v Moss, 1804, supra, p. 416, note 5. Drummond v Drummond, 1785, M. 1445; Hare v Geddes, 1786, M. 1446, were cases in which it was objected to a claim in bankruptcy that the bill was null, as wanting the drawer's subscription; but the objection was repelled. In the first case an action was brought on the bill.

II.—ACCEPTANCE OF BILLS AND NOTES.

The only proper acceptance of a bill by the person on whom it is drawn, is by his full subscription.¹ The mere subscription of the name is a sufficient acceptance: the full form is 'Accepted,' or 'Accepts,' with the name subscribed. Or where it seems necessary to take unusual precaution, it runs thus: 'Accepted for the sum of so much,' with the name subscribed. When accepted in any of these forms, the bill or note may be protested, if not duly paid; and on that protest diligence may be summarily issued against the acceptor.

In England, a separate acceptance may be taken without endangering the remedy on the bill, because in all cases an action is necessary; and the production of the bill, with [397] such evidence as is deemed sufficient to establish that the person drawn upon undertook to answer the request, may as easily be made the ground of the judgment on which execution is to follow, as if written on the bill itself. But even a written acceptance, separate from the bill, would not be sufficient in Scotland to authorize a decree of registration; there being, in the ordinary course of procuring a decree of registration, no judicial authority to take cognizance of such extraneous evidence; and a parole acceptance, whatever effect it may have in constituting a debt or in completing an assignment, can have none at all in constituting an accepted bill, on which execution can pass summarily.² This keeps the rule of acceptance in Scotland to that state of correctness which ought never to have been departed from in England,³ and which is now restored by statute (1 and 2 Geo. iv. c. 78), whereby 'no acceptance of any inland bill of exchange shall be sufficient to charge any person,' unless it be by writing on the bill, or on one of its parts, if there be more than one.

It is necessary, however, to observe a distinction respecting the acceptance of bills, from which important consequences are deducible. Considering a bill as an order on the drawer's debtor to pay his debt to a third person, the acceptance, or what is equivalent to acceptance, will complete the transfer of the debt. And therefore,

1. Although it cannot in strict law be said that acceptance may be by anticipation,⁴ yet when a debtor promises by letter clearly and unequivocally to accept a particular draft, and such draft is given to the payee, accompanied by the letter, or taken by a third party in reliance on the promise, it is at least a letter of credit that will avail the payee of the draft, and discharge the person drawn on from the necessity of accepting another draft for the debt.⁵

² [By the Mercantile Law (Scotland) Act, 19 and 20 Vict. c. 60, it is enacted, sec. 11, that 'no acceptance of any bill of exchange, whether inland or foreign, made after the 31st day of December 1856, shall be sufficient to bind or charge any person, unless the same be in writing on such bill, or if there be more than one part of such bill, on one of the said parts, and signed by the acceptor or some person duly authorized by him.' See the provision of the statute as to England and Ireland, 19 and 20 Vict. c. 97, sec. 6.]

³ Lord Kenyon said: 'It was much to be lamented that anything has been deemed to be acceptance of a bill of exchange besides an express acceptance in writing; but he admitted that the cases had gone beyond that line, and had determined that there might be a parole acceptance.' 1 East 103. And Lord Ellenborough has said, 'that if the law in this respect were to be framed de novo, it might perhaps be desirable to have nothing else taken as an acceptance than an acceptance in writing on the bill itself, that every one to whom it passed might see, on the face of the instrument itself, whether or not it were accepted; but that it is now much too late to recur to that, after the various decisions in the time of Lord Hardwicke and Lord Mansfield.' 4 East 67.

⁴ See Johnson v Collins, 1 East 103, 104. [Sm. Merc. Law, 7th ed. 234, 235.]

Shepherd (Frazer's Tr.) v Campbell, Frazer, & Co., 1823, 2 S. 346, N. E. 804. C., F., & Co. wrote, 'Your draft on C., F., & Co. will meet due honour,' etc. This letter was shown to John Frazer, who advanced £500 on a draft drawn conformably. The fund on which C., F., & Co. relied failed, and they refused to accept the bill. They were held liable for the amount of the bill.

⁵ Pillans v Van Mierop & Hopkins, 3 Burrow 1663, where the defendants, London merchants, wrote that they would accept such bills as a foreign house should draw on the credit of White for £800. The foreign house was held to have made an effectual draft, which was to be held as accepted, although White in the meanwhile failed, and the London house attempted to retract; the foreign house having advanced money on the faith of the engagement. Lord Mansfield, Mr. Justice Wilson, and Mr. Justice Yates, laid down the law clearly.

Lord Mansfield went further in Pierson v Dunlop. Dunlop had written to MacLintot acknowledging receipt of a navy

But the promise must be unequivocal and clear.¹ It should follow that the holder of [398] the draft to which the promise applies ought to be preferred on the fund in the hand of the person drawn upon.

2. A verbal acceptance is also, in this view and to this effect, even by anticipation, good;² and though in Scotland such an acceptance will not ground summary diligence, it seems to be effectual to transfer the fund in the hands of the person drawn upon.

3. It is said that a refusal to accept, written on a bill, is an acceptance; but it can be so only in two cases: either where the presenter of the bill is deceived into a belief that it is an acceptance, and not a refusal;³ or where the drawee is possessed of a fund, and his refusal to accept is evidence of notice, so as to give the porteur right to the fund as assignee.⁴

Acceptance may be implied from detention of, or refusing to redeliver, a bill left for acceptance.⁵

Acceptance is sometimes made conditional. Thus:—

1. Where the person drawn upon does not choose altogether to reject the bill, and expects to receive those funds on the faith of which the bill is drawn, he accepts conditionally; as, 'to pay when in cash by a particular remittance;' or, 'to pay on arrival of a particular ship;' or, 'to pay when goods consigned shall be sold,' etc. Such acceptance is held good on the condition being performed,⁶ not otherwise.⁷

2. Acceptance may be so far qualified as to vary from the tenor of the draft. Thus,

1. It may be for a part only of the sum drawn for, to which extent it will be effectual;⁸ or,
2. It may vary in the mode of payment;⁹ or, 3. It may vary in time of payment.¹⁰

3. A bill may be accepted conditionally in respect to place.¹¹ But, 1. The condition must be in writing, in order to qualify the drawee's obligation to third parties taking the bill for value without notice of the condition.¹² 2. The porteur is not bound to take such bill, and saying that his draft would receive due honour; and he verbally said to the holder of the draft, that it would not be accepted till the navy bill was paid. The navy bill was paid. Lord Mansfield said, in the course of the argument, when the letter to MacLintot was maintained to be an acceptance: 'I rather think it a letter of credit, and that to make it an acceptance it should have been sent to the holder of the bill.' After argument, he said: 'I consider what the defendants did as an acceptance. It has been truly said, as a general rule, that the mere answer of a merchant to the drawer of a bill, saying "he will duly honour it," is no acceptance, unless accompanied with circumstances which may induce a third person to take the bill by endorsement; but if there are any such circumstances, it may amount to an acceptance, though the answer be contained in a letter to the drawer.' Cowp. 571. [Sm. ut supra.]

¹ Bees v Warwick, where 'your draft shall merit due attention' was held insufficient (2 Starkie 411). In Shepherd's case, p. 422, note 3, the expression was different.

² Lumley v Palmer, 2 Strange 1000, where a solemn argument was ordered, to settle the point. Lord Hardwicke, as Chief Justice, had directed the jury that verbal acceptance was sufficient. But the Chief Justice had ruled it otherwise in the Common Pleas. The Court, in their argument, held a verbal acceptance sufficient, and that the judge's direction to the jury to that effect was agreeable to constant practice. Lord Hardwicke said afterwards, that on a conference with the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas he had changed his opinion, and agreed with the Court of King's Bench. The point taken for granted by the Court and bar. Sproat v Matthews, 1 Term. Rep. 182. [Sm. Merc. Law, 7th ed. 234.]

³ And so it seems to have been held by Lord Mansfield. In the last edition of Mr. Justice Bayley's Treatise, p. 78, there is this note:—'In Ann. 75 is this note: "Underwriting or endorsing a bill thus, I will not accept this bill, is held by the custom of merchants a good acceptance; but by Lord Mansfield, in Peach v Kay, in sittings after Trin. Term 1781, it was held by all the judges that an express refusal to accept, written on the bill, where the drawee apprised the party who took it away what he had written, was no acceptance; but if the drawee had intended it as a surprise upon the party, and to make him consider it as an acceptance, they seemed to think it might have been otherwise.''

conditional acceptance; and he is not safe so to do, without giving immediate notice to the drawer and other parties, so as to prevent them from pleading a discharge of their responsibility. 3. Where the condition is verbal, the endorser must have notice, otherwise he will not be liable.¹ 4. But acceptance as a cautioner is deemed an absolute acceptance; and the qualification, whatever effect it may have in a question of relief between the parties themselves, has none at all as against the holder of the bill.²

It has sometimes been said, that an acceptance once written on a bill cannot be retracted, cancelled, or cut off, even while the bill is in the drawee's own power. In one sense this may be true,—namely, that a debtor to the drawer is bound so absolutely, that he cannot free himself by cancelling his signature. But to this extent the right of the holders will depend on the notice given of the assignment, not on the acceptance. To the extent to which it has been carried, the doctrine seems to be irreconcilable with principle, and to be justified only by the rule, that the drawee can write nothing on a bill which substantially injures and defaces it, without being held to accept it; and that the act of accepting requires no delivery to make it effectual, but from the moment of its appearing on the bill is beyond recall. It is a doctrine inconsistent with all the foreign authorities;³ and in England it is much doubted.⁴

Acceptance may be by an agent having a PROCURATION. But the holder is not bound to take such acceptance without seeing the procuration; nor, indeed, is he safe so to do without giving notice to the other parties: for he would thus take on himself the risk of the authority; and if it were not binding, he would discharge the other parties. If the agent's acceptance be taken, the effect of such acceptance will be determined by the following rules:—

1. The acceptance made in virtue of an express procuration will as effectually bind the principal as if made by himself. Such procurations are commonly granted by letter or power of attorney to confidential clerks, or factors, or riders for manufacturing houses, to draw, accept, endorse bills, or make promissory notes for the principal. It is a dangerous power, and ought not only to be granted with reserve, but acted upon by third parties very scrupulously.

2. The doctrine of the older authors⁵ is certainly more wholesome, that such power must be in writing; but mercantile practice has introduced a degree of looseness in this point, to which there is no authority for denying effect. On the contrary, it has been sanctioned in England in several cases, both in the common courts and in the House of Lords;⁶ insomuch that not only verbal authority to subscribe is held sufficient, but a power of procuration is inferred from the practice of so subscribing recognised by the principal. And in a recent case, where the Court of Session had found that there was no [400] power of procuration without a special mandate, this law was denied in the House of Lords.⁷

¹ Lord Ellenborough said the plaintiff had a right to refuse this acceptance, for the drawee of a bill has no right to vary the acceptance from the terms of the bill unless they be unambiguously and unequivocally the same. Boehm v Garcias, 1 Camp. 425. See also Sebags v Abithol, 4 Maule and Sel. 460; and Gammon v Schmoll, 5 Taunt. 344.

The judges were clearly of opinion that cautionary obligations in bills of exchange could have no other effect than that of settling the question of relief.

⁴ Bentink v Dorrien, 6 East 200. There was no occasion to decide the point; for the plaintiff had, by noting the bill for non-acceptance, barred himself from the benefit of it as an accepted draft. But Mr. Justice Lawrence took occasion to say, that when the general question shall arise, it will be worth considering how that which is not communicated to the holder can be considered as an acceptance, while it is yet in the hands of the drawee, and where he obliterates it before any communication made to the holder. 3. A general authority as agent or factor for a merchant residing abroad, will be sufficient to bind the principal by his acceptance; but a limited power must be strictly observed.¹

4. The person who accepts per procuration should be careful to express his representative capacity, otherwise he may render himself individually liable.²

5. The recall of such procurations will deprive of efficacy any draft or endorsement made by him who held it; nor does any advertisement or notice of such recall seem necessary in order to protect the principal from its abuse. Any one who trusts to the power without seeing the procuration in possession of the procurator, acts at his own risk. See hereafter, Of Mercantile Agency.

6. In England it has been held, that a collateral undertaking may be constituted by a subscription as acceptor, in circumstances which do not admit of a proper acceptance. Thus, after the person drawn on has accepted, there can be no proper acceptance by another person; but a signature as acceptor will raise a collateral undertaking.³ In Scotland a different view has been adopted; and instead of a collateral undertaking, the subscription has been held to import a joint undertaking, as acceptor of the bill or maker of the note.⁴ The English doctrine is consistent with mercantile practice and understanding, but not quite so with the stamp law; the Scottish doctrine is not quite reconcilable to either. It would present, for example, a question requiring some consideration, Whether a person subscribing, as in the case of Don and Watt, having no notice of the dishonour of the bill, would be liable for the payment of the bill at any time within the sexennial prescription?

7. A partner of a company has power to accept bills and make notes for the company in the ordinary course of trade, and of the company's dealings; although it should be stipulated in the contract that only one of their number should have that power. But this is subject to qualifications. 1. If the party to whom the bill is accepted is aware of the stipulation in the contract, he must show that he gave value for the acceptance or [401] note.⁵ 2. If the party is aware that the partner is using the company firm for his own private purposes, he must prove the assent of the company in order to recover on the bill.⁶ And this rule will be applied even where the company is indirectly benefited.⁷

A partner accepts either by signing the firm, or by subscribing his name for 'himself and partners.'⁸

4 July 1815, 3 Dow 218. There was no occasion to give judgment on this point, the case being remitted for reconsideration. Lord Chancellor Eldon said: 'Here a greater error has occurred than he ever remembered to have met with, if the commercial law was the same in Scotland as in England. In one of the interlocutors there is a finding, that an endorsement per procuration requires a special mandate.' His opinion was that no such thing was absolutely necessary; for if, from the general nature of the acts permitted to be done, the law would infer an authority, the law would say that such an authority might exist without a special mandate, and that an endorsement per procuration might be good though there were no such mandate. The cause was remitted to receive such evidence as might be properly offered with respect to the several points of the case.

This doctrine must, however, be confined to mercantile cases. Lowson v Matthew, 1823, 2 S. 502, N. E. 443.

acceptance, 'Accepted, Jos. Hudson;' and Hudson was sued as acceptor, the plaintiff stating it as a case of suretyship by Hudson, without whose interposition he refused the goods to Irving. Lord Ellenborough held this to be neither an acceptance by a drawer, nor for honour of the drawer, but a collateral undertaking that the bill should be paid.

ACCEPTANCE SUPRA PROTEST.—A friend or agent of any of the parties to a bill may accept it supra protest for their honour, and then he will be liable to all the parties in the bill, except to him for whose honour he has accepted; and on paying under such protest, will have a good claim against the person for whom he has accepted, and against all who in the bill are responsible to him. Or an accepted bill may in the same way be paid supra protest, and then the person paying will have his remedy against that person for whom he has so interposed, and against all who in the bill are responsible to him.¹

III.—ENDORSEMENT AND TRANSFER OF BILLS AND NOTES.

The transfer of bills and notes by endorser is one of the most distinguishing privileges of those instruments, and that by which, next to bank-notes, they have become the great circulating medium of the trading world. In England, the words 'to order,' or 'to bearer,' in the bill or note, make it transferable by endorsement as against all the parties to it.² And it is held, that without words making it assignable, the endorsement will be good only against the endorser himself, but not so as to transfer the bill, or make the drawer or acceptor liable to the endorsee.³ In Scotland, a note or bill is held endorsible although it bear no words of assignment.⁴

An endorsement is an order written on the back of the bill, directing the contents to be paid to a particular person; or the mere subscription of the name of the holder implies such order as may be written there. Such endorsement is at once a transfer of the bill or note, and an obligation to indemnify the endorsee or holder, if the bill should not on due negotiation be paid.

1. An endorsement which states the name of the endorsee is called a full endorsement; an endorsement which does not is called a blank endorsement. The latter is equivalent to an order making the note payable to the bearer;⁵ and it has been held, that while the first [402] endorsement continues blank, the bill is assignable by mere delivery, notwithstanding subsequent full endorsements, on their being cancelled.⁶

2. An endorsement in full may be restrictive or conditional.⁷ 1. It is not restrictive merely by omitting the words 'or order,' an endorsement by such endorsee being good.⁸ 2. An endorsement, 'Pay to A B only,' or 'Pay to A B for my use,' is restrictive, and gives

³ Hill v Lewis, Salkeld 132. Lord Holt held a note without the words to order to be well transferred by endorsement only, so as to make the endorser chargeable to the endorsee.

This doctrine seems to explain the difficulty in Kershaw v Cox, where the insertion of the words would in Scotland have been held immaterial. [See Sm. M. L. 226.]

⁴ Crichton v Gibson, 1726, M. 1446. [By the Mercantile Law (Scotland) Act, 19 and 20 Vict. c. 60, it is enacted, sec. 15, that 'where any bill or note has been lost, stolen, or fraudulently obtained, the holder of such bill or note suing or doing diligence thereon shall be bound to prove that value was given by him for the same; but such proof may be made by parole evidence.']

Peacock v Rhodes, 1781, Douglas 611, where a draft endorsed in blank was stolen, and afterwards bought by Peacock for value. Acceptance and payment were refused; but the Court held there was no difference between a note endorsed in blank and a note payable to the bearer. 'The law,' says Lord Mansfield, 'is settled, that a holder coming fairly by a bill or note has nothing to do with the transaction between the original parties. I see no difference between a note endorsed blank and one payable to the bearer. They both go by delivery, and possession proves property in both cases.' [Sm. Merc. Law, 7th ed. 200, 230.]

⁶ See below, p. 428. [The transfer of a bill or note by delivery, without endorsement, seems to imply a warranty that the bill or note is genuine; and where such transfer is in payment of a prior debt, that debt will not be looked upon as satisfied unless the bill or note be discharged when it comes to maturity. Sm. Merc. Law, 7th ed. 233, and cases there cited.]

no power to re-endorse.¹ 3. An endorsement 'without recourse on the endorser' is a good transfer; but the condition is effectual to protect the endorser from a claim if the bill be dishonoured.² 4. The payee may annex a condition to his endorsement, which will bind the person drawn on, if it be so annexed before he accepts, and the non-performance of which will reinvest the debt in the payee.³

3. An endorsement for a part seems to be bad, unless the other part has been paid.⁴

4. Where a bill is payable to a company, any of the partners may, even for his own account, endorse it effectually by the firm,⁵ provided the endorsee has no notice of the abuse of the partner's power, or no indication from the circumstances of such misapplication. But the endorsement will be bad, if applied with the knowledge of the endorsee to a private engagement of the partner who makes the endorsement; to the purpose, for example, of guaranteeing a previous debt not of the company, but of the partner himself.⁶

5. Endorsations may be made by procuration: as to which, see above, p. 424.

6. Bills and notes may be carried by endorsation, both before and after the term of payment.⁷ And it has been held, 1. That even an onerous endorsee before the term of [403] payment will be liable to the same exceptions which may be pleaded against the endorser, if he is aware of the bill having been dishonoured by refusal to accept.⁸ 2. That if he acquire by endorsation after the term of payment, very slight evidence will be sufficient to presume his knowledge of the dishonour.⁹ 3. That if there be any marks of dishonour on the face of the bill, the endorsee taking it after the term of payment will be liable to all the objections competent against the endorser.¹⁰ But, 4. The decisions have been different in

¹ Bayley, p. 102. [An endorsement in these terms, 'Pay A B or order, value in account with C D,' is not restrictive. The bill was afterwards presented for acceptance, and accepted. It was afterwards discounted in the Bank of England. ¹⁰ Brown v Davis, 3 Term. Rep. 80. Here the payee of a bill having endorsed it, had it returned from the endorsee noted for non-payment. The drawer gave him money, with which he retired the bill; but instead of returning it to the drawer, he endorsed it for value to Brown. Lord Kenyon held the evidence of knowledge not sufficient. On a motion for a new trial, it was held that it must be left to the jury, on

England and in Scotland, on the inference deducible from the mere circumstance of the bill being acquired after the term of payment. In England the point was much questioned at one time,¹ but is now held settled, that the endorsee, as having notice by the bill being past due, is liable to the objections competent against the endorser.² But in Scotland it is still held, though not settled, that the mere circumstance of the endorsation being after the term of payment, unaccompanied by any marks of dishonour on the bill, does not expose the endorsee to the exceptions pleadable against his endorser.³

7. But although a bill may itself be transferred after the term of payment by endorsation, [404] this shorthand and privileged mode of assigning does not seem competent for carrying a protest which has been taken on the bill; or any other proceeding for the purpose of obtaining diligence; or the diligence itself.⁴ These seem to require a conveyance by assignation.

8. A collateral engagement may be undertaken by signing as endorser in circumstances which do not admit of a proper endorsement. Thus, no one can properly endorse who has no right to the bill. But the subscription as an endorser, with the intention of giving credit to the bill, is an effectual collateral undertaking.⁵ See above, p. 425.

9. A blank endorsement makes a bill or note transferable by mere delivery. And it has this effect, notwithstanding subsequent endorsements in full. On these being cancelled, the full efficacy of the blank endorsement is restored;⁶ so that it is a proper precaution to fill up all the preceding blank endorsations, to prevent accidents, in case of the bill being lost.⁷

the slightest circumstance, to presume knowledge, such as any mark of discharge on the face of the bill.

See Walker v Wilson, 30 Nov. 1811, 14 Fac. Coll. 361, where this doctrine is taken for granted on the bench.

Mr. Justice Buller had directed a verdict on the principle that the endorsation, subsequent to the term of payment, made the endorsee take it on the endorser's credit. Lord Kenyon, as already stated, had required evidence of notice. And in a previous case, the Court of King's Bench had held an endorsement after action brought on a note or bill sufficient to give the endorsee a right of action, unless he had notice of the action. Columbies v Slim, Chitty 165.

Brown v Turner, 7 Term. Rep. 630. Pritchard endorsed to Brown for a prior debt a bill accepted by Turner, and past due. Lord Kenyon thought that a fatal objection competent against Pritchard must affect Brown, his endorsee, in those circumstances; and the Court sanctioned his direction by refusing a new trial. His Lordship has, in Boehm v Stirling (7 Term. Rep. 429), explained the grounds of his opinion, and his sanction to the rule laid down by Mr. Justice Buller. See Bayley, edit. Beawes, 63. [Sm. Merc. Law, 269.]

Tinson v Francis, 1 Camp. 19. Lord Ellenborough says, after a note or bill is due, it comes disgraced to the endorsee, and it is his duty to make inquiries concerning it. If he takes it, though he gives a full consideration for it, he takes it on the credit of the endorser, and subject to all the equities with which it may be encumbered.

The case of Charles v Marsden, 1 Taunt. 224, turned upon the validity and effect of a plea that the bill was for accommodation.

³ M'Gowan v M'Kellar, 1823, 4 S. 498, N. E. 503, 580. A bill endorsed five years after the time of payment, but without any noting or mark of dishonour on it. The endorsee was held not liable to latent exceptions competent against the endorser.

[By the Mercantile Law (Scotland) Act, 19 and 20 Vict. c. 60, sec. 16, 'when any bill of exchange or promissory note shall, after the passing of this Act, be endorsed after the period when such bill of exchange or promissory note became payable, the endorsee of such bill or note shall be deemed to have taken the same subject to all objections or exceptions to which the said bill or note was subject in the hands of the endorser.']

⁶ Smith v Clarke, 1 Espin. Cases 180. A bill was endorsed in blank. After some other endorsements it came to Jackson, who sent it to Muir & Atkinson, but did not endorse it. They discounted it with Smith, who struck out all the endorsements but the first, which continued in blank. Lord Kenyon held this good. See also Chaters v Bell, 4 Esp. Rep. 129. See also 1 Camp. 175. SUBSECTION III.—OF THE PARTIES BY WHOM, AND AGAINST WHOSE ESTATES, A DEMAND MAY BE MADE ON BILLS AND NOTES.

A demand on bills or notes is commonly made effectual by means of summary diligence or by ordinary action. But where the parties are bankrupt, the debt must be proved on the bankrupt estate, by producing the bill and making affidavit to the debt.

Such demand or claim may, according to circumstances, be made by any of the several parties whose names appear on a bill or note: in real transactions, by the porteur or payee, by an endorsee, by the drawer, or by one paying for honour; in accommodation bills, by the holder before payment, or for relief by the person who has paid for behoof of the person accommodated, in whatever character he may appear on the bill.

No one can be made liable as a party to the bill, unless his name or firm be on it.¹

I.—DEMAND ON BILLS AND NOTES IN REAL TRANSACTIONS.

1. DEMAND BY THE PAYEE.—The payee is the person in whose favour the draft is made, the proper original creditor in a bill of exchange or promissory note. A bill may be drawn blank in the name of the payee, and afterwards effectually filled up by a bona fide holder with his own name.²

1. AGAINST THE ACCEPTOR. 1. A demand by summary diligence or by action [405] may be made by the payee or porteur of a bill or note, for the sum in the bill or note, with interest from the day of payment (or, on a bill or note payable on demand, from the presentment), if the bill is due, but has not been protested; or also for the costs of protest, correspondence, and diligence occasioned by the dishonour of the bill if protested. 2. If the acceptor has become bankrupt, a claim may be made on his estate; either, if the term of payment of the bill be past, for the sum with interest (limited in the case of sequestration to the date of the bankruptcy), or for the sum in the bill, with a rebate of interest if the term of payment be not yet arrived.

2. AGAINST THE DRAWER the claim of the payee is for the sum in the bill, with interest, costs, and damage. In order to give this remedy, the bill must be duly protested, and notice of dishonour given.

3. In the responsibility of these two parties, there has been some difference in respect to damages. The damages consist not merely of costs, to which both acceptor and drawer are clearly liable, but of the expense also of exchange, re-exchange, etc.; and this by 1681, c. 20, a bill-holder is entitled to recover.³

EXCHANGE is the difference in the value of money at the place where the bill is drawn and at the place of payment.

¹ Telford (Stirling Bank) v James, Wood, & James, 1822, 1 S. 290, N. E. 269. Arnot, general agent of James, Wood, & James, drew a bill in his own name for the price of goods of theirs sold to Paterson; but their name was not on the bill. He discounted it with the bank. He and Paterson failed, and the bank brought an action against James, Wood, & James, as liable for Arnot their agent's act. They were held liable. But this was reversed in the House of Lords, May 1825.

² Cruchley v Clarence, 2 Maule and Selwyn 90. Clarence drew a bill of £200 in Jamaica on H. Man of London, leaving a blank for the payee's name. It was afterwards negotiated in England by Vashon, who endorsed it to Cruchley for an old debt, and Cruchley filled up his own name in the blank. Lord Ellenborough said, as the defendant (the drawer against whom action was brought) had chosen to send the bill into the world in this form, the world ought not to be deceived by him. The drawer, by leaving the blank, undertook to be answerable for it when filled up in the shape of a bill. The rest of the Court concurred. [Sm. Merc. Law, 7th ed. 215.]

³ 1681, c. 20. In providing for summary diligence on the registered protest on non-acceptance or non-payment of foreign bills from or to this realm, the effect is described as 'for the whole sums contained in the bill, as well exchange as principal.' And further, it is declared leasome to the party charger to pursue for the exchange, if not contained in the said bills, with re-exchange, damage, interest, and all expenses, before the judge ordinary; or in the case of suspension, to eik the same to the charge at the discussing of the said suspension, to the effect the same may be liquidate, and decree given therefor, either against the party principal, or against him and his cautioners, as accords.

RE-EXCHANGE is a damage accruing from the dishonour of the bill, and the necessity of having recourse back on the place of drawing. In settling this claim in bankruptcy, the law of Scotland is not perplexed by many of the distinctions which the rejection of contingent debts occasions in England; but the matter in bankruptcy is on the same footing as between the parties in the ordinary case. Re-exchange may arise in two ways: by a re-draft or bill drawn by the payee from the place of payment back upon the drawer; or by the accumulation of the exchange of the several countries through which the bill may have been negotiated.

The former is the direct re-exchange which must necessarily be in contemplation of the drawer as the consequence of the dishonour of his bill. The evidence which grounds the claim is the protest against the acceptor and all concerned for non-payment (or non-acceptance), and for all costs, damage, interest, exchange, and re-exchange; together with the new bill or re-draft.¹ The bill or re-draft is composed of the sum in the former bill, the commission or exchange, the foreign interest from the term of payment to the term of payment of the new bill, the costs of protest, correspondence, stamps, etc., and the exchange on the return.² This re-draft is to be made directly on the place of the original draft, where there is regular commercial intercourse rendering that practicable: otherwise it may be [406] drawn in the next best or most direct practicable course; and the additional expense will form an effectual charge against the drawer, provided due notice of this has been given. But it is not necessary in Britain that there should have been money actually raised abroad by re-draft. It is sufficient that there is a course of exchange, direct or circuitous; and on the part of the bill-holder, a liability to pay re-exchange.³ The damage will be fixed by the course of exchange according to mercantile usage; and this either on the knowledge of special jurymen, or on evidence. It will be no answer to the claim of re-exchange, that the dishonour arose from inevitable accident, the order of the foreign Government, etc. With all this the payee of the bill is held to have nothing to do.⁴

The rule is, that the drawer must answer to all the direct damage accruing from the dishonour of his bill; and this has been justly held in England to comprehend circuitous

² The bill is accompanied by a note of those charges; and this note may (though this is not necessary) be certified by the banker or merchant who has transacted the matter. On a contest arising, evidence of the exchange, foreign interest, etc. etc., will determine the matter.

³ De Tastet v Baring, 11 East 265. Two bills of exchange were drawn at London on Lisbon. They were endorsed at London to one who again endorsed them to Baring; and Baring at London endorsed them to De Tastet. He again endorsed to Trives & Co., who at Lisbon presented the bills to the person drawn on, who refused to pay, and so they were protested, and returned to De Tastet as endorser. He did not appear to have paid any re-exchange, and counts were laid to cover the question as on his responsibility for it. The defence was grounded on the fact that Lisbon was at the time blockaded by a British squadron, and no exchange existed between the two countries. On the other hand, one or two instances were shown of an exchange through the medium of other bills on Holland or America. Lord Ellenborough directed a verdict for the plaintiffs, if they had paid re-exchange, or were in mercantile dealing liable for it, reserving the question whether in a state of hostility exchange could legally be demanded.

The jury was special, and in it were several very eminent merchants, whom Lord Ellenborough encouraged to take an active part in examining the witnesses, which they did, and gave verdict for the defendant, i.e. rejecting the claim of re-exchange. This proceeded on the ground that the plaintiff, as endorser, was not liable for re-exchange, there being no course of exchange between the countries at the time.

⁴ This determined in England, in 1794, by the Court of Common Pleas, in Mellish v Simcon, 2 Hy. Blackst. 378, where two bills of exchange were drawn by Simcon on Boyd & Co. in Paris, payable to the order of Mellish & Co. The bills came into the hands of Audroine at Paris, and Boyd & Co. refused acceptance, but promised payment when due. Then the French Convention having passed a decree prohibiting the payment of bills drawn from countries at war with France, the bills were not paid. The bills came back on Mellish & Co. with a great accumulation of re-exchange, and they paid them. The defence, in an action by Mellish & Co. against Simcon, the drawer, was rested on the prohibition by the French Government. Lord Chief Justice Eyre and Mr. Justice Buller, Heath, and Rooke, were of opinion that the drawer's engagement was for payment at all events.

exchange, or the accumulation of the several exchanges in the fair return of the bill back through the several holders.¹ It has been contended against such responsibility, that the intermediate negotiation is a fortuitous event, which the endorser could not foresee nor prevent.² But this cannot correctly be said of a mercantile document intended to circulate by endorsement, and serve the purpose of money. The drawer must be taken to have in contemplation all the loss which may arise in the fair course of negotiation, either before or after acceptance. This remedy, however, must always be under the restraint of equity; and where there appears any manifest breach of equity in the negotiation, redress will be given.³

But it has been questioned whether the acceptor's estate is liable to a claim for [407] re-exchange. The foreign jurists seem to hold the claim good against the acceptor.⁴ It is not a demand which naturally arises against the acceptor by the porteur, for his proper recourse is against the drawer. But as the drawer will, on answering that demand, have his claim against the acceptor, provided he have funds in his hands for indemnification,⁵ it does not appear that any bar would lie to a claim by the porteur against the acceptor's estate, in the case of the drawer becoming bankrupt; for it seems to be implied in the nature of the acceptor's engagement to this peculiar sort of instrument, that he is tacitly bound for the common mercantile damage arising from its dishonour. In England, however, there are cases denying to the bill-holder a claim for re-exchange against the acceptor, and restraining the remedy to a claim against the drawer.⁶ And these will certainly deserve very great attention when such a question shall arise in Scotland.⁷

¹ In the case above cited of Mellish & Co. v Simcon, the bill drawn at Paris had been negotiated through Holland, and when dishonoured it was returned from Paris to the Dutch endorser, with a re-exchange of £300, and from Holland to the English endorser at another re-exchange of £8. 2 Hy. Blackst. 378.

⁵ This in effect admitted in England. See 2 Brown's Chan. Cases, 599.

⁶ Woolsey v Crawford, 1810, by Lord Ellenborough, 2 Campbell 445. The bill was drawn in Quebec upon the defendant in England. It was endorsed in Canada by the payee, and was returned to Canada dishonoured, in consequence of which the payee was forced to pay £20 per cent. of re-exchange, and £6 of interest. Lord Ellenborough said: 'You may as well state that, by reason of the bill not being paid, the plaintiff was obliged to raise money by mortgage. You must proceed for re-exchange against the drawer. He undertakes that the bill shall be paid, or that he will indemnify the holder of the consequences. The acceptor's contract cannot be carried further than to pay the sum specified in the bill, and interest, according to the legal rate of interest when it is due.'

Napier v Schneider, 12 East 420, was a case of a bill from Scotland on the defendant in England. The Court of King's Bench refused to refer it to the Master to tax principal, interest, and costs, including re-exchange. The Court were clearly of opinion that this could not be allowed against an acceptor in England, who by his acceptance only charges himself with a liability to pay according to the law of that country; and if he do not pay, the holder has his remedy against the drawers.

⁷ [The following is a list of the authorities on the interesting and still unsettled question of the acceptor's liability for re-exchange. On the one side, denying the liability of an acceptor for re-exchange, there stand the cases of Napier v Schneider and Woolsey v Crawford, supra; and of Dawson v Morgan, 9 B. and Cr. 618, per Lord Tenterden; and ex parte Moore in re Tyler, 2 Br. Ch. Ca. 597 (per Lord Thurlow). On the other side, Francis v Bucker, Amb. 672, 2 Br. Ch. Ca. 599 (a decision by Lord Camden); and Walker v Hamilton, 1 De G. F. and J. 602 (a decision by Lord Campbell and the Lords Justices of Appeal). In America an acceptor is held not liable for re-exchange. Sibley v Tut, 1 MacM. Eq. R. 320, cited by Kent and Parsons, infra. There appears to be no case on the point in Scotland. Turning to the writers of authority on the law of bills, we find Mr. Justice Bayley (Tr. on Bills, p. 353, N. 49, p. 356) suggesting that the acceptor ought to be liable by the law of England. Mr. Smith (Merc. Law, p. 268) treats the question as doubtful. Mr. Justice Byles (Bills, p. 389, 8th ed.) says, 'The acceptor is not liable to re-exchange;' and so among the American writers, Ch. Kent (Comm. vol. iii. p. 116), Mr. Justice Story (Bills, sec. 398), and Parsons (Contracts, vol. i. 288; Tr. on Notes and Bills, 652, 661) hold the acceptor not liable for re-exchange. Among our own writers, the non-liability of the acceptor is strongly urged in Glen on Bills, 2d ed. p. 272, in a note by the editor, a writer of considerable authority on the subject; and the contrary opinion is as strongly urged

4. The payee is entitled to recover on an accepted bill, though not signed by the drawer, the name of the creditor being in the bill.¹

II. DEMAND BY THE DRAWER.—The DRAWER is the proper creditor in an inland bill between two parties. It sometimes happens that such bills are sent to the drawer accepted; and that they lie over without being signed by him either as drawer or endorser. If such a bill be found in the repositories of the drawer after his death, his representative may subscribe his own name, and claim the amount;² and it is said that new diligence may proceed on a bill so completed.³

The drawer, when obliged to indemnify the holder of the bill, has his remedy against the person drawn on. His claim is in the nature of damages, and will extend not only to the principal, interest, and expenses, but also to the exchange and re-exchange which he has been forced to pay on account of the refusal to accept when the bill ought to have been accepted, or on account of the failure to pay after having accepted. See above, p. 429 et seq.

III. DEMAND BY ENDORSEES.—STRANGERS to the original transaction acquire the payee's right to insist for payment by means of endorsement, which confers a right to the contents of the bill, free from every exception of which notice is not given at the time, or which is not necessarily implied in the circumstances in which the endorsement is made.⁴

1. Against the acceptor the endorsee has full right to enforce payment, without any previous notice, at whatever time he may make his demand, within the term of the sexennial [408] limitation; and any one who stands in the character of acceptor, is so far in less favourable circumstances than an endorser, that the bill-holder is not bound to any rules of negotiation or notice.

2. Against the drawer, or any other previous endorser,⁵ the endorsee has claim for principal, interest, exchange, re-exchange, and costs. And it is not necessary for an endorsee to prove, in claiming against an endorser, that he has actually paid re-exchange. It is enough if he be liable for it. He is not in mercantile practice liable if there be no course of exchange at the time.⁶

PRESENTMENT, PROTEST, AND NOTICE.

It is essential to the payee's or endorsee's demand against the drawer or previous endorsers, 1. That the bill or note shall have been duly presented for payment, and in some cases for acceptance; 2. That when dishonoured, a notarial protest shall have been taken of the non-payment or non-acceptance; and, 3. That notice shall have been given of the dishonour and claim of recourse. This is called, in Scottish law, 'the due negotiation of the bill,' and proceeds on a contract (implied in the receiving of the bill or note, and available to every person who on paying it would be entitled to an action) that the bill shall be in Thomson (p. 448, Wilson's ed.). Forbes (p. 199 of 2d ed.) seems to have thought the drawer and endorsers alone liable in re-exchange. Mr. Bell in the text above gives an uncertain decision, but in the Principles (sec. 342) he is distinctly of opinion that the acceptor is not liable. Pothier (Contrat de Change, No. 117) holds to the opinion that the acceptor is liable, but in the Traité des Obligations he obviously implies that only the drawer and endorsers are liable. The solution of the question seems to depend mainly on the consideration, whether or not the liability of a signatory to a bill of exchange for damage is to be determined with reference to the anterior contract for which the bill is granted. According to the rules as to damage for non-implementation of the contract of sale, the purchasers of goods would not be liable for damage of the nature of re-exchange; and if there be liability, it must be deduced by treating the granting of a bill not as a mode of payment, but as an independent contract.]

presented in proper time; that no extra time shall be allowed for payment; and that notice shall without delay be given of the dishonour, and of the claim of recourse thence arising; otherwise, that the holder of the bill or note shall be held to renounce all claim of recourse, and to rest satisfied with the acceptor's obligation alone.¹

I. PRESENTMENT OF BILLS is either for acceptance, or for payment, or for both.

1. PRESENTMENT FOR ACCEPTANCE.—The neglect to present a bill, null for want of the proper stamp, will not discharge the debt; though, if presented, the bill would have been paid, and the acceptor afterwards failed.²

Where the bill is unobjectionably drawn, it is to be observed,—

(1.) That a presentment for acceptance is not necessary where the bill is drawn at a day certain; nor is it a good answer to a demand against the drawer or prior endorsers, that it was not presented till the day of payment arrived.³

(2.) That where the draft is within a limited time after sight, the recourse will be lost by a neglect to make presentment within a reasonable time.⁴ What is a reasonable time will depend on the custom, with all the circumstances; as that the delay was occasioned by the draft being kept in circulation, etc. It has been doubted whether this be a proper jury question, or a point of law to be inferred by the judge from the facts found by the jury;⁵ and the matter seems still to be unsettled. The bill must be put in circulation, not locked up for any length of time.⁶ But both a foreign and an inland bill may be put [409] into circulation before acceptance, and kept in circulation without acceptance, as long as the convenience of the successive holders requires.⁷

(3.) That where the draft has been sent to an agent to be negotiated, or where the payee is directed expressly to present it, the payee or agent must present it, otherwise be answerable for the debt.⁸

(4.) In presenting a draft for acceptance (differently from presenting for payment), it may be left with the drawee for twenty-four hours, unless in the interim he either accept, or declare a resolution not to accept.⁹

The drawers were in great credit, and the bills were put in circulation unaccepted, and were in negotiation in various parts of the Continent. They were in circulation for six months, at the end of which there was notice of the persons drawn upon having refused to accept the bills. The holders brought action against their own agents, who had at their desire procured the drafts, and in so doing had endorsed them. Answer: 1. That they endorsed only as agents. This held no defence, the endorsement being general. 2. That the bill had been neglected to be presented in due time. The Court of Common Pleas (Gibb, Ch. J.) held that, the bill having been put in circulation, there was no laches. 7 Taunt. 159.

A draft for £780 on Bogle of Glasgow, discounted at the branch of the Bank of Scotland at Greenock by Dunlop, the agent there, payable three days after date, was in regular course sent to G. Hamilton & Co., the bank agents at Glasgow, for negotiation. G. Hamilton & Co. did not present it for acceptance (as it is not customary for porteurs of bills at dates so short to present them), but kept it by them till the day of payment should arrive, with a view to present it at once for acceptance and for payment. Before that day the drawers failed; and when on the day of payment the bill was presented, Bogle, the person drawn upon, refused to accept. It was not clear whether he would have accepted if the draft had been presented at first, but he had then no funds, and the practice had been to make provision for such drafts against the day of payment. The action was by the Bank of Scotland against the two agents, G. Hamilton & Co. the agents at Glasgow, and Dunlop the agent at Greenock; and the point was to settle the responsibility between them. The Court held that, as agents, Messrs. G. Hamilton & Co. were bound immediately to present the bill in question for acceptance, and that, having failed to do so till the day of payment arrived, they were bound to relieve the Greenock agent. 15 Fac. (5.) That if the drawee cannot be found, the bill should be protested at the market-cross;¹ and if there be two persons of the same name, and both refuse, there should be a protest against both.²

(6.) That in all cases, whether presentment for acceptance be necessary or not, if the draft has actually been presented without a protest and notice at the time, recourse is excluded.³

2. PRESENTMENT FOR PAYMENT.—Unless presentment is made on the day of payment;⁴ or, if there be no day, within a reasonable time after receipt of the bill; and by a person holding right to the bill, or entitled to give a legal receipt for the money;⁵ and at the place where, by special appointment or implication, the money is to be paid; or to the proper debtor in the bill personally,—there can be no legitimate protest, and the recourse is lost. [410] And where the bill still remains with the porteur or endorsee, it must so be presented for payment, although acceptance may have been refused.⁶ It is not enough to supersede the necessity of presentment, that the drawee has previously said he will probably not accept.⁷

It is important in this matter of presentment to explain the doctrine respecting days of grace, and the various terms of payment at which bills may be drawn.

DAYS OF GRACE are a prolongation of the term of payment (formerly by mere indulgence, now for a long time as matter of right), where a bill is drawn payable at a certain distance of time after date, or after sight. The number of those days differs in different countries; and the rule is according to the usage of the country where the bill is payable. In Britain three days of grace are allowed, excluding the day on which the bill falls due.

USANCE means the customary time at which bills are drawn between two countries. Between Britain and France the usance is thirty days; with Hamburgh, a calendar month; with Leghorn, three calendar months; and so on. Double and treble usance is an extension of the term to double or treble the customary period. Half-usance is a shortening of the time by one half.

The time is to be reckoned exclusive of the day of the date, or presentment for acceptance. The days of grace are curtailed by the occurrence of Sunday or a holiday on the last: the bill is then payable on the second.

With these explanations, the rules of presentment for payment are these:—

1. DAY OF PRESENTMENT.—A bill payable on demand, or without any mention of time, is paid on presentment: no days of grace are allowed; and unless put into circulation, it must be presented for payment within a reasonable time.⁸ It is still unsettled in England in this, as in the question of presentment for acceptance (above p. 433), whether the question is of fact for the jury or of law for the judge, to direct that, in the circumstances, the delay has been reasonable or otherwise.⁹

Where the bill is payable in the place of its date, the chief elements of a decision on what is reasonable will naturally be, first, the usage of the place; and, secondly, how far that Porterfield, 1766, M. 1593, there is an example of undue delay in getting back a bill so left for acceptance. It was a bill drawn at three days after sight, and so endorsed to Messrs. Falls, which they sent to the drawee for acceptance. He was not in town, and his clerk said he would be home soon, when he doubted not the draft would be accepted. It so lay for a fortnight, and it was at last protested. The Court found the endorsees had lost recourse.

If the drawee have lost a bill so left for acceptance, he ought to give a note for the amount, if he had intended to accept it; if not, protest should be taken as for non-acceptance.

usage ought to be controlled, if inconvenient or unjust, in a case where the least unnecessary delay may be fatal to the right of third parties, for whom the bill-holder is bound to act. The observation of Lord Ellenborough respecting this rule of mercantile law is entitled to the greatest regard,—namely, that it is always to be considered whether, under the circumstances of the case, the bill has been presented with reasonable diligence; and the result of this in England seems to be, that a person receiving a bill or note has the whole of the next day (or, in the case of a banker, the banking hours of next day) to present it.¹

Where the bill is to be sent to another place for presentment, the rule is, that it [411] must be sent by the post of the next day after receiving it.²

Where the bill is payable at sight, it does not seem to be settled whether days of grace are to be allowed or not. On the Continent, days of grace seem to be allowed.³ In England, the mercantile usage seems at one time to have been otherwise, as established by the verdict of a special jury;⁴ and so Beawes lays down the law.⁵ But it is still considered as a point unsettled.⁶

Where the bill is payable a certain number of months, weeks, or days after date, or after sight, the day of presentment for payment is the last of the days of grace, and a reasonable time before the expiration of that day.⁷ The time is to be computed by calendar months, ¹ Rickford v Ridge, 1810, 2 Camp. 537. Ridge on 13th June got Rickford & Co., bankers at Aylesbury, to cash a check of Mingay, Nott, & Co. of London, on Smith, Payne, & Co., bankers, London. The check was not sent to London by the post, which set off at six in the evening, but by a coach at eight in the morning of the 14th. Rickford's correspondents, Praid & Co., got it between three and four afternoon of the 14th. They presented it for payment at eleven next morning, the 15th, when the answer was, 'No effects.' Mingay, Nott, & Co. paid till four o'clock, and then stopped, but no application was made to pay this check. Notice of dishonour was sent on 16th. It was proved to be the usage to send out checks and bills for payment only once a day, generally before letters by post are delivered, and checks and bills by post lie till next day; and that had the check arrived by post of 14th, it would not have been presented before the 15th. The practice was allowed to be different east of St. Paul's.

Lord Ellenborough: The holder of a check is not bound to give notice of dishonour to the drawer for the purpose of charging the person from whom he received it. He does enough if he presents it with due diligence to the bankers on whom it is drawn, and gives notice of its dishonour to those only against whom he seeks his remedy. 'The question here is, Whether, if the check had arrived by post on the 14th, the bankers were bound to present it for payment the same day? This must be decided by the law-merchant. I cannot hear of any arbitrary distinction between one part of the city and another. It is not competent to bankers to lay down one rule for the eastward of St. Paul's and another for the westward. They may as well fix upon St. Peter's at Rome. It is always to be considered whether, under the circumstances of the case, the check has been presented with reasonable diligence. This is what the law-merchant requires. The rule, that the moment a check is received by the post, it should invariably be sent out for payment, would be most inconvenient and unreasonable. In Liverpool and other great towns, different posts arrive at different hours; but it would be impossible to have clerks constantly ready to carry out all the bills and checks that may arrive in the course of a day. Nor, if it were possible, is it requisite that, all other business being laid aside, parties should devote themselves to the presenting of checks. The rule to be adopted must be a rule of convenience; and it seems to me to be convenient and reasonable, that checks received in the course of one day should be presented the next. Is this practice consistent with the law-merchant? It cannot alter it. Bankers would be kept in a continual fever if they were obliged to send out a check the moment it is paid in. The arrangement mentioned by the plaintiff's witnesses appears subservient to general convenience, and not contrary to the law-merchant, which merely requires checks to be presented with reasonable diligence.'

Williams v Smith, 1819, 2 Barn. and Ald. 496. Here, for precaution, Newbury country notes received at Wantage were sent in halves by Saturday and Sunday's post—received in London on Monday—not presented till Tuesday, when the Newbury Bank had failed. Held that the receiver of the notes had till the day after to send them to London, and the London banker till the day after he received them (Tuesday) to present them.

⁷ Cruickshanks v Mitchel, 1751, M. 1577. It once was doubted whether a bill is to be presented and protested till after the days of grace were expired, but decided that it must be within the days.

Confirmed, British Linen Co. v Hepburn & Co., 19 May 1807, where the notary's clerk had presented the bill in due time; with a due attention to the difference of style in foreign bills; or by usances, if so the bill be drawn. If by days, the day on which the bill is dated is excluded; if by weeks, they are to be reduced to days, reckoning seven days for each week; and the days of grace are to be reckoned according to the number allowed by the law of the country where the bill is payable. Where the last day of grace falls on a Sunday or other holiday, the presentment must be on the second.¹

2. HOUR OF PRESENTMENT.—The bill must be presented within a reasonable time before the expiration of the day on which it falls due. And if, by the known custom of the place, [412] bills are payable only within limited hours, a presentment beyond those hours will not be sufficient.² If the bill is payable at a banker's, it must be presented within the hours at which in that place banks are open.³ It has been held a sufficient presentment, though after bank hours, if a person is there to answer, and refuses.⁴ Where the person drawn on is a common trader, much greater latitude is given.⁵

3. PLACE OF PRESENTMENT.—Presentment at the place mentioned is sufficient to charge all the parties, and seems to be necessary for recourse against drawer and endorser. Whether it be also necessary to a demand against the acceptor, where loss has arisen by the neglect, has been much doubted. 1. If a place for payment be specified in the bill, it must be presented there;⁶ and it has been held sufficient incorporation of this condition in the bill, that, the note being partly printed, the place of payment is printed as part of the note from the first.⁷ 2. But where the place is only mentioned on the margin, or at the foot of the bill, this has been said to be a mere notice of the place in which the person drawn on may be found.⁸ 3. Where the place is mentioned only in the acceptance, it was doubted whether presentment there was necessary, if there was not an absolute restriction, 'and not elsewhere:' some judges holding such a condition to be acceded to when the acceptance so qualified was received; others, that such direction did not qualify the acceptance.⁹ The latter was the Lord Ellenborough held it sufficient that a person was stationed there to answer, and that then there was no difference between a banker and a merchant. The opposite doctrine, as adopted in Common Pleas, will be found in Gammon v Schmoll, 5 Taunt. 344, 1 Marshall 80; Callaghan v Aylett, 2 Camp. 549, 3 Taunt. 397.

The point was brought into the House of Lords, and the opinion of the whole judges taken. The determination was, that the holder of a bill, accepted 'payable at a certain place,' without other words, must present the bill at that place, that being a condition of the acceptance. Rowe v Young, 2 Brod. and Bing. 165, 2 Bligh 391. But this was so contrary to general understanding of merchants. It is now settled by statute: (1.) That where [413] the acceptance mentions a place of payment simply, presentment at that place is not a condition. And, (2.) That where such place is mentioned restrictively, with the addition 'only, and not elsewhere,' presentment there is a condition necessary for charging the acceptor.¹ 4. Where there is no place mentioned, the bill-holder must present to the person; or at his counting-house, during business hours; or at his dwelling-house, if not in trade.²

But the acceptor will still be chargeable, if no loss in such cases has occurred from the neglect.³

4. ABSENCE OR DEATH OF THE DRAWEE, ACCEPTOR, OR MAKER.—The holder must, in case of absence or removal, use all diligence to find out the residence of the drawee or acceptor of a bill, or maker of a note.⁴ If not to be found, or dead, inquiry should be made after his representative, and the bill should be presented to him; and his refusal, if he shall refuse, protested, and notice given.⁵ If he has absconded, and is not to be found, and has no house or place of trade, the bill may be considered as dishonoured.⁶ Although bankrupt or insolvent, and his bank or shop shut, the bill must be presented.⁷

II. PROTEST OF BILLS AND NOTES.—Protest is a semi-judicial act, which in Scotland is performed by a notary-public before two witnesses, and evidenced by an instrument written on stamped paper; but which must, of course, in each country be completed in the form and by the officers which the law of that country requires.⁸ The purpose and effect of it is, 1. To state the demand and the answer, in order to establish the fact of the acceptor's failure to accept or to pay the bill; and, 2. To make a solemn assertion of the bill-holder's claim of recourse against the drawer and endorsers.⁹ The protest is, in Scottish law, the sole foundation of summary execution; and in other countries, as well as in Scotland, it is the proper ground of the action or claim of recourse, and cannot be dispensed with, or the want of it supplied by the testimony of witnesses or oath of party.¹⁰ It forms a [414] general understanding, that by 1 and 2 Geo. iv. c. 78 the reverse was established as the rule. Rowe v Williams, Holt 366.

See cases in preceding note. Ambrose v Hopwood, 2 Taunt. 61.

This statute seems to be applicable to Scotland as well as to England. [See 2 and 3 Will. iv. c. 98.]

[By the Mercantile Law (Scotland) Act, 19 and 20 Vict. c. 60, sec. 13, it is enacted, that 'where any inland bill of exchange shall be presented for acceptance or payment, and the same shall be dishonoured by not being accepted or paid, or where any promissory note shall be presented for payment, and dishonoured by not being paid, it shall not be necessary that a notarial protest shall be taken on such bill of exchange or promissory note in order to preserve recourse against the drawer or indorser of such bill or promissory note respectively; necessary part of the proof to be produced, along with a claim in bankruptcy, against drawer or endorsers.

In England, a distinction seems to exist between foreign and inland bills at common law. The former was regulated by the custom of merchants, according to which a protest is the only way in which the drawer could be charged on default of the person drawn on. But inland bills, not being properly bills of exchange according to the law of merchants, but introduced in imitation of them, simple notice was held sufficient, without the solemnity of a protest, to charge the drawer on dishonour of his draft, or failure of the acceptor. But this greater facility, as at first sight it appears, proved a disadvantage, since without protest only the principal sum could be recovered. This was remedied by statute, permitting protests on inland bills and promissory notes to the effect of recovering principal, interest, and charges.¹ But in Scotland no such distinction ever has existed. Inland as well as foreign bills have always been considered as in the same situation in this respect; a protest being with us an ordinary remedy for preserving rights entire.²

It is not necessary to specify in the protest that the bill was presented at the place of payment, provided it be said that the bill was duly protested.³

In the instrument of protest, the bill and endorsements, in full or in blank, must be transcribed verbatim as a preliminary to the instrument. The names of the witnesses must be mentioned, as ought also their designations. But the designations are not indispensable; nor do the witnesses sign the instrument.⁴ The notary himself must, according to our practice, make the presentment, or be present; though in some places a different custom prevails. This was said in one Scottish case not to be required in London; and a presentment by the notary's clerk, with an instrument extended by the notary, was thought sufficient.⁵ But it does not appear to be law in England more than here, that the presentment can be made by any one except the notary himself, who is trusted as holding the character of a public officer.⁶

It is no justification of the want of a protest, that the bill was lost: the protest is in that case to be taken on a copy, or on a general statement of the bill as lost.⁷ Where by contrary winds the bill has not arrived in due time, or has been sent to a person whose death, absence, or sickness has prevented the bill from being presented, it would appear that recourse will not be lost, provided a demand for payment be made, and notice sent as soon as possible.⁸ Death, absence, or impossibility of finding the acceptor, drawee, or maker, will not justify the want of protest: it must be made against his heirs, or at his dwelling-house, or at the house where he last had his domicile. Bankruptcy is no justification of want of protest; at least not of want of notice. See below, p. 445.

[415] As acceptance should be pure, the payee is not obliged to take a conditional acceptance, or an acceptance for a part only, or an acceptance at a protracted term; and in that case he must protest to preserve his recourse.⁹ If a partial acceptance be taken, but it shall be sufficient to prove such presentment and dishonour to the effect of preserving recourse as aforesaid by other competent evidence, either written or parole: Provided always, that nothing herein contained shall be taken to affect the necessity for a notarial protest in order to entitle the holder of any bill or note to proceed with summary diligence thereon.']

there cannot, without a protest for non-acceptance as to the residue, be any recourse to that extent.¹ If the holder take the acceptance, though conditional, it becomes absolute to all intents as soon as the condition is performed; and a neglect to give notice of the condition will not in that case liberate the drawer and endorsers.² If the acceptance be partial, a neglect to give notice is available to discharge the responsibility only as to the residue unaccepted.³

The reason for refusal should be stated in the protest.

Protests for non-acceptance may validly be made by any one having the custody of the bill. Protest for not-payment is a disgrace where the bill has been accepted; and it can be taken only by the bill-holder, or one having authority from him.

Under the Stamp Laws, no more than one bill can be included under an instrument of protest.⁴

III. OF INTIMATION OR NOTICE OF DISHONOUR.⁵—Notice is the third indispensable requisite for recourse against the prior endorsers and the drawer. The omission of it imports a legal discharge of all but the person drawn on, or the acceptor of a bill, or maker of a note. This rule may now be held as absolute; although at one time the consideration of the purpose of the notice—namely, that the parties may take measures to secure themselves—so far prevailed as to occasion a great fluctuation of opinion.⁶

FORM OF NOTICE.—No particular form is prescribed for notice. On the Continent it is much more strictly a ‘denonciation de protêt.’⁷ But notice must at least import, 1. That the bill (which should be minutely described and identified) was not accepted or not paid; 2. That it was thereupon protested; and, 3. That the bill-holder claims in recourse against the person to whom the notice is given, the sum in the bill, interest, costs, and re-exchange. The notice must be such as to enable the party not merely to conjecture, or from circumstances to collect, what the bill dishonoured was; but so minute and clear as to make it safe to proceed against the drawer or prior endorser for relief or security.⁸

The notice ought to be accompanied by a copy of the protest; but this seems not to be necessary, at least where the drawer is not abroad.⁹ It must, however, be sent when demanded.

[An exception has been admitted to the requirement of notice, where the drawer has no funds in the hands of the acceptor. In the case of Bickerdike v Bollman, 1 T. R. 405, it was laid down that notice was required to be given to the drawer, because it is presumed that the bill is drawn on account of the drawee having effects of the drawer in his hands, and in order that, if the bill is not accepted, or not paid, he may be able to withdraw them without delay. But, it was said, if the drawer has no effects in the other's hands, he cannot be injured for want of notice, and therefore he is liable to pay although notice has not been given. This exception, however, is only admitted with considerable reserve; and it has been observed in subsequent cases, that it will not be extended to cases differing in their circumstances from that of Bickerdike. It appears that the drawer will be entitled to notice if he had effects on their way to the drawee to meet the bill when presented. Rucker v Hiller, 3 Camp. 217. And where the drawer and drawee have carried on a system of mutual accommodation, and the balance of accommodation is in favour of the drawer, he is entitled to plead want of notice. Ex parte Heath, 2 Ves. and Bea. 240. Since the case of Orr v Magennis, 7 East 359, where the drawer had effects at the time when the bill was drawn, but not when it became due, it has generally been considered that, if at any time after the bill was issued the drawer could reasonably have expected that it would be paid, he has a right to notice. ⁹ Cromwell v Hynson, 2 Espinasse Cases 511; Robins v

[416] It is not indispensable that the notice should be in writing, though that be the most common form of it. It is sufficient to give verbal notice, provided the evidence of such notice be clear.¹ In such verbal notice, the exhibiting of a written intimation sent to the giver of the notice, or of the bill noted, or of the instrument of protest, strengthens the evidence without altering the principle.² In England it is ruled, that if in sending verbal notice to a merchant's counting-house, there be no clerk to answer or take the intimation, it is not necessary to leave or send a written one; the abandoning or shutting of the shop being substantially a refusal to pay.³ Neither is it necessary to seek out the dwelling-house.⁴

It is the usual practice to give notice in writing to the drawer and endorsers, residing in the same place with the holder of the bill, as well as to those at a distance. This appeared in the above case of Sir G. Colebrooke to be the usual practice in Scotland.⁵ But the improvement of the post office establishment affords now the best of all means of communication, and it is universally adopted. The rule has been sustained in England, that if notice is proved to have been put into the general or twopenny post, properly addressed, and in due time, it is sufficient, although said not to have been received.⁶ So also it has been held in Scotland as to the general post;⁷ and in Edinburgh it would seem that the penny post will, in the same way with the twopenny post in London, be available as a proper medium of intimation. It is generally used as such.

Where there is no post, the ordinary mode of conveyance is sufficient, it not being requisite that a special messenger should be sent with the notice, unless there happens to be no regular means of intercourse. Nor is it necessary, when there is a post, or carrier, or [417] packet, to take the opportunity of an irregular conveyance, which, though indirect, may bring the notice sooner.⁸

Gibson, 1813, 1 Maule and Selwyn 288. There was a regular protest; and the drawer having arrived in England before the bill became due, a letter was sent to his house, stating that the bill was dishonoured, but not sending the protest or a copy of it. The Court of King's Bench held that the drawer, having come to England from Buenos Ayres, where the bill was drawn, notice of dishonour, though not of the protest, was sufficient. Lord Ellenborough said the defendant had due notice of the dishonour of the bill; and as the circumstances of parties alter, the rule respecting notice also changes according to the circumstances of the case. If the party is abroad, he cannot know of the fact of the bill having been protested, except by having notice of the protest itself; but if he be at home, it is easy for him, by making inquiry, to ascertain the fact. [Mr. Paton notes that no trace of an appeal is to be found. 3 Pat. 682.] A bill drawn from Glasgow on London was not accepted. Notice by letter was sent to Douglas, Heron, & Co., the endorsers. Their cashier sent the letter to Brown, who had endorsed the bill to Douglas, Heron, & Co.; and Brown read the letter, or showed it to the drawer, which fact he had noted on the cashier's letter. The question was, whether this was good notice to the drawer? The Court of Session, after inquiring into the practice of merchants, held that the notice, as evidenced by Brown's jotting on the letter, confirmed by his testimony, established a sufficient notice.

Next day went in the same way without effect. Lord Ellenborough delivered the opinion of the Court. It was held, that from ten to eleven is a time during which a banking-house should be open, and some person there; that law does not require notice in writing to be left at the counting-house or put into the post office; that there was no one with whom to leave it in this case; and that a letter by post is only one mode of giving notice, and in the same place not the best; and that shutting up shop is substantially a refusal. ⁸ Although in honour one may be bound to seize all opportunities, it may be otherwise in law; and so, to send notice

PROOF OF NOTICE is regulated by the ordinary rules of evidence according to the law of Scotland, except in one respect,—namely, that the objection of interest will not exclude the proof by the marking or testimony of the cashier, or other proper officer of a bank, although he should happen to be a partner of the establishment.¹

TIME FOR NOTICE.—The time for notice is, by the law of Scotland, different in the case of foreign and of inland bills.²

1. In the case of FOREIGN bills, it is expressly declared by statute, 'that notification of dishonour is to be made within such time as is required by the usage and custom of merchants.'³ In England, so far as any rule of law appears to be fixed, it would seem, 1. That to such of the parties as reside in the same place, the notice must be given at furthest by the expiration of the day following, but not necessarily on the day on which the dishonour is known; and if that be Sunday, it is the same as if the arrival were on Monday.⁴ 2. That in successive notices, in the same circumstances, each should have a day to give notice;⁵ and that a bill-holder, placing his bill with his banker to recover payment, in effect augments the number of persons from whom notice must pass by one; and in a question with the drawer and endorsers, time will accordingly be allowed.⁶ 3. That to those who reside elsewhere, notice should be given by the next post, unless that should be so early by the first regular ship bound for the place to which it was to be sent, was held sufficient. Muilman v D'Eguino, 2 Hy. Blackst. 565.

² [An important change in this branch of the law is effected by 19 and 20 Vict. c. 60, secs. 12 and 14. By sec. 12, 'every bill of exchange drawn in any part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the Islands of Man, Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, and Sark, and the islands adjacent to any of them, being part of the dominions of Her Majesty, and made payable in or drawn upon any person resident in any part of the said United Kingdom or islands, shall be deemed to be an inland bill; but nothing herein contained shall alter or affect the stamp duty, if any, which, but for this enactment, would be payable in respect of any such bill.'

By sec. 14 it is enacted, that 'where any inland bill of exchange shall be presented for acceptance or payment, and such acceptance or payment shall be refused, or where any promissory note shall be presented for payment, and payment shall be refused, notice of the dishonour of such bill or promissory note by such refusal to accept or pay shall, in order to entitle the holder to have recourse to any other party, be given in the same manner and within the same time as is required in the case of foreign bills by the law of Scotland.'

With respect to bills drawn in the United Kingdom, and payable in a foreign country, notice of dishonour is well given if given according to the formalities and within the time prescribed by the law of the place of payment. Hirschfeld v Smith, 1 L. ⁵ See much valuable matter in Darbishire v Parker, 6 East 12. The rule laid down since. Scott v Lifford, 9 East 347; Langdale v Trimmer, 15 East 291.

In Bray v Hadwen, 5 Maule and Sel. 68, a bill payable at a banker's in London on 14th July was presented that day about twelve o'clock, and dishonoured. It was returned with notice by post on 15th to Launceston. The letter reached Launceston on Sunday morning, 17th. On Monday, 18th, notice was sent by the bankers there to Bray, by whom the bill had been deposited with them, and Bray forwarded the notice to another endorser, who gave notice to Hadwen. Between the arrival and departure of the post at Launceston there are four hours. The banker there did not put in his letter till after the four hours were expired, by which it did not leave Launceston till next post, and was a day later of reaching Bray. The verdict was for the plaintiff. And on a motion for a new trial, Lord Ellenborough, delivering the opinion of the Court, said: 'It has been laid down, I believe since the case of Darbishire v Parker, as a rule of practice, that each party into whose hands a dishonoured bill may pass, should be allowed one entire day for the purpose of giving notice (see Scott v Lifford, 9 East 347; and Langdale v Trimmer, 15 East 291). A different rule would subject every party to the inconvenience of giving an account of all his other engagements, in order to prove that he could not reasonably be expected to send notice by the same day's post which brought it. This rule is, I believe, in conformity with what Marius states upon the subject of notice, and it has been uniformly acted upon at Guildhall by this Court for some time. It has, moreover, this advantage, that it excludes all discussion as to the particular occupations of the party on the day.'

after the dishonour as to make this impossible, or inconvenient, as a general rule in trade.¹ 4. That if the proper day of notice be a day of public rest,² or of similar sanctity, according [418] to the religion of the person bound to give notice, it will be sufficient on the following day.³

Probably these rules would be followed in Scotland, as grounded in sound discretion and mercantile usage. The same general rule is to be held as established,—namely, that every delay of notice which can fairly be ascribed to neglect or omission, and which is not justified by the circumstances of the case, will be fatal to the claim of the bill-holder.⁴ Mr. Erskine has laid down a rule, ‘that the dishonour must be notified to the drawer or endorser within three posts at furthest.’⁵ But this is not law,⁶ and the Court has sanctioned the general doctrine already alluded to. In applying the doctrine, the Court has sustained the claim of recourse where a post-letter had miscarried.⁷

2. INLAND bills and notes, both in England and in Scotland, are under the regulation of particular statutes. In Scotland, by 12 Geo. III. c. 72, sec. 41 (made perpetual), the rule is, that ‘it shall be sufficient to preserve recourse, if notice is given of the dishonour within fourteen days after the protest is taken.’ In England, also, in the case of inland bills and notes, fourteen days is the term within which protests for non-acceptance or non-payment are to be sent, or notice given of them.⁸ But there is a most remarkable difference in the construction which has been put on those statutes in the two countries, grounded on the difference respecting protests, already explained, p. 438.

In England, prior to the statute of William and of Anne, the remedy on an inland bill or note was not by protest, but simply by noting and reasonable notice; but this gave a demand for the sum in the bill or note only, not for the interest or costs. The Act of William first made it competent to protest inland bills, to the effect of giving a claim for damage, in which is included interest. This claim was given under the condition, first, of a protest; and, secondly, of notice of such protest within the fourteen days.⁹ The remedy on the bill or note itself, for the sum contained in it, still remains on the original footing of reasonable notice;¹⁰ the penalty for neglecting a protest being, that the person ‘failing or neglecting is and shall be liable to all costs, damages, and interest which do or shall accrue thereby.’

In the Scottish Act there is very properly no distinction made between notice for the bill and for the interest and costs. But in borrowing, as we appear to have done, from the [419] English statute, no attention seems to have been paid to the peculiarity of that Act as qualified by the rule of common law; and fourteen days were taken as the term of notice point, but merely that for which I have already quoted it, supra, p. 439, note 8.

⁶ The rule has since been held as ill laid down by Erskine, and not law. Carriek v Harper, 1790, M. 1614.

⁷ Henderson v Duthie, 1799, M. App. Bill of Ex. No. 7. This was a very narrow case, there being something in the address not quite precise. But one principle seems to have influenced the decision which ought not to have been admitted, viz. that the neglect is not a discharge of the claim of recourse, but the ground of a claim of damages; and here there was no damage, the makers of the note being bankrupt before the note fell due.

to rule the whole claim of recourse, without observing that in England that long term of notice was confined to the remedy for costs, damages, and interest. It is enacted, 1. That all inland bills and notes shall be protested, etc., otherwise there shall be no recourse against the drawers or endorsers; 2. That it shall be sufficient to preserve the said recourse, if notice is given of the dishonour within fourteen days. These words are too strong to be overcome but by the Legislature. And it is heartily to be wished that a remedy were so applied; for while in practice the rule is generally understood to be the same as in England, and similar to that which regulates the notice on foreign bills, so that a drawer or endorser concludes the bill to be paid if he has no notice within the same short time as in foreign bills, it has been decided under this statute that notice on inland bills and promissory notes at the distance of twelve days is sufficient.¹ It is so far happy, that in this question an English bill drawn on Scotland, or a bill from Scotland drawn on England, is held not to be inland;² so that the effect of the peculiar structure of the Act of 12 Geo. III. is strictly confined to Scotland.

Whether, according to the true construction of the words, 'if notice is given of the dishonour within fourteen days,' it is necessary that the notice shall have been actually received, or sufficient that it shall have been despatched, has not yet been determined. The safe course undoubtedly is, to take care that the notice shall actually reach the party within the term; and there will naturally be a disposition judicially to enforce this as the true construction, considering how far the rule of the Act stretches beyond the utmost licence of mercantile usage, and how reprehensible it must ever be to delay for a day that notice on which the safety of the party may depend. But, on the other hand, the words are precise enough, and may be thought rather to be pointed to the act of him from whom the notice is to proceed. There is a case now depending on this point, in which probably the rule of construction may be settled.

BY WHOM NOTICE IS TO BE GIVEN.—The notice of dishonour is to be given by the bill-holder; or by one who is empowered to act as his agent in that matter; or by one who has himself been called upon to answer for the bill, and who on doing so will have a claim of recourse. Information from a third party, not thus interested or entitled to give notice, or to act for the holder, is unavailing to preserve recourse to the proper party.³ But if [420]

¹ Baird v Belch, 9 July 1803, Mr. Baron Hume's papers. A bill was drawn by M'Gregor & Co. of Glasgow on John Hill of the same city for £178, and was after acceptance endorsed to James Baird, also of Glasgow, and again by him endorsed to D. & T. Bryce of Glasgow, by whom it was discounted with Andrew Belch, a banker, and by him made over to J. Belch. The bill was due 21st October 1802. Verbal notice was given of the dishonour to D. & T. Bryce, but none whatever to the other endorsers or to the drawer till 3d November, when a written notice put into the post office by Belch on the 2d reached Baird. Summary diligence was then raised against Baird; and in a suspension he pleaded the palpable if not fraudulent neglect to give notice for twelve days. The answer was grounded on the statute. Lord Cullen held Baird liable, and gave costs; and to this judgment the Court adhered.

Buller, J., says: 'The purpose of giving notice is to let the party know that he is looked to for payment, that he may have his remedy over by an early application;' 'and a notice from another person cannot be sufficient: it must be from the holder.' Ashhurst, J.: 'Notice means something more than knowledge, because it is competent to the holder to give credit to the maker (or drawer):' 'the party ought to know whether the holder intends to give credit to the drawer, or to resort to him.'

In Barclay ex parte, 7 Vesey 597, Kemp drew two bills on Dearlow, which were afterwards endorsed by Clay to Barclay. They were dishonoured, and of this Clay gave notice to Kemp. A commission having been issued against Kemp, Barclay petitioned to be admitted to prove under it: the question was, whether the notice from Clay, and not from Barclay, was sufficient? Lord Eldon, Chancellor, held that the notice ought to have come from the holder, and dismissed the petition.

Stewart v Kennet, 1809, 2 Camp. 177. The notice must be by the holder himself, or some one authorized by him, and not by a stranger.

Baker v Birch, 3 Camp. 107. Here the acceptor went to the drawer a few days before the bill became due, and told him he could not pay it, and gave him five guineas, being all notice has been given to one endorser, he may, even before paying the bill, give notice to the drawer or another endorser, that shall be available to the holder.¹

TO WHOM NOTICE IS TO BE GIVEN.—The rule is, that notice must be given to every one against whom the holder means to claim his recourse. In his selection of persons to be responsible to him, the holder is not restrained by any rule. He is not bound to give notice to the drawer, though it seems once to have been thought that if he did not, he discharged the endorsers.² He may select the last endorser, who will of course be entitled to his remedy against the others; or he may restrict his demand to an intermediate endorser, by which of course he will discharge the subsequent endorsers,³ and also the prior, including the drawer, if that intermediate endorser do not give notice.

It is an important question, how this rule is to be applied as to inland bills and notes in Scotland. If it is sufficient to give notice of the protest within fourteen days, the holder may on the fourteenth day make his demand on any endorser. How is that endorser to secure his relief against the other endorsers, including the drawer? The natural rule should be that of reasonable notice to those against whom the endorser might choose to take recourse,⁴ the statute ruling only the notice by the bill-holder; and yet it is much to be wished that the words of the Act were held strong enough to require within the fourteen days, notice to all against whom recourse is to be preserved; and it would in that case seem to follow that even against the last endorser recourse would be lost by such a delay as should discharge his recourse against the rest.

It is held in England, that notice to one of several partners, or joint drawers or endorsers, is notice to them all.⁵ This will also be held sufficient in Scotland.

It is sufficient to give notice to a clerk in the counting-house of the drawer or endorser. But it would not seem to be sufficient to give notice to a clerk met in the street, or in any other place not appropriate to his master's business.

[421] IV. EQUIVALENTS OF PROTEST AND NOTICE, AND WAIVING OF NEGOTIATION.—1. The death, imprisonment, known insolvency, or bankruptcy of the acceptor, are not equivalent to notice of dishonour given to the drawer or endorser. This is settled in England by many cases.⁶

he could command, for that purpose. The drawer received the five guineas, and promised to take up the bill. The bill was not presented for payment till some days after it was due. There were two questions: Whether the want of notice discharged the drawer? and whether he held the five guineas for the bill-holder? Lord Ellenborough was of opinion 'that the defendant was discharged upon the bill for want of due notice, but that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the five guineas as money had and received to his use.'

This contradicts Shaw v Croft, cor. Lord Kenyon, 1798.

But the matter seems to be thrown into doubt by an opinion of Lord Ellenborough in the case of Rosher v Kieran, 1814, 4 Camp. 87, where Kieran drew a bill for £1000 on Rowcroft, which was accepted and endorsed to Rosher, but not paid when due. On the same day the acceptor wrote to the drawer that he had not paid the bill, and that it was in the hands of Rosher. 'Lord Ellenborough held this notice from the acceptor sufficient, and the plaintiff had a verdict.' [See Sim. Merc. Law, 7th ed. 250.]

² In Bromley v Frazier, 1 Strange 441, this negatived in the case of a foreign bill. And in Heylin v Adamson, 2 Burrows 669, it was negatived in the case of an inland bill.

These two reports deserve very attentive perusal, as laying down the law in the most satisfactory way, in all the three cases of bills of exchange, inland bills, and promissory notes.

Esdale v Sowerby, 11 East 114, where the endorser knew that the acceptor had no funds, and that the drawer as well as acceptor were insolvent. The Court were clear that the insolvency of the drawer and acceptor, and the knowledge of it, did not dispense with the necessity of giving notice of the dishonour of the bill.

Nicholson v Gouthit, 2 H. Blackst. 609. This was a very strong case of knowledge of the acceptor's insolvency; and the Court were satisfied that the justice of the case was with the bill-holder. But instead of trying to reach the justice of the case, perhaps it is better, said the Chief Justice, to adhere to a rule, however strict, than relax it. It sounds harsh that

In Scotland, some doubts seem once to have prevailed;¹ but a clear series of cases has established the necessity of notice.²

The bankruptcy or insolvency of the drawer is no excuse for not giving notice to him, or to the trustee, etc., on his estate.³ In England it once was otherwise held (by Lord Thurlow), but it has been since settled that notice must be given.⁴

Whatever infers knowledge at once of the dishonour and of the resolution to claim recourse, so as to entitle the endorser or drawer to take measures of precaution against the acceptor or others, would seem to be equivalent to notice; as a meeting of the parties for arranging their responsibility.⁵

2. The parties may by anticipation WAIVE the rules of negotiation, or may dis- [422] charge the objection afterwards; and this will be a good answer to the objection of want of protest or notice. Thus:—

(1.) If the drawer say to the holder before the bill falls due, that he has no regular residence, and that he will call and see whether the bill has been paid by the acceptor, it is a waiving of notice.⁶ (2.) Payment of a part, after neglect known to the endorser,⁷ or a promise to pay the whole, in full knowledge of the default,⁸ will bar the exception of want of notice. But such payment or promise will not be sufficient if made in ignorance,⁹ or on the supposition of liability when truly not liable.¹⁰ It would seem that the waiver must a known bankruptcy should not be equivalent to a demand or notice; but the rule is too strong to be dispensed with.

Ex parte Wilson, 11 Ves. 412.

Boulton v Stubbs, 18 Ves. 21. In these cases the Lord Chancellor held the rule to be settled. [See Sm. Merc. Law, 249.]

² The first is a very clear case. Langley v Hog, 1748, M. 1574. This was a bill on London at forty-five days, endorsed by Hog; not protested till two days after the days of grace were out. The acceptor was bankrupt, and in the Gazette some days before the bill fell due; and this was known to Hog, the endorser, so that he wrote to his correspondent to pay on protest for his honour. 'Found that no recourse lay, the bill not having been protested in due time.'

Ferguson & Co. v Belch, 1803, M. App. Bill of Ex. No. 13. This was a bill on London accepted; but before it was due, Risk the acceptor was a bankrupt. It was due on 3d June, not protested till 29th. Held that, the bill not being duly negotiated, there was no recourse.

Thomson, Still, & Co. v M'Ruer, 20 Jan. 1808, 15 Fac. Coll. 68, note. This was an inland bill drawn by M'Ruer and accepted by Fleming, and endorsed to Thomson, Still, & Co. It was due 24th April, but no notice to drawer till 17th June. The acceptor had previously been imprisoned, and cited the drawer as one of his creditors in a cessio. This was offered to be proved by the drawer's oath, and the point was the relevancy of this fact if proved. Lord Robertson held the private knowledge insufficient to supply the want of notice. The Court unanimously approved of this determination, and of the principle on which it proceeded.

Calder v Lyal, 22 Dec. 1808, 15 Fac. Coll. 66. The bills here were drawn by Calder, accepted by Paterson, and endorsed to Petrie, and then to Lyal. Paterson was sequestered 6th August, the bills due in September. On Paterson's bankruptcy Lyal lodged money with his agent to retire the bills. They were dishonoured and protested, and notice given to Lyal, but none to Calder the drawer for seventeen days. Lyal demanded recourse against Calder. But the Court approved of the decision in Thomson, Still, & Co.'s case, and held the rule to be without any exception but that of the case of accommodation bills.

⁵ Coulter v Martin, 1775, M. 1601, where the drawer of a bill having pleaded want of due notice of the acceptor's failure, the Court held it a sufficient answer that in a conveyance to trustees for his creditors he had acknowledged the holder as a creditor for £518, which was admitted to comprehend the bill, and it was not regarded that by a clause of the deed it was stipulated that this enumeration of the debts did not discharge objections. This decision may be doubted.

Something like this took place in Irvine's case, supra, note 1.

¹⁰ Borrodale v Lowe, 1811, 4 Taunt. 93, where the endorser be express in the case of an endorser, although a drawer may impliedly waive his defence.¹

Ignorance of the neglect to give notice, though it may entitle an endorser to recover from the bill-holder the money wrongfully paid, will not entitle him to demand recourse from the drawer or other prior endorser acquainted with the neglect.² But there may be a neglect which would be fatal to a claim of recourse by the person guilty of it, which yet will not affect an onerous endorsee. Thus, the holder of a bill drawn at a day certain is not required to present it for acceptance (p. 433); but if he do present it, he must give notice (p. 434). If such bill, however, have been after such presentment, and without notice, endorsed to a stranger for value, he will not be liable to the objection of want of notice.³ But where, from the bill itself, or the attendant circumstances, knowledge of the objection is necessarily to be inferred, it would be otherwise; as if there were a noting on the bill, or if the bill were past due.⁴

[423] What has now been laid down as to Presentment, Protest, and Notice, applies to the case of Bills for Value. Accommodation Bills will be considered afterwards.

Before leaving this subject, there are two observations to which it may be useful to attend.

1. The holder of a bill may, at the time of its dishonour, be in possession of funds belonging to the acceptor; and the drawer and endorsers have a clear interest to insist that he shall apply those funds in extinction of the bill, before claiming recourse against them. The same interest arises to the creditors of the drawer and endorsers on their bankruptcy. Taking the simplest case of a sum of money in the hands of the holder of the bill on the day of payment, without any other debt between those parties on which the bill-holder can claim right to apply the fund in security of other engagements; and supposing that no competing creditor has interfered with diligence to attach the fund, it would appear that the bill-holder would be bound to apply the moneys in his hands in extinction of the bill.⁵ But of a bill wrote that he would not remit till he received the bill, and desired that it might be returned to a certain banker, who was an endorser subsequent to him; but afterwards discovering that in law he was discharged, refused to pay. The Court of Common Pleas held that this was no express promise, but a letter written under supposition that he was liable.

[A subsequent promise to pay made by an endorser of a bill who has had no notice of dishonour, is a waiver of the right to notice. Woods v Dean, 3 B. and S. 101. It would seem that such a promise may be treated by a court of law as evidence or admission of due negotiation in all respects, and that a drawer or endorser will not be allowed to set up a defence of ignorance after making such a promise. See Campbell v Webster, 2 C. B. 258, where this doctrine was established, with reference to a plea founded on the absence of a protest in the case of a foreign bill, upon an elaborate review of the authorities. The doctrine was applied to exclude a defence of non-presentment in Mitchell v Allhusen, 13 April 1870, 8 Macpherson. The rule is obviously an equitable one. An endorser is allowed to evade liability under his subscription, if the bill was either not presented for payment, or not duly intimated, and no inquiry is allowed as to whether his remedy against the drawer or prior endorsers was thereby lost. But if he promise to pay without inquiry, he must be held to have satisfied himself, either that the bill was duly negotiated, or that he is morally bound to pay notwithstanding the informality.]

³ O'Keeffe v Dunn, 1815, 6 Taunton 305. The bill here was drawn by Dunn on Rickets at one month after date. Sinclair, the payee, presented it for acceptance; but it was refused, of which no notice was given. Sinclair then endorsed the bill to O'Keeffe, who presented it for acceptance; and it was again refused, when he took recourse in the regular way against the drawer. The defence was discharge by laches of the payee. Lord Chief Justice Gibbs, with Dallas, J., and Heath, J., were clearly of opinion that a holder not being bound to present a bill for acceptance, and there being nothing on the face of an unaccepted bill to awaken a suspicion that it has been presented for acceptance and refused, the endorsee was entitled to recover. Mr. Justice Chambre dissented from this opinion. He founded on Roscoe v Hardy, which the Chief Justice explained.

⁴ Lord Chief Justice Gibbs said, in O'Keeffe's case: 'He who takes a bill after it has arrived at maturity, takes it subject to all the defences which could have been made by any previous holder; for the bill being unpaid, its date is notice to him sufficient to put him on inquiry. But if he takes the bill before it is due, he takes it not subject to the same infirmity of title, because he then takes it without notice of any suspicious circumstances that may break in upon his remedy against any former holder.' This is the general law.

⁵ In Calder & Co. v Leith Bank, 30 May 1816, Calder & Co. had discounted with the Leith Bank a bill for £330, of which

if the holder have other transactions with the acceptor, and is creditor on them, he seems to be entitled by compensation to secure himself, and to resist the demand of the drawer and endorsers to apply it for their relief.¹ And if, instead of a sum of money, the holder of the bill be only in possession of a security given on another account, but out of which he might himself derive relief, it does not appear that a drawer or endorser will be held entitled to an assignment of such security on paying the bill.²

[424] 2. If the holder of the bill happen to be indebted to any of the parties to the bill on another account, it may be of importance for him, on the supposition of the person to whom he is so indebted becoming a bankrupt, not to discount the bill: for if he be a debtor of that person on the bill at the time of his bankruptcy, he will by compensation or set-off be secure; whereas he may be deprived of this security if the bill be not in his possession at the time.³

DEMAND BY ONE ACCEPTING, OR PAYING ON PROTEST.—A friend or agent of any of the parties to a bill may accept it supra protest for their honour, and then he will be liable to all the parties in the bill, except to him for whose honour he has accepted; and on paying under such protest, will have a good claim against the person for whom he has accepted, and against all who in the bill are responsible to him.⁴ Or an accepted bill may in the same way be paid supra protest; and then the person paying will have his remedy against that person for whom he has so interposed, and against all who on the bill are responsible to that person.

The proofs of a claim by him who thus accepts and pays, or who after due acceptance pays supra protest, are the protest and act of honour, with the retired bill, and evidence of notice. The bill should be first protested before it is accepted or paid for honour of any of the parties: for, on the one hand, that is the sole check against officious, or fraudulent, or malicious interference for a sinister purpose; and, on the other, without protest, there can be no recourse against those responsible to him for whose honour the interference is.⁵

John Sibbald & Co. were the acceptors. A month before the bill was due, John Sibbald & Co. failed. At this time it was understood that John Sibbald & Co. had funds in the Leith Bank, who were their bankers; and Calder & Co., in a letter to the bank, desired that if such funds were in their hands, they should be applied in extinction of the bill. The bank did not acknowledge the existence of such funds, but alleged that the account was unsettled, and the result doubtful. Calder & Co. suspended a charge on the bill. The Court, 'in respect that it is not established that there are any funds in the hands of the chargers,' refused the bill of suspension. Even in these circumstances, where the balance, though not ascertained, might exist, the judges were equally divided, and Lord Craigie was called on as Lord Ordinary to give his opinion. Had the balance been clear, and the fund unquestionable and free, the plea of Calder & Co. would have been sustained. Session papers.

In Cowan & Sons v Hurry, 19 Dec. 1816, 19 Fac. Coll. 241, a similar plea was urged by the acceptor of a bill, which was said to be for the drawer's accommodation. He insisted that the bank, who held a general security for the balance that might arise on the drawer's bank account, were not entitled to payment from him or the acceptor without assigning their mortgage, reserving their own interest in it. The late Lord Reston passed the bill of suspension; but the Court altered the judgment, on the ground 'that the suspending of a charge on an accepted bill by an onerous endorsee, upon a claim by the party paying it for an assignation of a security for a general balance held by the endorsee against another debtor in the bill, even a prior debtor, was without authority and precedent, and would destroy the currency of bills; and that this held more particularly in the present case, where the party demanding the assignation was ex facie of the bill the primary debtor, and proposed to establish by extrinsic evidence that another party to the bill was truly the primary debtor; that a charge on a bill by an onerous endorsee could not be suspended on an allegation that it was accepted without value; that in a question of payment of a bill, nothing can be believed except what appears ex facie of it; and that any claims which the different obligants may have against each other must be settled by a separate action afterwards.'

In the English case of Crosse v Smith, 1 Maule and Sel. 545, the same plea made one point in the case, but seems to have been rejected on two grounds: 1. That the banker had a right to set off the money in striking the balance on his own transactions; and, 2. That at the bankruptcy of Tuke the bill did not constitute an item in his banker's account.

² See the case of Cowan & Sons, supra. Mr. Thomson has contended for an opposite result in these supposed cases, on the analogy of indefinite payment. But his argument is not so correctly deduced on this occasion as his reasoning generally is. Tr. on Bills of Exchange, 420-423.

1. The drawee may refuse to accept simply where he has no funds, and yet after protest accept for honour of the drawer, or of any one of the endorsers; or a stranger to the bill may after protest accept for the honour of the drawer or any of the endorsers. In accepting for the drawer's honour, he will have his remedy only against the drawer, and will be responsible to all the other parties, as if the bill were regularly accepted. The use of acceptance supra protest, is to prevent the bill from going back with charges against the parties in the bill. Naturally, the acceptance is in honour of the drawer's order; but it may be made for any of the other parties, to the effect of the acceptor being liable to all to whom that party is responsible, and of preserving the remedy against that party, and those who are responsible to him, provided the acceptance is made specially for him, and notice given.¹

2. In paying for honour, the bill should in the same way be protested first. The person so paying will have his remedy against him for whom he interposes, and against all on whom, had that person paid it, he would have had recourse.² But to give such claim there must not only be protest of dishonour, but notice given.³ 3. The person on whom a bill is drawn may have accepted on the faith of provision being made for the bill; and if it be not made, he may suffer the bill to be protested on the day of payment, and then pay supra protest, to the effect of securing his recourse against the drawer.⁴

There is an exception to the rules of protest and notice in the case of a bill drawn on a person who has not effects of the drawer in his hands with which to answer the draft. [425] But this case it may be better to consider in the next Section, along with the case of accommodation bills. See below, p. 450.

There is no exemption from those rules, although the bill is held only in security, or as a deposit.⁵

The bill-holder may enter his claim against all the parties who are liable on the bill; and from each he may claim the whole sum, taking care, 1. That he deduct, in making such claim, whatever he has already received from the estates of other obligants,⁶ and whatever he is entitled to receive from dividends already declared;⁷ and, 2. That he do not, on the whole, draw more than his full debt, but leave the excess for the relief of the other parties..

One who acquires a bill or note (whether originally a real or only an accommodation bill) for a smaller sum than that for which it is drawn (as in pledge of a debt due to him to a less amount), may enter a claim to the full amount of the bill or note against each of the other parties, although he cannot draw on the whole more than the amount of the debt for which it was pledged;¹ but, on the estate of him who gave him the bill or note in security, he can enter his claim for nothing but the actual debt² for which the bill was pledged.

REMEDY TO THE BILL-HOLDER BEYOND THE BILL.—The question has been already considered, how far the endorsee of a bill which has been guaranteed by a separate letter is entitled to the use of that guarantee, freed from any latent exceptions pleadable by the granter of the guarantee against him who originally held it.³ But there is a prevailing notion among bankers, still more questionable perhaps,—namely, that on discounting a bill a banker is entitled to all the remedies extraneous to that instrument, which the drawer might have exercised as creditor under the contract out of which the bill originated. If a bill, for example, has been accepted by one who has ordered goods which ostensibly are for himself, but which turn out to be for the use of a joint adventure in which others are concerned, bankers hold that, by acquiring that bill, they acquire also by implied contract a right of demand against all the joint adventurers. But this seems to be extremely questionable, and to involve considerations which deserve to be well weighed. The banker, in buying a bill, seems to be the purchaser merely of the remedies competent on that instrument; and although the drawer may have a remedy beyond this, and may assign it with the bill, or may even in equity be bound to communicate the benefit of it, the [426] bill-holder should have no ground of action without assignment, in respect of the original contract of sale, any more than he would be liable to any latent exceptions on account of the quality of goods, which might enable the acceptor effectually to resist a demand by the drawer himself.

SECTION II.—DEMANDS ON ACCOMMODATION BILLS AND NOTES.⁴

Besides the proper mercantile use of bills and notes in transmitting money from one country to another, and in bringing into a discountable form the prices of goods sold on credit, so that the debt may be used as money, there is another purpose to which this form of obligation has been applied,—namely, to supply traders, on occasion of sudden difficulties, or as the means of speculation, with money and commodities by the loan of credit. Bills and notes so used have been called ACCOMMODATION or WIND BILLS. In this species of transaction, the person requiring the accommodation prevails with his friend to accept a note or bill for the sum to be raised, at such a date as a banker will discount; it being understood, that he for whose use the bill is intended is to provide the means of paying it, or is himself to retire it. This bill is discounted, and produces money; and if he who receives the money provides for the due payment of the bill, the transaction is closed. This is done sometimes as a single transaction on the footing of mere friendship: it is sometimes done in consideration of a commission: and not unfrequently credit is thus supplied by means of a course of bills drawn and redrawn, the expense of which in interest and commission is enormous.⁵

² Lord Chancellor Eldon, in Bloxam ex parte, said: 'I look upon it as settled that you cannot hold the paper of the bankrupt, and prove beyond your actual debt upon it; but that you may have the paper of third persons, those persons being indebted to your debtor in more; and you may prove to the whole amount, not exceeding 20s. in the pound upon your original debt.' 6 Ves. 449. ⁵ [See Add. Cont. 6th ed. 794.] This ruinous expedient was one chief cause of the fall of the Douglas Bank in Scotland in the year 1772. The expense of drawing and redrawing on London, and of the securities necessary to maintain this circulation, was so great as to exhaust the resources of the bank, and mainly to produce the failure.

But persons under the necessity of adopting this expedient, generally agree with some house which requires the same sort of accommodation, that they shall mutually draw on each other, or exchange acceptances, or even exchange the more dangerous instruments called skeleton bills. Sometimes it is necessary to have two or three houses engaged in the traffic; and the creation of fictitious firms, the use of feigned names, the careful avoidance of the same train of discounts, are the dangerous and discreditable expedients into which this ruinous practice leads the parties. This is not the place in which to discuss the question of policy, whether this trade in fictitious bills ought to be suppressed? and if so, how far courts of law can exercise a wholesome control over it? The purpose of this work is merely to state the law on the several points which may arise. But it is a subject of sincere regret with every one who considers this subject, that parties have ever been permitted to depart, in these accommodation transactions, from the character which they bear on the face of the bill, or to pretend to rights not strictly belonging to the place which, on the document, they profess to hold.

The obligations and the rights of parties to bills are different in the case of accommodation bills and in that of bills in real transactions.

1. In real bills the acceptor is the primary debtor, as holder of the drawer's funds, or indebted to him for money which by his acceptance he acknowledges. Each endorser also is debtor to the endorsee, by having received value from him for the endorsement of the original engagement of the acceptor, and is bound to guarantee that engagement for the endorser's indemnification; and the bill-holder is entitled to go back on the whole of the previous parties, who are jointly and severally responsible to him on the dishonour of the bill.

2. Accommodation bills are either entirely so or partially. So far as no money or other consideration passes, they are accommodation bills: they become bills in real transactions [427] from the moment that money is advanced upon them. As a bill is a mandate to pay money for the drawer, the effect of acceptance where there are no funds is, on payment by the acceptor, to raise a debt against the drawer. And so in regard to endorsation, each endorsation, where no money is given for it, is the creation of a debt against him for whose use it is intended, on the endorser paying the bill. The person for whose use a bill of this kind is made is the primary debtor, the others are sureties. Where they engage by concert, or in the knowledge of each other's accommodation to the same person, they are co-cautioners in so far as concerns their reciprocal responsibility intra se. To the bill-holder, where he is not one of the accommodators, they are all responsible, jointly and severally, as if the bill had originated in a real transaction.

This difference in the nature of these two kinds of bills deserves attention in several respects.

I. RULES AS TO PROTEST AND NOTICE.—Accommodation bills are not regulated by the same rules in this respect as onerous bills. The bill-holder, if an onerous bona fide holder, has not only all the advantages held by the endorsee of a real bill, but he may have the benefit also of not being bound to the same strictness of notice. Thus:

1. Where one has drawn a bill on a person not in possession of funds to answer it, and passed it as a real bill, he cannot defend himself on the plea of neglect of protest or of notice, against the bill-holder's claim of recourse, in consequence of the refusal of the person drawn upon to accept. It will be an answer to that plea, that he necessarily was apprised of the dishonour, and required no notice, since he was by the instrument truly bound to pay it himself as primary debtor. This is settled law in England,¹ and rules the case of the

was a creditor of the bankrupt, so much of the petitioning creditor's debt had, in consequence of his having failed to give notice of the dishonour, been discharged? Mr. Justice Ashhurst says: 'It has never been disputed that the want of dishonour both of an unaccepted draft and even of an accepted bill, the only difference between these cases being, that the acceptance is prima facie evidence of effects, which the holder must redargue; whereas the onus probandi to show effects seems to lie with the drawer where acceptance has been refused.¹ This rule proceeds not on the ground that in such a case the drawer does not suffer by want of notice. For it has been held, that where truly there were no effects, evidence cannot be offered to show that by want of notice damage has occurred collaterally.² The doctrine has been placed on a different [428] footing; namely, that the drawer of the bill, in drawing with previous knowledge that he has no effects in the hands of the person drawn on, and that the bill will be dishonoured, if not guilty of a fraud, at least takes an accommodation, which it requires no notice to inform him he must provide for.

2. But the bill-holder must run his risk of the defence, grounded on want of notice, being available or otherwise; and so, wherever a drawer has good ground for drawing, he is held entitled to notice of dishonour, as otherwise he is exposed to a sudden and unexpected demand to pay a bill which he thought was provided for. Accordingly, where there were effects at the time of drawing, that has been held sufficient to entitle the drawer to notice, although the balance has afterwards shifted;³ and it does not seem to be sufficient to notice to the drawer after the dishonour of the bill is tantamount to payment to him. But that rule is not without exceptions; and particularly, notice is not necessary to be given where the drawer has no effects in the hands of the drawee. Mr. Justice Buller says: 'The law requires notice to be given for this reason, because it is presumed that the bill is drawn on account of the drawee's having effects of the drawer's in his hands; and if the latter has notice that the bill is not accepted or not paid, he may withdraw them immediately. But if he has no effects in the other's hands, then he cannot be injured for want of notice.' And he proceeds to state a case, where at Guildhall he had directed a full special jury in that way, who found accordingly. Besides laying down the doctrine thus, Mr. Justice Buller puts it in another view, more in the way of special pleading: 'It has been truly argued that the question is not whether an action could be maintained on the bill itself, but whether the want of notice extinguishes the debt; as to which the case is this: A not having any effects in C's hand, draws a bill of exchange for £100 on him in favour of B for value received. Now, if C does not accept, and B does not give notice to A, there is an end of the bill. Then how does the case stand? A has £100 of B's in his hand without any consideration, which therefore B may undoubtedly recover in an action for money had and received.' The case was decided in favour of the bill-holder, the Court being of opinion that there was no sufficient neglect to discharge the petitioning creditor's debt, because here the drawer had no effects in the hands of the drawee, and could not therefore be injured, and is not entitled to any notice.

This followed as a precedent in Goodall v Dolley, 1 Term. Rep. 712, and in Legge v Thorpe, 12 East 171; Rogers v Stevens, 2 Term. Rep. 713. See below, note 2. [Sm. Merc. L. 258; and see editor's note, supra, p. 439.]

² Rogers v Stevens, 2 Term. Rep. 713, where a bill was drawn by Stevens from Newfoundland on Birbeck & Blake in favour of Rogers, for value given to Calvert. Acceptance was refused, and the bill was protested; but no notice sent to

Stevens, and he on this grounded his defence. Lord Kenyon, at Guildhall, directed a verdict for Rogers, on the ground that the drawers had no effects. On a motion for new trial, and on the rule to show cause, Stevens further stated that by want of notice he had suffered damage: for Calvert and he had dealings from which he had right to draw on Calvert, and Calvert desired him to draw on Birbeck & Blake, his agents, instead of drawing on himself; and that believing, from having no notice, that this draft was honoured, he settled accounts with Calvert, gave him credit for the payment, and delivered up goods and effects of greater value than the amount of the bill. The new trial was refused. Mr. Justice Ashurst said: 'The case being now fully established, that notice of non-acceptance of a bill of exchange to the drawer is not necessary where the drawee has no effects belonging to the drawer in his hands, every person must be supposed to know the law. And when the plaintiff found that the drawees of this bill had none of the defendant's effects in their hands, he knew that he was not bound by law to give notice of the non-acceptance. He was not bound to take cognizance of any private transactions between the drawer and a third person, which did not appear on the face of the bill.'

discharge the necessity of giving notice, that the drawer might have known of the shifting of the balance. Where he does actually know, however, that there is no balance,—as where, by an account rendered, he sees the balance against him; or where the balance, being in his favour, is paid over to him,—it would appear that notice will not be necessary.¹ And where the drawer has effects in the hands of the person drawn on, although it turns out on the balance of accounts that the debt is against him, it has been held that he is entitled to notice, as he might in these circumstances expect that his bill would be accepted.² [429] The doctrine appears to extend to all cases in which there was at the time good ground to look for acceptance.³ Where the drawer, at any time between the time of drawing and the time of the bill falling due, has effects in the drawee's hands, he is entitled to notice.⁴

3. In Scotland, recourse is not lost by the omission of protest and notice, if the person drawn on had no effects of the drawer in his hands.⁵ No case has occurred to bring out the question, which has been decided in England, as already stated above,—namely, whether the exemption from the necessity of giving notice is to be extended to the case of effects in the drawee's hands at the date of drawing, where those effects have been withdrawn before the bill is presented? But the true case for the application of the rule, that no notice is necessary where there are no effects, is that of a proper accommodation bill. Accordingly, where the bill is drawn for the accommodation of the drawer, and he is to provide for it, no notice to the drawer is requisite.⁶ Where, however, the accommodation is not for the lowed on the same ground; but no case has gone the length of extending the exemption further to cases where the drawee had effects of the drawer in his hands at the time of the bill drawn, though the balance might vary afterwards, and be turned into the opposite scale. And I know it has been a subject of regret with the very learned person who was counsel for the plaintiffs in that case' (Lord Chancellor Eldon), 'that the old rule requiring notice to be given in all cases to the drawer of the non-acceptance of his bill was so far broken in upon. But I shall anxiously resist the further extension of the exemption. The case is different where there are no effects of the drawer in the hands of the drawee at the time, because the drawer must know that he is drawing on accommodation; but if he have effects at the time, it would be very dangerous and inconvenient, merely on account of the shifting of a balance, to hold notice not to be necessary: it would be introducing a number of collateral issues, in every case upon a bill of exchange to examine how the account stood between the drawer and drawee from the time the bill was drawn down to the time it was dishonoured.' [Sm. Merc. L. 7th ed. 258.]

² Blackhan v Doren, 1810, 2 Camp. 503. Doren drew a bill in Jamaica on Hunter & Co. of London for £250. Acceptance was refused; and it was proved that, when the bill was presented, Hunter & Co. had produce in their hands to the amount of £1500, but that he owed them £10,000, and that they had appropriated the effects towards satisfaction of this debt. In these circumstances action was brought against Doren, as drawer, without notice or protest. Lord Ellenborough said: 'If a man draws upon a house with whom he has no account, he knows that the bill will not be accepted: he can suffer no injury from the want of notice of dishonour, and therefore he is not entitled to such notice. But the case is quite otherwise where the drawer has a fluctuating balance in the hands of the drawee. Here notice is peculiarly requisite.

Without this, how can the drawer know that credit has been refused to him, and that his bill has been dishonoured? It is said here, that the effects in the hands of the drawees were all appropriated to discharge their own debt; but that appropriation should appear by writing, and the defendant should be a party to it. I wish that notice had never been dispensed with, and then we should not have been troubled with investigating accounts between drawer and drawee. I certainly will not relax the rule still further, which I should do if I were to hold that notice was unnecessary in the present instance. Plaintiff nonsuited.

³ See Legge v Thorpe, 12 East 171; particularly Lord Ellenborough, 176.

In Rucker v Hiller, 3 Camp. 217, bills were drawn on consignments; but one cargo, against which the bill in question was drawn, was detained in Russia, and spoiled. Lord Ellenborough held notice necessary.

In Robins v Gibson, ib. 334, the bill was drawn on a cargo, the proceeds of which were expected to be with the drawer. Lord Ellenborough held notice necessary.

⁶ M'Adam v M'William, 1787, M. 1613, where M'William drew bills for his own accommodation, which were accepted, but not paid by the acceptor. No notice of the dishonour was given to the drawer, who pleaded neglect. I see from a note of Mr. Ross, Dean of Faculty, that the Court was unanimous in holding that a wind bill intended to be retired by the drawer does not require strict negotiation and notice of dishonour in order to give recourse against the drawer, and that when the drawee has no effects of the drawer in his hands, recourse lies against the drawer without notice.

This confirmed, M'Alpine & Co.'s Crs. v Carsons, 1792, M.

drawer's behoof, but for the use of some of the other parties on the bill (as the acceptor), the drawer has been held entitled to notice.¹

4. In accommodation bills, concerted by the parties for the purpose of aiding or [430] raising money for one of their number, the understanding is, that he for whose use the money is to be raised shall provide for the bill; and as each person engaged, with the exception of him for whose behoof they interpose, has an action or remedy in case he be made to pay the bill, he is entitled to notice.² In Scotland, as already stated, this has been extended to the drawer, who has been held entitled to notice where the accommodation was for behoof of another.³

5. But it does not appear that in Scotland this has ever been carried so far as to entitle the acceptor to notice, and freedom on the neglect of it. This doctrine was held in England by Lord Ellenborough, a great authority in mercantile law, who, following the principle already explained, that a draft on one who has no funds is a mandate, which, when answered, raises a debt directly against the drawer, ruled that where a bill is within the knowledge of all the parties an accommodation bill, the acceptor can only be considered as a surety for the drawer; that the case is the same as if the bill, being for a real debt, had been drawn by the acceptor, and accepted by the drawer; in which case time given to the acceptor would have discharged the drawer.⁴ But this doctrine has not been approved 1617; and Hill v Menzies & Anderson's Crs., 1805, M. App. Bill of Ex. No. 13.

See the English case, Collet v Haigh, 3 Camp. 281.

It may be observed, however, that in the case of M'Adam, Lord Braxfield appears to have laid down the proposition too broadly, in holding the burden of proof to be on the drawer, for in that case the bill had already been accepted; and in these circumstances Mr. Justice Buller's doctrine seems to be correct. See above, p. 451 and note 1.

¹ Goldsmidt & Moxon v M'Neil, Stewart, & Co., 26 May 1814, 17 Fac. Coll. 623. M'Neil, Stewart, & Co. of Glasgow drew a bill for £1037 on Hendry & Co. of London, at three months after date. It was endorsed by the drawers, and being intended for the accommodation of Hendry & Co., they discounted it; and it came by endorsement to Goldsmidt & Co., who, having neglected to give notice of dishonour, claimed against the drawers. They pleaded neglect. 'The Court laid down this principle, that, in general, every holder of a bill is bound to notify the dishonour of that bill to the drawer, and is only relieved from this necessity by proving that the bill was for the accommodation of the drawer. But in the present case it was clear that the bill was for behoof of the acceptors, who got the money for it, in which case the holders were not relieved from the necessity of due negotiation.'

² In England, the Court of King's Bench held this doctrine in Smith v Becket, 13 East 187, where Canning made a note for £200 in favour of Becket, who endorsed it. The note endorsed was given to Canning, who thereupon raised money with his banker. It was a note payable on demand. Canning became bankrupt, and then a demand was made on him for payment, and afterwards the banker demanded payment from the payee, who pleaded want of notice. Lord Ellenborough held notice necessary, and under his direction the plaintiff was nonsuited. A new trial was refused on two grounds:—1. That notice was necessary in this case, since the payee might have taken means of security against Canning. 2. That the banker had renewed his advance to Canning without communicating this to the payee.

This was confirmed in Brown v Maffey, 15 East 216, where Whitmarsh drew a bill for £500, which was accepted by Neaves; he then endorsed it to Fiander, who endorsed it to Maffey; and so on to Woods, who discounted the bill with Brown & Co., bankers. It was a bill drawn for the accommodation of Woods. Maffey was not proved to have known the bill to be drawn without value in the hand of the person drawn on. The Court held, that as Maffey, if he had received notice, would have had his remedy against Woods, the right of action was lost for want of notice. [Sm. Merc. Law, 7th ed. 259.]

⁴ Laxton v Peat, 1809, 2 Campbell 185. Here Hunt drew a bill, which Peat for Hunt's accommodation accepted. Laxton having notice of the circumstances, gave money for the bill. When it fell due he got part payment from Hunt, and gave him time for the remainder, without the knowledge of Peat, the acceptor. Peat pleaded that he was discharged. Lord Ellenborough at Guildhall said: 'This being an accommodation bill within the knowledge of all the parties, the acceptor can be considered only as a surety for the drawer; and in the case of simple contracts the surety is discharged by time given without his concurrence to the principal. The case is exactly the same,' he added, 'as if the bill had been drawn by Peat, and accepted by Hunt, in consideration of a debt due.' According to many authorities, the defendant Peat, on that supposition, would have been discharged by the time given to Hunt; and the principle of these authorities applies with equal strength to the facts actually given in evidence. Plaintiff nonsuited.

Collet v Haigh, 3 Camp. 281. Dufton accepted a bill drawn by Haigh for Haigh's accommodation. It was endorsed to Collet, who, on its falling due, gave time to Dufton on his lodging some security, which turned out bad. The action was against Haigh, the drawer. Lord Ellenborough held the drawer here not to be discharged. The drawer of an accommodation bill must be considered as principal debtor, and the acceptor only in the light of a surety. The reason why notice of the dishonour of a bill must in general be given to the drawer of a bill is, that he may relieve himself by withdraw-

[431] of by other judges, as by Sir James Mansfield, Chief Justice, and Sir Vicary Gibbs in the Court of Common Pleas. They held, and the Court concurred, that the bill-holder who gives indulgence to the drawer does not thereby discharge the acceptor.¹ And on the authority of this determination, and several others, the law has been laid down, that although the holder of an accommodation bill receive a part from the drawer, and take a promise from him for payment of the rest at an enlarged time, this will not discharge the acceptor.²

II. CLAIMS ON COUNTER-ACCOMMODATIONS, OR CROSS-PAPER.—The most difficult questions which arise out of accommodation bills, are those in which, on the bankruptcy of persons who have dealt together in this traffic, there appear mutual acceptances, or cross-paper, as it is called. But this forms a part of the doctrine of ranking on insolvent estates, and will be considered afterwards in explaining the principles of ranking.

CHAPTER III.

OF MUTUAL CONTRACTS.

IN reviewing the general principles of Obligation and Contract, the constitution and great divisions of contracts have been explained. It is now necessary to consider the essence and effect of the several contracts, properly called Mutual Contracts.

But before proceeding to this, it may be proper to observe some points of doctrine applicable generally to all such contracts.

I. GENERAL EFFECT OF THE RECIPROCAL OBLIGATIONS OF THE PARTIES.—A mutual contract is the reciprocal undertaking or engagement of two or more persons, whereby something is to be given, or done, or abstained from on one side, for a valuable consideration or counter-engagement to give, or do, or abstain from something on the other; the engagement on either side being so certain and precise, that each party may be able to enforce performance.

These opposite engagements or counter-obligations are in some contracts strictly [432] reciprocal; in others they differ in point of time. Taking the contract of sale as an ing his effects from the hands of the acceptor; and he is discharged by time being given to the acceptor without his consent, because his remedy over against the acceptor may thus be materially affected. But where the bill is accepted merely for the accommodation of the drawer, he has no effects to withdraw, and no remedy to pursue when compelled to pay. He therefore suffers no injury, either by want of notice or by time being given to the acceptor; and in an action on the bill he cannot defend himself on either of those grounds.

On these authorities this is laid down as law by Mr. Barnes, in his edition of Mr. Justice Bayley's Summary, pp. 92, 152. See also 1 Selwyn, N. P. 329.

Fentum v Pocock, 1813, 5 Taunt. 192, where Lord Chief Justice Mansfield directed a verdict on the principle that giving time to the drawer is no discharge of the acceptor.

The Court confirmed this doctrine. There was a distinction between this case and those before Lord Ellenborough; namely, that in the latter the bill was from the first known to be an accommodation bill for the use of the drawer: in this case that circumstance was unknown till the bill became due. But this was disregarded, and the case decided on the general doctrine. The engagement of an acceptor was held to be such as nothing but payment or release can discharge.

See 6 Dow 237, for a remark of Lord Chancellor Eldon on this case.

² Chitty 381, 382; Ellis v Gallindo, Doug. 250; Kerrison v Cooke, supra; Anderson v Cleveland, 13 East 430, note; and cases in the above note.

Mr. Justice Bayley does not state the law so absolutely. He says Lord Ellenborough's 'doctrine has been doubted, especially if the holder when he took the bill did not know that it was an accommodation acceptance, or if it were duly presented when due to the acceptor, and he promised payment.' Bayley 167, 168.

example, the commodity and the price, reciprocally engaged for, may be exchanged with each other at completing the contract; in which case the counter-engagements are contemporaneous, and payment of the price or delivery of the subject are conditions precedent of each other. The one party cannot demand performance, or the other payment, without tendering the counterpart.¹

But instead of this, it may be settled by agreement between the parties, that for a commodity to be delivered now, a price shall be paid hereafter. Under such agreement, the delivery may be insisted for without any right on the part of the seller to hold the payment of the price as a precedent condition: equity, however, being admitted to alter this rule, where there is a change of circumstances by the intervening insolvency of the buyer; in which case the seller may insist for security before delivery.

These effects, proceeding from the reciprocal engagements of the parties, give rise to the doctrines of retention, and of stopping in transitu; the former of which shall be commented on hereafter, the latter having been already considered at some length.²

II. GENERAL RULES OF CONSTRUCTION OF MUTUAL CONTRACTS.—The construction or interpretation of a contract is the inference, by the act of reason, or the collecting from proper indications, of the true meaning of the parties. And the great object which the law in all cases has in contemplation, as furnishing the leading principle of the rules to be

¹ [In contracts consisting of a series of promises on the one side, given in consideration of promises on the other, it is not always the case that performance of any given stipulation on the one side is a condition precedent to the performance of a relative stipulation on the other. Sometimes two promises stand in that relation one to the other, and non-performance then disentitles the party failing from demanding performance of the counter-stipulation; but sometimes the promises stand to each other in such a relation that non-performance by the one party will not disentitle him from demanding performance of the stipulations agreed to be performed on the other side, but will only expose him to an action of damages. It is often matter of great nicety to determine whether or not the obligation of one promise is conditional on the due performance of the other, or whether they operate as mutually conditioning each other, or do not either of them operate as a condition precedent to the other—whether, as it is called, the two promises are dependent, or concurrent, or independent. The dependence, concurrence, or independence of covenants, is to be collected from the evident sense and meaning of the parties; and however transposed they may be in the deed, their precedence must depend on the order of time in which the intent and purport of the transaction requires their performance. (Per Lord Mansfield in Jones v Barkley, 2 Dougl. 684–90.) Where, from a consideration of the whole instrument, it is clear that the one party relied on his remedy and not upon the performance of the condition by the other, such performance is not a condition precedent. On the other hand, where it is clear that the intention was to rely on the performance of the condition, and not on the remedy, the performance is a condition precedent. (Per Jervis, C. J., in Roberts v Brett, 25 L. J. C. P. 280, 286.) With regard to the intent of the parties as to the relation in which one promise is meant to stand to another in this respect, the times appointed for the respective performance of the promises are generally matter of great significance. On the rules of construction, derived from consideration of the times for performing mutual promises, see Pordage v Cole, 1 Wms. Saunders 320, b, and the authorities there. Stavers v Curling, 3 Bingh. N. C. 355, 368; Smith, L. C. vol. ii.,

notes to Cutter v Powell. A further rule of construction as to the dependency, concurrence, or independency of mutual covenants or promises, is derived from the connection of their matter, as being wholly, or only in part, the one the consideration for the other. See Pordage v Cole, supra; Smith, ubi supra; Lord Mansfield in Boone v Eyre, 1 H. Bl. 273, note, cited 6 T. R. 573. See further, in illustration of both sets of indicia as to the parties' intention, Leake on Contracts, 344–52, and the cases there; M'Lachlan, Shipping, pp. 320–325, and cases there; Pust v Dowie, 34 L. J. (Ex. Ch.) Q. B. 127, 32 L. J. Q. B. 180; Behn v Burness, 32 L. J. (Ex. Ch.) Q. B. 204; Tidey v Mollet, 33 L. J. C. P. 235; Parsons on Contr. ii. pp. 525–29, and 676–7. It is entirely a question of intention whether performance of any given promise is to be held to be dependent on, concurrent with, or independent of the performance of another on the other side. No precise words are requisite to express such intention: perhaps it may almost be said that no words, however formal, will constitute one promise a condition precedent of another, if it be obvious from the whole reason and sense of the subject-matter that this was not the intention of the parties. Certainly the parties may intend that the one side shall literally and completely fulfil some part of the contract before the other side shall be bound to do anything; and if they make that clear and indubitable, it must have effect, although the consequence may be that the party who has failed in the literal performance of his part may have incurred much expense and conferred much benefit on the other side by a partial performance without receiving any recompense. But where the whole agreement is such as to show that the non-performance of a part may still leave the other side benefited by the performance of the rest, parties must express their intention very clearly indeed, if they mean partial default by the one party, not merely to give the other party an action for special damage therefrom, but to absolve him from his own engagements, and so to operate as a forfeiture by the partial defaulter of the right to recompense for the benefit conferred by his performance of the rest of his obligations. (See Blackburn, Sale, pp. 311–5.)]

observed, is, that justice is to be done between the parties, by enforcing the performance of their agreement, according to the sense in which it was mutually understood and relied upon at the time of making it. Where the contract is in writing, the difficulty lies only in the construction of the words; where it is to be made out by parole testimony, that difficulty is augmented by the possible mistakes of the witnesses as to the words used by the parties.¹

1. Where words are of precise and unambiguous meaning, leading to no absurdity, that meaning is to be taken as conveying the true intention of the parties. But should there be manifest absurdity in the application of such meaning to the particular occasion, this will let in construction for discovering the true intention. And so, 1. If the words are manifestly inconsistent with the declared purpose and object of the contract, they will be rejected;² as if, in a contract of sale, the price of the thing sold should be acknowledged as received, while the obligation was not to deliver the commodity.³ So where one is made in the deed to bind 'his heirs,' instead of binding himself and his heirs, the meaning of the words, though intelligible enough, being inconsistent with the nature of the agreement, it is rejected as imperfect, and the obvious meaning of the parties adopted.⁴ 2. If words be omitted so as to defeat the effect of the contract, they will be supplied by the obvious sense and inference from the context.⁵ 3. If the words, taken in one sense, go to defeat the contract, while they are susceptible of another construction which will give effect to the design of the parties, and not destroy it, the latter will be preferred.⁶

[433] 2. The plain, ordinary, and popular sense of the words is to be preferred to the more unusual, etymological, and recondite meaning; or even to the literal and strictly grammatical construction of the words, where these last would lead to any inefficacy or inconsistency.

3. Where a peculiar meaning has been stamped upon words by the usage of that particular trade or place in which the contract occurs, such technical or peculiar meaning will prevail.⁷ It is as if the parties, in framing their contract, had made use of a foreign language, which the Court is not bound to understand, but which, on evidence of its import, must be applied.⁸ But the expression so made technical and appropriate, and the usage by

Cochran v Bryson, 1713, M. 11627. Here an action for £238 was grounded on a bond in which the obligation was for '238 Scots, with 50 pounds of penalty and annualrent.' According to the tenor of the bond it was good for nothing. But the context and the penalty indicated clearly that the word 'pounds' was omitted, and the bond was held good to sustain action for £238.

destroy it as a lease in reversion? The conclusion of Lord Mansfield's argument is this: 'The ground of the opinion and judgment which I now deliver is, that "from" may, in the vulgar use, and even in strict propriety of language, mean either inclusive or exclusive; that the parties necessarily understood and used it in that sense which made their deed effectual; that courts of justice are to construe the words of parties so as to effectuate their deeds, and not to destroy them, more especially where the words themselves may admit of either meaning.'

⁷ In policies of insurance a peculiar meaning has been fixed by usage on certain expressions; and Lord Ellenborough laid down the rule thus: 'The same rule of construction which applies to all other instruments applies equally to this,—viz. that it is to be construed according to its sense and meaning, as collected in the first place from the terms used in it, which terms are themselves to be understood in their plain, ordinary, and popular sense, unless they have generally, in respect to the subject-matter, as by the known usage of trade or the like, acquired a peculiar sense distinct from the popular sense of the same words, or unless the context evidently points out that they must, in the particular instance, and in order to effectuate the immediate intention of the parties to that contract, be understood in some other special and peculiar sense.'

Robertson v French, 1803, 4 East 135 et seq.

⁸ As where the practice is to compress bales of cotton by which it has become so, must be so clear that the Court cannot entertain a doubt upon the subject.¹ Technical words are to be taken according to their approved and known use in the trade in which the contract is entered into, or to which it relates, unless they have manifestly been understood by the parties in another sense.

4. In construing a contract, the place in which it was made, or in which it is stipulated to be performed, is a most material consideration.² So lawful interest, in a foreign deed, is construed to be the interest of the country where the obligation is contracted, or where it is to be enforced, if that be different.³

5. Previous or contemporaneous conversations or communings, and all that passes in the course of correspondence or negotiation leading to the contract, are entirely superseded by a written agreement. The parties having agreed to reduce the terms of their contract to writing, the document is constituted as the only true and final exposition of their admissions and intentions. It is the only instrument of evidence which law will recognise as the interpreter of their intentions; and nothing which does not appear in the written agreement will be considered as a part of the contract.⁴ This is a rule so well established [434] in Scotland, that, although daily admitted and stated from the bench, there is not any distinct authority to which reference can be made.⁵ But this rule admits of this exception, that where there has been anything stated in the way of inducement or representation in the previous communings or correspondence, and by fraud or collusion the correct truth has been concealed, evidence of this may be admitted.⁶

6. All contracts made in general terms, in the ordinary course of trade, are presumed to incorporate the usage and custom of the trade to which they relate. The presumption is, that the parties know such usages, and do not intend to exclude them. But where there is a special stipulation in opposition to or inconsistent with the custom, that will prevail.⁷

7. Where there is an ambiguity which impedes the execution of the contract, it is first, machinery to improve their stowage, a contract to load a full and complete cargo of cotton implies that it shall not be stowed in uncompressed bags. Benson v Schneider, 7 Taunt. 272.

So, a purchase of scarlet cuttings for the Chinese market means without serge, etc. Bridge v Wain, 1816, 1 Starkie 504.

³ Wilkinson v Monies, 1821, 1 S. 89, N. E. 91.

⁴ This rule is held in England on the broad ground so well stated by Lord Coke: 'It would be inconvenient that matters in writing, made by advice and on consideration, and which finally import the certain truth of the agreement of the parties, should be controlled by an averment of the parties, to be proved by the uncertain testimony of slippery memory; and it would be dangerous to purchasers, and all others in such cases, if such wide averments against matter in writing should be admitted.' 5 Coke's Rep. 26. In a modern case the rule is thus laid down by Lord Chief Justice Abbot: 'Where the whole matter passes in parole, all that passes may sometimes be taken together as forming parcel of the contract, though not always, because matter talked of at the commencement of a bargain may be excluded by the language used at its termination. But if the contract be in the end reduced to writing, nothing which is not found in the writing can be considered as a part of the contract.' 2 Barn. and Cress. 634. See also Pickering v Dowson, 4 Taunt. 779.

⁵ See Gordon v Hughes, 1815, Fac. Coll. See also Millers v Miller, 1 Sh. App. Ca. 317. See next note.

⁶ So in the case above cited (note 4), the Chief Justice proceeds to say: 'A matter antecedent to and dehors the writing, may in some cases be received in evidence, as showing the inducement to the contract; such as a representation of some particular quality or incident to the thing sold. But the buyer is not at liberty to show such a representation, unless he can also show that the seller by some fraud prevented him from discovering a fault which he, the seller, knew to exist.'

if possible, to be resolved, on a review of the whole contract or instrument, aided by the admitted views of the parties; and if indispensable, parole evidence may be let in to clear it, consistently with the words.

8. If the words cannot be reconciled with any practicable or consistent interpretation, they are held as not made use of perinde sunt ac si scripta non essent.

SECTION I.

OF THE CONTRACT OF SALE.¹

SALE is distinguishable from BARTER or EXCHANGE, as being a contract for transferring property in consideration of a price in money, while the other is a contract for the exchange of two subjects or commodities. In the vulgar use of the word, Sale is understood to imply the transference of the commodity, and with this the legal meaning in England accords. But in the law of Scotland, sale is only a contract for transferring, not in itself a transference. [435] It is the titulus transferendi domini: the modus, by which the transfer is accomplished, is tradition.

The completion of the transfer by tradition, in so far as a question may arise relative to the property of the thing sold, has already been considered.² In this place, sale is to be viewed merely as a contract on which claims may arise to the parties as personal creditors of each other.

SUBSECTION I.—GENERAL PRINCIPLES RELATIVE TO SALE.

Under this head may be considered, 1. The constitution of the contract of sale; 2. The completion of the contract; 3. The conditions implied in it; and, 4. The effect of insolvency.

I. CONSTITUTION OF THE CONTRACT OF SALE.—Sale is a consensual contract, completed by consent alone.³ And this consent may be proved by writing; or by parole evidence, where the parties have not previously settled that the contract shall be in writing,⁴ or where the law has not required, as in the case of land or of ships,⁵ that there shall be a written contract to transfer.

The contract may be concluded between the principals, or by a broker or brokers acting for them.

1. The parties themselves complete their contract on the principles already pointed out.⁶ It may further be observed, however, relative to the constitution of sale by offer and acceptance, that although it is an implied condition of a mercantile offer that it shall be accepted at the time specified, and especially where an answer is required in course, yet if any delay has been occasioned by the offerer,⁷ he will not be freed by mere expiration of the time, taken as in reference to his original offer.⁸

¹ Since the former edition of this book, a very elaborate Treatise on the Contract of Sale has been published by M. P. Brown, Esq., advocate. In that work will be found all the learning on the subject which can be usefully applied in questions on this contract, with a discussion, at all times acute, though occasionally too minute and detailed, on the doctrines of sale in the Roman law and law of England, as well as in the Scottish law; and there are throughout the work many valuable disquisitions and distinctions relative to the analogies of English law, as fit to be applied or rejected in Scottish practice.

² [To that subject belongs the consideration of the changes made on the law of sale by the first four sections of the Act 19 and 20 Vict. c. 60.]

The principle, as laid down in Thomson v James, 1855, 18 D. 1, is that, where the offer is made by post, the acceptance is invited by the same medium; and the posting of the acceptance completes the contract, because that was what the offeree was expected to do, and all he could do, through that medium. That is, however, if the acceptance ultimately comes to hand. If it never do, after being posted—as if the mail were lost—there would, it seems, be no contract.]

2. In the great emporiums of trade, the negotiation of sales is chiefly carried on by BROKERS. They have no concern with the custody of the goods, but merely settle the terms of the sale between the parties.¹

Where a broker is authorized by one man to sell, and by another to buy, an entry made in his book of a sale of the goods so authorized to be bought and sold is a contract binding between the parties, when communicated to them by the broker giving to each a note of the bargain, called a BOUGHT AND SOLD NOTE. In one case it was questioned whether the broker had any more than authority to propose the terms, leaving to the parties a power of dissent, provided it was immediately exercised. It was ruled by Lord Ellenborough, that after the broker has entered the contract in his book, neither party can recede from it; that he is the agent for both parties; and that they are equally bound by his entry of the bargain, as if they had themselves signed the entry in the broker's book.² But this doctrine has since been so far qualified, that the bought and sold notes sent to the parties have been held to be the constitution of the bargain; so that if there be any incongruity between the notes sent, there is no bargain.³

It is⁴ an understood condition in such transactions, that if the name of the [436] purchaser has not been communicated, the seller shall have a negative on the sale, where the price is not in ready money, but on credit; provided he intimate his rejection as soon as he has time to inquire into the buyer's solvency.⁵ But this rule does not extend to the case of a factor, whose power is held to be absolute to sell on credit.⁶

If the broker, in communicating the names of the parties to each other, or in any other respect, has made an innocent mistake, which can involve no important consequences to the parties, it will not furnish a ground for departing from the contract. Although, therefore, a broker should send to the seller a sale-note of a bargain on credit with A and Co., when truly the contract was made with A, B, and Co., the seller might object; yet it would not appear that he could so object if the bargain were for cash. The buyer seems entitled, as well as the seller, to object on account of the person with whom the contract is formed, where the sale is on credit, as a man may have insuperable objections to become the debtor of a particular person. The more correct way, perhaps, would be to make an exception offer was wrong addressed, and so delayed in reaching its destination. Acceptance in course from the time of arrival was held to bind the offerer, although on the day he had expected the answer he had sold the goods to another.

² Heyman v Neale, 2 Camp. 337.

³ Cumming v Roebuck. Cumming having bought at the East India sales 140 bags of coffee, resold by his broker 120 bags to Roebuck. It appeared that the bought and sold notes differed, on which an objection was taken by Roebuck's counsel against Cumming's action, and Lord Chief Justice Gibbs directed a nonsuit. 'If the broker,' said he, 'delivered a different note of the contract to each party contracting, there is no valid contract. There is, I believe, a case,' he continued, 'which states the entry in the broker's book to be the original contract, but it has since been contradicted. Each is bound by the note which the broker delivers; and if different notes are given to the parties, neither can understand the other.' Holt's Cases, 170.

months, and 20 by bill at four months. The broker, having the usual authority, wrote out the bought and sold notes, and sent a copy to each. Five days afterwards Davies disapproved of the sufficiency of Hodgson, and pleaded that he had not ratified the contract. A proof of usage was offered. Lord Ellenborough was at first inclined to hold the contract as concluded by the broker, and absolute, unless his authority was limited by writing, of which the buyer had notice. But the gentlemen of the special jury said, that unless the name of the purchaser was previously communicated to the seller, if the payment is to be by bill, the seller is always understood to reserve to himself the power of disapproving of the sufficiency of the purchaser, and annulling the contract. Lord Ellenborough allowed that this usage was reasonable and valid. But he clearly thought that the rejection must be intimated as soon as the seller had had time to inquire into the solvency of the purchaser. Five days seemed to him a longer period than the exigencies of commerce would permit. However, he left it to the jury to say whether it was according to the usual commercial practice to reject a contract so long after it had been entered into. The jury, without any hesitation, found for the plaintiff.

⁶ So laid down by Mr. Justice Chambre in Houghton v Matthews, 3 Bos. and Pull. 489.

in granting powers to the broker. But though this be not done, the power of objection will remain.¹

II. COMPLETION OF THE CONTRACT.—This, in many questions, is a very important point. The general rule is, that final and conclusive consent completes the con-

¹ In Mitchell v Lapage, Holt's N. P. Cases 254, this doctrine was sanctioned by Lord Chief Justice Gibbs, though the example of inconvenience stated seems rather questionable. The sale-note sent to the buyer bore Tod, Mitchell, & Co. as the sellers; but the firm had been dissolved, and new persons were in the company. It was at the trial objected that the bought and sold notes were in the name of the old firm, and that the defendant had a right to settle with whom he was to deal. This was assented to by the Chief Justice, to the extent that the buyer 'cannot be prejudiced by the substitution. If the defendant could show any inconvenience which he has sustained by the inaccuracy of the broker, it might be an answer to the present action. Metcalf, the broker, has misdescribed the names of his principals; and if by this mistake the defendant was induced to think that he had entered into a contract with one set of men and not with another, and if, owing to the broker, he has been prejudiced or excluded from a set-off, it would be a good defence.'

[The reader will keep in view that the English cases as to the completion of the contract of sale through brokers turn mainly on the 17th section of the Statute of Frauds, which provides that 'no contract for the sale of any goods, wares, or merchandises, for the price of £10 or upwards, shall be allowed to be good except the buyer shall accept part of the goods so sold, and actually receive the same, or give something in earnest to bind the bargain, or in part payment, or that some note or memorandum in writing of the said bargain be made and signed by the parties to be charged by such contract, or their agents thereunto lawfully authorized.' The London brokers have been from the earliest times subject to the control of the corporation, whose regulations bind them under the Acts 6 Anne, c. 16, 10 Anne, c. 19, and 56 Geo. III. c. 60; and they are required to take an oath and give a bond. See Russell on Factors and Brokers. Elsewhere brokers are absolutely free. The decisions as to the effect of brokers' bought and sold notes, entries in brokers' books, and so forth, seem frequently to turn on the local customs of London. See the cases fully commented on in Blackburn, Sale, pp. 81–119; and Benjamin on Sale, pp. 191–212; and correct, by the authorities in the latter, the statements in the text that the bought and sold notes, where there is a signed entry in the book, constitute the contract so as to leave it no bargain if they vary. If there is no signed entry, and they agree, they are good evidence within the Statute of Frauds; but if there is a signed entry, that is binding on both, and constitutes the contract, however the notes vary. To us, who are not bound by the Statute of Frauds, these decisions are not of direct importance. Where, with us, the broker has no absolute power to buy or sell without reference to his principals, or one of them; where, in short, he is a mere internuntius proposing terms and conducting the negotiation, but with a power of dissent in the parties, the sending of a bought note to the one, and a sold note in the same terms to the other, not debito tempore rejected by either, will complete the contract as being evidence of consensus ad idem on the part of both principals. But this is not the function of the broker in England. The contract is completed, not by the assent of the principals communicated through the broker, but by the definitive will and resolution of the broker as agent for the buyer and the seller respectively, that the goods shall be sold by the one and bought by the other; and the proper written evidence of this is his book, signed by him, in accordance with the Statute of Frauds, as the authorized agent of the buyer to buy, and of the seller to sell. Supposing that with us a broker had an absolute commission to buy for one man, and an absolute commission to sell for another, either at discretion or at a given price, there seems no doubt that in strict principle a contract would be completed between them by his enixa voluntas alone, without any writing on his part, and before any communication to his principals of the bargain he meant to cause pass between them, so that neither party could recede. But it is plain there would be an inconvenience in leaving the proof of this enixa voluntas, and of the exact time at which it was exerted, if any question should afterwards arise (and an hour or two may, in case of a loss by fire or fall of markets, make all the difference to the parties), to the mere testimony of the broker as agent for each, unsupported by any overt act on his part evidencing the definitive act passing within his own mind, which in theory completes the contract. There may be custom also by which the completion of the contract shall be held suspended until the performance by the broker of some overt act of this kind which shall give external form and expression to, and ascertain the exact time of, his internal resolution to complete the contract; and the peculiarity of the case would almost of itself suggest a condition precedent of this kind as suspensive of the contract. But, apart from custom, it is rather a question as to what shall be sufficient evidence of the time and terms of the definitive act of the broker's will, than as to what is necessary to constitute the contract; and all that can be said is, that we are not tied up by law, apart from custom, to writing by the broker as the exclusive evidence of this act. Where bought and sold notes are sent, an important difference may arise according to the form the broker uses. There are three forms: one where the broker expresses the names of the buyer and seller as 'Bought for A B from C D,' 'Sold for C D to A B;' another, where the notes, while showing that the broker acts as such, do not disclose to either who the other principal is,—the note to the vendor being, 'Sold for C D,' and that to the vendee, 'Bought for A B;' and a third form, where the broker, on the face of the note, states himself as principal, though he is really only an agent, as where the note to the buyer, instead of 'Bought for you, A B,' bears 'Sold to you, A B, by me, E F.' By this form of note the broker assumes the obligation of a principal, and cannot escape responsibility by parole proof that he was only acting as broker for another, although the party to whom he gives such a note may show there was an unnamed principal, and make this principal responsible. (Benj. pp. 193, 164–5; Blackburn, p. 92; Higgins v Senior, 8 M. and W. 444.) As to the other consequences of the broker's assuming the apparent position of a principal, see Sec. 3 (Of Mercantile Agents, etc.).]

tract.¹ But it may be observed, 1. That the conclusive consent is indicated in different cases by very different proofs. So, where it is pars contractus, or required by law, that writing shall pass between the parties to bind them, the writing alone indicates the final consent. 2. That the completion of the contract may take place to one effect, though not to another. So, the final engagement to sell 500 quarters of wheat will bind the seller, though not to the effect of altering the risk, the commodity not being specific and identified. 3. That the contract may be of the nature called executory in England, binding from the first, but the effect of the contract depending on a future act or event. While the contract is completed by consent alone, it is necessarily implied in the very nature of sale, that the parties shall be at one in respect to the price and to the subject.

PRICE.—The price, not elusory,² must be certain, or ascertainable by reference to some criterion by which it may be fixed. The maxim in the latter case is, Certum est quod certum reddi potest. A reference to the fair prices of grain is enough,³ or to the market prices on a particular day;⁴ a reference to the award of a third person, and even a reference to one of the parties themselves, is effectual.⁵

SUBJECT.—1. If the subject is specific and certain in all respects, and the price fixed, the contract is complete the moment that the parties have expressed their full consent to the sale.⁶

¹ The language used by Mr. Brown is not strictly correct as applied to the law of Scotland, although perhaps it is more so in English law. He says, that 'although the general rule be that sale is perfected by sole consent, yet this proposition is subject to certain exceptions and qualifications.' He then proceeds to state, as exceptions, the sale of commodities by weight, number, or measure; the sale of immoveable property, or ships; and sales of which it is pars contractus that the agreement shall be reduced to writing. Brown on Sale, p. 32. These are not exceptions to the rule as to the completion of the contract, though in English law they are correctly exceptions to the transmutation of property. The sale of commodities by weight, etc., is complete by consent alone, though the risk is not altered, nor a particular commodity transferred; and the suspension of the contract in the other cases is only till consent shall be indicated by those conclusive proofs to identify the commodity which law or convention has made necessary.

[Our law is not quite settled as to several points of the doctrine of periculum rei venditæ; nor does the usual question whether the contract is 'complete' suggest any fruitful principle for settling them, as it really just means in this connection, Has the risk passed? It is, e.g., probably not certain that it is not too absolute a proposition to affirm that in no case can the risk pass unless the subject be precisely identified as that to which the contract attaches, and of which the risk passes. If one buy ten sheep out of a flock, and before the ten are separated and identified ten of the flock die, it is impossible to hold that the risk of those ten was the buyer's. That, however, cannot be because the contract of sale is not complete, for no engagement at all can arise from an incomplete contract; and, as the author correctly lays it down, the seller is bound effectually before the identification takes place to separate and deliver, and the buyer to pay. See also Poth. Vente, sec. 309, who says that before the measuring, the weighing, the counting, and from the instant of the contract, the engagements which arise from it are in existence. The meaning of holding that the risk of the ten sheep that died had not passed to the buyer is just this, that while by the completion of the contract the seller's obligation to deliver ten sheep is perfect, there is no ground on which he can be allowed to plead that, owing to the damnum fatale, he cannot fulfil it; because even though the selection would, before the event, have lain with him, it would be impossible to permit him after the event to make a selection of those ten as the very sheep he had in his mind destined for delivery to the buyer. But this reason does not apply if, even before identification of the ten sold, not only ten out of the flock, but the whole flock, perish by accident. There it is certain, on the one hand, that the buyer meant to deliver ten sheep out of that flock; and although it never was ascertained which ten he meant to deliver, it is certain, on the other hand, that whichever possible ten he had chosen or might have chosen, the damnum fatale which has befallen him must have prevented him from implementing his obligation from no fault of his, and his obligation is without doubt extinguished, though the buyer's obligation to pay is not: the result being, in other words,

2. If the subject be not specific, but consist in quantity or number, the sale, to certain effects, may be complete before the identification takes place. The seller may be constrained to fulfil his obligation of separating and delivering the quantity; the buyer may be forced to pay on the quantity being ascertained. But although the contract of sale be completed, it will not change the risk, if the subject to which the risk and the obligations of the parties that the periculum had passed to the buyer, though the particular ten had not been identified. The correctness of this analysis of the periculum rei venditæ into the ultimate principle, that the vendor is liberated from his obligation wherever it is certain that the subject of it has perished by damnum fatale, is confirmed by Pothier (Vente, No. 307). And if this be the true principle, it is also clear that the obligation to deliver perishes by the extinction of the corpus, not only where it is a debt of a thing certain and determinate, or individualized, but also where the obligation is not absolutely indeterminate, but is a debt of a thing not indeed actually individualized, but which forms part of a definite collection of corpora, all of which perish. 'For example,' says Pothier (Oblig. No. 623), 'if any one owes me a tun of the wine which he has in such a house, and there be a hundred of them in that house, so long as there remains any of them, his obligation will subsist; but if there remains of them not one, as if an inundation has carried the whole away, the obligation will be extinct.' The same thing holds in the case of an alternative obligation. If one only of two things, one or other of which is to be delivered at the option of the vendor, perishes, his obligation becomes determined to the one that remains; but if both perish, even while there was as yet no election to appropriate the one or the other to the vendor's obligation, the obligation perishes, because, whichever might have been selected, the obligation to deliver it has become imprestable. (Pothier, Oblig. Nos. 248-253, 621-623; Vente, No. 312.) It would appear, then, that it is perhaps not strictly correct to say that in no case will the risk be held to have passed to the vendee unless the precise corpus to which the contract applies has been individualized or identified as the very subject of the contract: it appears to be sufficient, in order to lay the loss arising by a fortuitous peril on the vendee, if the vendor can show that, whatever uncertainty there may have been about the individual subject of the obligation, it was at least so far determined, with reference to the peril that has happened, that his obligation to deliver it has indubitably perished by that peril. While an obligation to deliver ten sheep out of a flock which is determined still remains in dubio with respect to the particular sheep to which the vendor or vendee—whoever may have the selection—shall ultimately appropriate the obligation, it is really very much like an alternative obligation to deliver one or other of all the possible combinations of ten that can be made up out of that flock; and the general rules as to risk, or, in other words, as to the extinction of the debtor's obligation applicable to alternative sales, apply to it while things are in this state. Looking, again, at the question of the vendee's risk from the point of view that it is just another mode of expressing the extinction damno fatali of the seller's obligation to deliver, while the buyer's obligation to pay the price remains,—the true ground is disclosed upon which—where a whole quantity, say of wheat, which has been sold out, which lies separate in a particular place, but of which the precise extent is not known, perishes by damnum fatale—

we are justified in drawing the distinction as to risk drawn by the Roman law and by Mr. Bell, as to whether it has been 'all sold for a fixed price for the whole'—a slump price for the lot—or whether 'the price depends on the weight or measurement, and the exact quantity and price has not been ascertained.' If the things perish before measurement, the vendor's obligation is indeed alike extinguished in either case, and no distinction as to risk can arise from the vendor's obligation in these cases; but the difference lies in the fact, that in the latter case, but not in the former, the amount of the vendee's obligation for the price has not been, and never can be liquidated, or at least not by the method contemplated by the contract; and therefore the vendee cannot in the latter case be subjected to payment, i.e. he escapes the loss. Dig. Lib. 18, tit. 1 (De Contr. Empt.), l. 35, secs. 5, 6. But, on the contrary, it would seem that where the vendor's obligation to deliver can, on the one hand, be shown to have perished damno fatali, either by the destruction of a particular corpus to which it was appropriated, or by the total destruction of a whole number of corpora, to one or other of which alternatively it applied; and, on the other hand, the amount of the vendee's obligation to pay (which is not destroyed by the mere extinction of the vendor's to deliver) is ascertained, or is still ascertainable, in the mode prescribed by the contract,—there the periculum will be held to have passed, quite irrespective of anything remaining at the time of the accident to be done to the goods by either party, for whatever purpose it may have been required, provided that its not having been done does not leave either of the two points just mentioned in doubt. Of course it is assumed throughout these observations that there has been no mora, or any of the other specialties which sometimes interfere with the ordinary rule as to risk; as to which, see Brown, Sale, No. 511 et seq. If the not doing of the thing remaining to be done has amounted to mora on the vendor's part, retarding delivery, that will prevent the operation of the principle that his obligation to deliver perishes by the destruction damno fatali of the subject to be delivered. (Pothier, Oblig. secs. 624-635.) But if there is no mora, the fact of any such operation remaining to be done to put the thing into deliverable condition (on which, as a criterion quite independent of any mora involved in it, many of the English cases turn) is of no consequence, because it neither prevents the extinction of the vendor's obligation, nor the ascertainment of the amount due under the subsisting obligation of the vendee. See Hansen v Craig & Rose, 1859, 21 D. 432. In reference to the observations made regarding the risk being with the vendee where the subject sold forms an unseparated portion of a number, to one or other of which the seller's obligation applies, see a case of Wellard v Perkins, given in Parsons on Contr. i. 533, note (z), where, the contract being executory, there was no room for the ordinary principle of English law, that the risk passes with the general property to the vendee, and yet the vendee was held liable, on principles apparently similar to those of our law, for the loss of an unidentified are to attach be not identified; as where the price depends on the weight or measurement, and the exact quantity and price has not been ascertained.¹ The risk may be changed even of a fungible, where it is either specifically separated and distinguished; or where it lies in a particular place, and (although the precise extent is not known) is all sold at a fixed price for the whole.

3. Where the commodity is sold with reference to the taste, or any other criterion, [438] the sale is not complete till the goods have undergone that test.²

4. Where the sale is executory, referring to some future act or event, its efficacy depends on that event; and it is either a conditional sale, or a combination of the contract of sale with that of locatio operarum. Of the former, the sale of goods to be imported is an example;³ of the latter, the sale of goods to be manufactured, as a ship or chariot to be built.⁴

III. CONDITIONS IMPLIED OR EXPRESS.—The constitution or the annulling of a sale may depend on a compliance with certain conditions in the nature and state of the commodity, or in the time and manner of the delivery, or in the mode of payment. These conditions may be implied or express.

IMPLIED CONDITIONS.—Of these conditions it is important to mark the rules with the exceptions. 1. As it is an essential condition in every sale, that the subject of it shall be sound and fit for the implied or avowed use intended, the buyer will be quit of the bargain (where he has not previously inspected or had an opportunity of inspecting the commodity) if this condition be not fulfilled; and this however innocent the seller may be, or however ignorant of the defect.⁵ So, if goods be commissioned to be sent abroad, and they are found not to correspond with the description in the order, or (where no special description is given) with that of merchantable goods, they may be returned, or damages recovered.⁶ And, 2. The commodity must be fit for the particular purpose specified by the buyer; and if it be found on examination not to be so, it may be rejected and damages claimed, or, if used before the defect is discovered, an abatement may be demanded in the price.⁷ Thus, ale bought for a warm climate must be prepared so as to endure the heat of that climate;⁸ and portion of a determinate lot of rosin, the whole of which was destroyed by fire. Lastly, it may be suggested that though, where the contract is not complete (in the sense of there being no final engagement between the parties), there can be no passing of risk, the 'completion' of the contract had better not be mixed up with the passing of the risk, as in one sense, i.e. where it merely denotes final engagement, it is not a criterion of risk; and in the other sense, it is just equivalent to saying that the contract is complete so as to pass the risk, and contains no principle—is just, in fact, idem per idem.]

In Zagury v Furnell, 2 Camp. 240, a purchase was made of 289 bales of goatskins from Mogadore, containing five dozen in each bale, at 57s. 6d. per dozen. It appeared that, by the usage of trade, the seller of goatskins thus by bales counts them over, that it may be seen whether each bale contains the number specified. But before they were so counted, a fire at the wharf destroyed them all. Lord Ellenborough held, that as an act remained to be done when the fire happened, there was no complete transfer, and the skins were at the seller's risk. The number of skins actually contained in the 289 bales being uncertain, the plaintiff had failed to show that he was authorized by the terms of the contract to draw the bills which the buyer had refused to accept. The same case was contrived to be tried in Common Pleas also, when Mansfield, Ch. J., held the same doctrine. 2 Camp. 242, note.

⁸ Baird v Pagan, 1765, M. 14240, where ale for the West

if seed be bought for sowing, and if, after being sown, it turns out unfit for that purpose, damages may be claimed.¹

These are the rules of the law of Scotland, not only where there has been no opportunity of examining the commodity, but where the defect or vice is latent; whether known [439] to the seller or unknown.² In this respect the law of Scotland differs from that of England.³

But the exceptions to the seller's responsibility for the quality are important. And, 1. If the sale take place between the parties themselves, or their authorized agents, if the defect be open to observation, and if a full opportunity is given of examining the condition of the commodity, the rule is caveat emptor: in vulgar phrase, the buyer's eye is his merchant; and he will not be allowed to avoid the contract, unless the seller is guilty of fraud, or the buyer have required a special warranty.⁴ 2. If the fault be latent, or if the buyer have no opportunity of examining the quality or inspecting the commodity before it is sent to him, or to its destination abroad, he must make his challenge instantly on discovering the defect, or at least without any unreasonable delay.⁵ But even where the delay has been

India market was unfitted prepared, and great part of it spoiled and lost. In an action for payment of the price, the buyer's defence was held good.

In England, in a similar case of beer intended for Gibraltar, the defect would have been held sufficient had the delay not barred the plea. Fisher v Samuda, 1808, 1 Camp. 193. See below, note 5.

Dickson & Co. v Kincaid, 15 Dec. 1808, 15 Fac. Coll. 57. This was a curious case of the same sort. A person had unconsciously sold as good Swedish turnip seed, what, although the true produce of Swedish turnip, had by the floral influence or impregnation from other plants growing in the neighbourhood, degenerated into hybrids, a mixed and bastard species. This seed was sold to a dealer, who having sold it again was made liable in damages, and sought relief by an action of damages against the original seller. The Court of Session found him entitled to full indemnification.

Bluett v Osborne, 1 Starkie 384. Here one sold a bowsprit, which at the time of sale the buyer had an opportunity of inspecting, and which appeared perfectly sound; but on the vessel's arrival at Madeira, the bowsprit, on being cut up, was found to be rotten. The seller brought his action for the price. The defendant pleaded that he was liable only for the real worth on the seller's implied warranty that the article should be sufficient. Lord Ellenborough said: 'A person who sells, impliedly warrants that the thing sold shall answer the purpose for which it is bought. In this case the bowsprit was apparently good, and the defendant had an opportunity of inspecting it. No fraud is complained of, but the bowsprit turned out to be defective upon cutting it up. I think the plaintiff is not liable on account of the subsequent failure. What he deserves here is the apparent value of the article at the time of delivery. Supposing the price to have been paid on delivery, could it have been recovered back? Verdict for the plaintiff, £60. The Court refused a rule Nisi for a new trial.

See the Scottish case of Reid v Steele, 1824, 3 S. 201, where the fact was doubtful whether the breaking of the mast arose from inherent defect or from bad management. The loss was divided.

See the English case of Fisher v Samuda, 1808, 1 Camp. 193, before Lord Ellenborough, where beer for Gibraltar was known in July to be bad, and no notice of objection till such as to bar the purchaser from succeeding in his entire rejection of the goods, he may be allowed relief by abatement on making out a strong case of defect.¹ In the question of delay, the time is to be reckoned from the discovery of the fault: from the time of delivery, where it is palpable; where latent, from the time of its becoming apparent.² And although it will not deprive the buyer of his remedy, that the article has been put to use, or partly or irretrievably disposed of, this must have been done in bona fide, and in ignorance of the defect. If the buyer has been even doubtful of its quality, he will forfeit his remedy [440] by disposing of it.³ The buyer may reject the goods, but he is not entitled to convert the contract into one of another description, nor to dispose of the goods on any other than the original footing, without the assent of the seller.⁴ Where goods are so rejected at a distance from the seller's residence, and where he has no agent, the buyer must act fairly for the seller's interest, on the principles of negotiorum gestio; but in general it may be laid down, that he is not safe to proceed without the control of a magistrate. 3. Where the commodity may be applicable to several uses, the buyer is not entitled, without special stipulation, to reject it, because it is not fit for one particular use.⁵

The usage of trade in general, or even local usage, may establish an implied condition essential to the subsistence of a sale, non-compliance with which may entitle the party to avoid the contract or have relief. All contracts made in the ordinary course of trade, and without special provision, are presumed to incorporate the usage and custom of the trade to which they relate. The trade as exercised, and its usual practice known to the parties, are naturally understood to be within their intention in forming their bargain, and to be relied on in the execution of it. And so a sale-note, in simple terms, and which, taken by itself, would seem to import a ready money bargain, has the implied condition of the usual credit fixed in such sales by the usage of trade.⁶ This doctrine, however, even in its terms, implies two exceptions: 1. That where an express stipulation or warranty has been introduced, it

suspends the usage.¹ 2. That where the usage is local, and unknown to one of the parties, it cannot affect the contract.

EXPRESS CONDITION.—Where the bargain expressly contains any essential condition, the non-performance of that condition voids the contract.²

¹ Yeats v Pim, 1815, Holt's Cases 95. This was a sale of 60 bales of bacon, warranted prime singed bacon. Part of the bacon (3 bales) was landed and opened, and no exceptions taken. A bill was drawn for the price, accepted, and paid. About two months after the sale, a final examination took place, when the buyers rejected it as tainted. The buyers then brought their action for breach of contract. The defence was on an alleged custom in the trade upon the sale of bacon, to examine it a few days after landing, if not imported at the time of sale; and at the time of inspection to reject or accept it, or claim an allowance for damage or difference of quality, otherwise to accept the bacon. Evidence of this custom was objected to where there was an express warranty. Mr. Justice Heath directed a verdict for the plaintiffs. He held it competent to give evidence of acquiescence, that the buyers were guilty of gross negligence in not examining and rejecting the bacon in time, but he refused to admit the evidence of custom to alter the contract. By requiring a warranty, the buyer is to be understood as excepting against all terms but such as are stipulated in the bargain. Confirmed by the Court of Common Pleas, 6 Taunt. 446, 2 Marsh. 141.

² [On this subject two distinctions must be attended to—that between warranty and representation, and that between sales of goods in genere and sales of goods in specie.—(1.) As to the ground of action: 'Every affirmation at the time of sale of personal chattels is a warranty, provided it appears to have been so intended;' 1 Smith L. C. 6th ed. 166, citing Power v Barham, 4 Ad. and E. 473; Shepherd v Kain, 5 B. and A. 240; Freeman v Baker, 2 Nev. and Man. 446; and see Hopkins v Hitchcock, 32 L. J. C. P. 154. The rule was originally laid down by Lord Holt. (Buller, J., in Pasley v Freeman, 3 T. R. 51.) Antecedent representations made by the vendor as an inducement to the buyer, but not forming part of the contract when concluded, are not warranties. A warranty must form part of the contract. Foster v Smith, 18 C. B. 156; Moridel v Steel, 8 M. and W. 858; Street v Blay, 2 B. and Ad. 456; Chanter v Hopkins, 4 M. and W. 399; Benj. Sale, p. 452. It need not be made simultaneously with the conclusion of the bargain, but only during the course of dealing leading to it, and must then enter into the bargain as part of it. Hopkins v Tanqueray, 23 L. J. C. P. 162; Stuckley v Bailey, per Martin, B., 32 L. J. Ex. 483. No special form of words is necessary to create a warranty. Cross v Gardiner—per Holt, C. J.—3 Mod. 261; Medina v Stoughton, 1 Ld. Raymond 593; per Buller, J., in Pasley v Freeman, 2 Sm. L. C. 71. Whether an affirmation at the time of a sale is or is not intended to be a warranty, is a question of fact for the jury, to be inferred from the nature of the sale, and the circumstances of the particular case. Stuckley v Bailey, supra; Benj. Sale, p. 454; Parsons' Contr. i. 581, note (n). The criterion is the understanding and intention of parties. A bare affirmation of the soundness of a horse, then exposed to the purchaser's inspection, is not per se a warranty. It is of itself only a representation. To give it the effect of a warranty, it must be shown to the satisfaction of the jury that the parties intended it to have that effect. Parsons, ut supra, and cases there. It will be material to distinguish whether the language used was meant as a mere expression of opinion, belief, or inference on the part of the seller, or as the assertion of a fact: for the former will not amount to a warranty; the latter, if so intended, will. Per Buller, J., in Pasley v Freeman, 3 T. R. 51; Powell v Barham, supra; Jendwine v Slade, 2 Esp. 572; per Bramwell, B., in Stuckley v Bailey, supra. See Hardie v Smith & Simons, 25 May 1870, for an instance of the distinction between representation of fact and of seller's opinion or inference from certain facts stated by him to buyer. In Wood v Smith, 5 M. and Ry. 124, 4 C. and P. 45, the buyer of a mare said to the seller, 'She is sound, of course?' The latter said, 'Yes, to the best of my knowledge.' On being asked if he would warrant her, he replied: 'I never warrant. I would not even warrant myself.' Lord Tenterden at trial, and the Court in Banco, held on these facts that there was a qualified warranty that the mare was sound to the best of defendant's knowledge, and that the action was properly laid on the promise to warrant, although it was insisted that, as there was an express refusal to warrant, it should have been laid on tort, as for a false and fraudulent misrepresentation. Where the contract is in writing, but contains no warranty, or expresses a particular warranty as given, parole is inadmissible to prove its existence in the former case, or to extend it by inference or implication in the latter. (Kain v Old, 2 B. and C. 627.) But a mere receipt for the price, whether it does or does not contain anything about warranty, will not exclude parole evidence of the terms of the contract, such receipt not being a reduction of the contract to writing with the purpose of ascertaining its terms. (Allen v Pink, 4 M. and W. 140.) Though a representation anterior to the sale, and not forming part of the contract when made, is no warranty, yet if it is material, and also false and fraudulent, it will be a ground for rescinding the contract as having been effected through fraud, or, if rescission be barred, will found an action of damages for the injury done. Prima facie, the remedy by rescission or avoidance of the contract ab initio as obtained by fraud, and the remedy by a special action upon the case to recover the amount of damages occasioned by the fraud, treating the fraud as the substantive ground of action, are at the option of the party injured. (Clarke v Dickson, 27 L. J. Q. B. 223, El. Bl. and El. 148; per Blackburn, J., R. v Saddlers' Co., 32 L. J. Q. B. 337, 343; Feret v Hill, 23 L. J. C. P. 185; Leake on Contracts, p. 195; Story, Contr. i. p. 603; Lord St. Leonards' V. and P. pp. 211, 208–9; Kerr on Fraud, p. 264, citing American cases, and Bédarride sur Dol, vol. i. p. 248; Stair i. 9. 14; Bankt. i. 10. 6. 65, vol. i. p. 259.) But as rescission implies restitutio in integrum, that remedy is barred by the impossibility of returning things to their original position. (Clarke v Dickson, supra; Western Bank of Scotland v Addie, L. R., 1 Sc. App. Ca. 167; Deposit, etc. Assurance Co. v Ayscough, 26 L. J. Q. B. 29; Hunt v Silk, 5 East 449; Blackburn v Smith, 2 Ex. 783.) It is also barred by the party defrauded, after discovery of the fraud, treating the agreement as binding. (Campbell v Fleming, 1 A. and E. 40;

ex parte Briggs, 35 L. J. Ch. 320; Selway v Fogg, 5 M. and W. 86; Macbryde v Weekes, 22 Beav. 533; Vigers v Pike, 8 Cl. and F. 562.) Nor will his right to rescind, if so lost, be revived by the discovery of another incident in the same fraud. (Ibid.) A contract, though induced by fraud, cannot be avoided if the rights of an innocent vendee, or other third party giving value and without notice, have in the meantime intervened,—the transaction not being ipso jure null and void, but only voidable; and third parties without notice being therefore in a position to acquire rights and interests in the matter, which must stand good and be enforceable. (White v Garden, 10 C. B. 919; Kingsford v Merry, 11 Ex. 579; Schofield v Templar, 4 D. and J. 429; Oakes v Turquand, L. R., 2 App. Ca. 375; Henderson v Royal British Bank, 7 E. and B. 356; Addie v Western Bank, supra, and cases there.) But the party defrauded may, instead of rescinding, stand to the contract, even after he has discovered the fraud, and may recover damages for the fraud, or he may recoup in damages if sued by the vendor for the price. The affirmance of a contract by the vendee after discovery of the fraud, merely extinguishes his right to rescind. His other remedies remain unimpaired. (Leake, Story, and Kerr, ut supra, and cases there; Dig. iv. 3. 18, pr. and 1, and id. tit. l. 18. 4, and l. 24; Voet iv. 3. 11.) In order to sustain an action of damages for false and fraudulent misrepresentation, the representation must generally assume to be as to some matter of fact not known to the other party, and not as to the belief or opinion of the person making it. This is on account of the difficulty of ascertaining whether the belief or opinion represented was really entertained, and on account of the latitude to be allowed for error and weakness of judgment, or want of skill, and the varying value of different people's opinions, or of the same man's opinion under different circumstances, so that as a rule one is not entitled to rely absolutely on a statement of opinion, as he is on a statement purporting to be of some external fact. There are cases where the profession of an opinion not really entertained, if made with the fraudulent intent of operating as an inducement to the other, will found an action for fraud. If the party expressing the opinion be an expert, and had, or profess to have had, adequate means of forming a reliable opinion, and the subject of the opinion be a matter about which, in the circumstances, he might easily, and without doubt or much uncertainty, have formed such an opinion; and if he express it not in a vague and general way, but hold it out as a matter to be relied on with safety, he may, especially where the other party places himself in his hands, and so establishes a kind of confidential relation between them, render himself liable to an action for fraud. Where, from the nature of the promises, the pretended opinion might, if really formed, have justly been trusted to almost as confidently as fact, and it is held out as such for the purpose of being so relied on, the misrepresentation is the misrepresentation of a fact—viz. the existence of the opinion—which the other party was entitled to regard as a material fact, in considering whether he would enter into the contract; nor is it easy to see how the party making it can in such a case be permitted to deny that it was so. (Story, Contr. i. 624, and cases there; Parsons on Contracts, ii. pp. 778–9.) Of course, in such a case, the evidence that the opinion professed was not really held must be very clear. (Wall v Stubbs, 1 Madd. 80; Ingram v Thorpe, 7 Ha. 74; Dimmack v Hallett, L. R., 2 Ch.

App. 26; Henderson v Lacon, L. R., 5 Eq. 257.) In an action founded on fraudulent misrepresentation, fraud will be held established if the representation was false in point of fact, and either (1) known by the defendant to be false in fact, or (2) not honestly believed to be true, or (3) if he had no knowledge whether it was true or false. (Evans v Edmonds, 13 C. B. 777, 786; Taylor v Ashton, 11 M. and W. 415; Pickard v Sears, 6 A. and E. 469; Western Bank v Addie, L. R., 1 Sc. App. Ca. 162, 39 Sc. Jur. 437; Smout v Ilbery, 10 M. and W. 10; Thom v Bigland, 8 Exch. 725; Smith v Reese River Co., L. R., 2 Eq. 264; Foster v Charles, 7 Bingh. 107; Murray v Mann, 2 Exch. 541—per Lord Wensleydale; Rex v Mawbey, 6 T. R. 637—per Lawrence, J.; and see especially the charge of Lord J.-C. Inglis in Dobbie v Johnston, 1861, Irvine Smith's Report, p. 314 et seq., and p. 331.) A statement false in fact, though believed to be true, will, if the maker at some former time knew the truth of the matter, and ought to have remembered it, but forgot it at the time of making the statement, be held equivalent to fraud, and will vitiate an agreement. (Burroughs v Lock, 10 Ves. 470; Pulsford v Richards, 17 Beavan 87, 94; Slim v Croucher, 29 L. J. Ch. 273.) And if a statement made in the belief that it is true is afterwards discovered to be false, and the party after the discovery suffers the other to continue in error, and act in the belief of the statement so as to conclude the contract, this, from the time of the discovery, becomes a fraudulent misrepresentation, though not so originally; and the same thing holds where a statement originally true becomes falsified by a change of circumstances known to the party who made it, and not to the other, if the change is not disclosed. (Reynell v Sprye, 1 De G. M. and G. 660, 709; Traill v Baring, 33 L. J. Ch. 521.) Where a party declares that he knows the facts of his own knowledge, and his statements are proved to be false in point of fact, that is evidence, in the absence of any explanation of how he came to be innocently wrong, that his statements were false to his own knowledge. His own assertion, that he knew the facts, will be taken to be true, though his representations as to them are false unless he show the existence of a mistake, and what induced it. (Wright v Selfe—per Cockburn, C. J.—1 Fost. and Finl. 704.) When a party charged with fraudulent misrepresentation pleads that he believed the statement, though he did not know it, the Court will consider the kind or degree of belief entertained, so far as it has materials, with reference to the purpose for which the statement was made. Belief varies from something only a hairsbreadth beyond incredulity to the certainty and assuredness of faith; and a belief of the former kind, while sufficient to excuse a statement unguardedly made, where no one was intended to act on it, will not therefore excuse a party who holds out a statement in which he has only so small an amount of belief himself, as the ground on which another is to act. See Lord J.-C. Inglis' charge in Dobbie v Johnston, supra. The statement said to be false and fraudulent must be material, and its materiality consists in its being such that the person entering into the contract relied on it as a reason for doing so, and would not, it is reasonable to suppose, have entered into the contract in its absence. (Pulsford v Richards, 17 Beav. 86–7; and per Lord Cranworth in National Exchange Co. v Drew, 2 Macq. 103, 120; Attwood v Small—per Lord Brougham—6 Cl. and F. 232, 444, 395.) A misrepresentation must be the proximate and immediate cause of the transaction—the very ground of it—and not merely a remote or indirect cause. (Barry v Crosskey, 2 J. and H. 1; New Brunswick, etc. Railway Co. v Conybeare, 9 H. L. 711; Barrett's case, 3 D. J. and S. 30; Burnes v Pennel, 2 H. L. 497–531.) But it is no defence that the false representation was not the sole inducement to contract: it is enough if the plaintiff was substantially and mainly, or at least materially, induced to do so thereby, though there were other inducements concurring, or other influences at work, which contributed to the success of the false representation. (Clarke v Dickson, 6 C. B. 453; Wade v Tatton, 25 L. J. C. P. (Ex. Ch.) 240; Nicol's case, 3 De Gex and Jones 387; Western Bank v Addie—per Lord Chancellor—L. R. 1 Sc. Ap. 158.) Where a party has practised deception with a view to a particular end, which has been attained by that deception, he cannot be allowed merely to deny the materiality of the deceptive statements, or to suggest what the other party would have done if there had been no misrepresentation: the onus is with him to prove to demonstration that the misrepresented fact was not relied on at all. In the absence of such proof from him, it is enough that the false statement may have been relied on; for it is impossible to say, even though there are concurring inducements, that the untrue statement was not the very one which turned the scale in the other party's mind. (Smith v Kay, 7 H. L. 750; Reynell v Sprye, supra; Rawlins v Wickham, 3 De G. and J. 304; Nicol's case, supra; Kisch v Venezuela Railway Co., 3 De G. J. and S. 122; Traill v Baring, 33 L. J. Ch. 521, 527; Jennings v Broughton, 5 D. M. and G. 126.) Nor can he be heard to say that the party to whom he made the misrepresentation might have known the truth by proper inquiry, or that he had the means of knowing: he must show, upon incontestable evidence, and beyond the possibility of a doubt, that the other party in point of fact knew, and was well aware and cognizant of, the real fact which he himself misrepresented. (Dyer v Hargrave, 10 Ves. 505; Harris v Kemble, 5 Bligh 730; Vigers v Pike, supra; Wilson v Short, 6 Ha. 366, 375; Martin v Cotter, 3 J. and L. 496, 506; Reynell v Sprye, supra; Price v Macaulay, 2 D. M. and Q. 339; Kisch v Venezuela Railway, et e contra, 3 De J. and S. and L. R., 2 App. Ca. 114; Lawrence's case, L. R., 2 Ch. App. 422.) It is no answer to say he was incautious, or simple, or foolish: a man who has made false representations to induce another to contract, cannot turn round and say the other had himself to blame. A man to whom a particular and distinct representation has been made is entitled to rely on it, and need make no further inquiry, even though there are circumstances in the case from which an inference inconsistent with the representation might be drawn, and which, independently of the representation, should have put him on inquiry. No man can complain that another has relied too implicitly on the good faith and honesty of what he himself stated. (Lysney v Selby, 2 Lord Raym. 1118; Dobell v Stevens, 3 B. and C. 623; Rawlins v Wickham, 3 De G. and J. 319; New Brunswick Railway Co. v Muggeridge, 1 Dr. and Sm. 382; Smith v Reese River Co., L. R., 2 Eq. 264; Kisch v Venezuela Railway, supra; Rawlins v Wickham, supra; Grant v Munt, Coop. 173; Van v Corpe, 3 M. and K. 269; Pope v Garland, 4 Y. and C. 394; Cox v Middleton, 2 Drew 209; Grosvenor v Green, 5 Jur. N. S. 117.) Even a distinct refusal to warrant the fact represented will not, if it is still represented as a fact known to the party, liberate him, or deprive the other party of remedy if the representation be false and fraudulent. (See Wood v Smith, 4 C. and P. 45, supra; Pothier, Louage, No. 114.) Nor will a sale 'with all faults,' which is a proclamation that no contract warranty is to be given, absolve from liability for fraud in misleading a buyer as to the real state of the faults existing in the article sold. (Pickering v Dowson—per Heath, J.—4 Taunt. 779; Baglehole v Walters—per Ellenborough, C. J.—3 Campb. 154; Scheider v Heath, 3 Camp. 506—per Mansfield, J. C.; Fletcher v Boucher, 2 Starkie 561.) A contracting party making a statement of specific matters as known to himself, is always bound to warrant fraud to be absent from that statement—dolum malum a se abesse pręstare. (Dig. 18. 1. 43. 2, l. 23, De Reg. Jur.; l. 1, Dig. de Dolo Malo; Vinnius, Inst. p. 586; Dig. 16. 3. 1. 7; Dig. 2. 14. 27. 3 and 4; Dig. Commod. l. 17.) The maxim, Jura vigilantibus non dormientibus subveniunt—sometimes absurdly misapprehended—applies only to competition in the face of diligence between creditors: the law aids the sharpness of lawful activity; but it does not mean to deliver over the slow-witted and simple, who most need its protection, as lawful prey to the vigilantia of cheats and swindlers. A party may, when specific statements are made to him, waive a contract warranty, and rely on the warranty from which no contracting party can stipulate exemption, dolum malum abesse. See, as to the maxim, Dig. 42. 8. 24; Stair i. 9. 15. 7. See also l. ult. C. Depositi. On the contrary, the whole foundation of the edict de Dolo Malo is, that it is directed against 'varios et dolosos qui aliis offuerunt calliditate quādam; ne vel illis malitia sua sit lucrosa, vel istis simplicitas damnosa (l. 1, D. de Dolo Malo). The vigilantia which the law favours is industria as opposed to desidia, not malitia as opposed to simplicitas. Compare d. l. ult. C. Depos. with d. l. D. de Dol. Malo. A false and fraudulent representation may ground an action for damages, not only where made directly to the party who, believing it to be true, has acted on it and sustained damage thereby, but also at the instance of a party to whom it was indirectly made: as, where it is made to a third with the intention of its being communicated to the plaintiff; or where it is known by the maker of it, at the time of contracting, that it has been so communicated, and by the third party to whom it was made. (Langridge v Levy, 2 M. and W. 532, 4 ibid. 337; Blakemore v Bristol and Ex. Ry. Co., 27 L. J. Q. B. 167; Farrant v Barnes, 31 L. J. C. P. 139; Pilmore v Hood, 5 B. N. C. 109; Longmeid v Holliday, 6 Ex. 766. See cases as to representations made by directors of companies to the public at large: Scott v Dixon, 29 L. J. Ex. 62; Denton v Great Northern Ry. Co., 5 El. and Bl. 860; Bagshaw v Seymour, 18 C. B. 903, 4 H. and N. 548.) On the other hand, a fraudulent misrepresentation made by an agent without the principal's knowledge will render the principal who adopts the act and takes the benefit of the contract induced thereby, responsible in damages to the person injured; but if he repudiates the transaction as soon as he becomes acquainted with the fraud, and shuns all participation therein, and if he had given no sanction or authority to it, and the representation was not within the scope of the ordinary authority of an agent acting in such a matter, he will not be responsible. But a principal cannot take any benefit under a false and fraudulent representation made by his agent when acting within the scope of his authority. In respect of the liability of a principal for the acts of his agent, done in the course of his master's

1. Express warranties are conditions of this kind.¹
2. If a merchant agree to sell a commodity, or answer an order, on the buyer paying cash or sending his acceptance in course, the sale is incomplete,² though the goods be sent off, if the cash has not been paid or the acceptance has not been transmitted as [441] stipulated; but if the vendor acquiesce in an alteration of this condition, it will be different.³
3. If he shall stipulate payment by 'a bill,' or 'an approved bill,' at a certain term of payment, the condition must be fulfilled in order to complete the contract; but the seller will not be suffered arbitrarily to reject a bill which ought to be approved. If it be one to which no reasonable objection can be made, it is in England deemed a sufficient compliance.⁴ In Scotland, we are accustomed to consider discounting as the test. But this in all cases ought not to be held, and probably the rule applied in England would guide the decision.

business, no sensible distinction can be drawn between the case of fraud and any other wrong. The principal cannot take the benefit and repudiate the fraud. The statements of the agent are the statements of the principal, and the principal cannot separate the contract itself from that by which it was induced. He must adopt the whole contract, including the statements and representations which induced it, or must repudiate the contract altogether. On this principle, a partnership firm is bound by false and fraudulent representations made by one of the partners whilst acting within the scope and limits of his authority, and having reference to the proper business of the firm. (2.) As to the Remedy.—Where the sale is of goods in genere, and where, therefore, the property does not pass by the bargain, the term warranty is not strictly applicable to representations respecting quality or sufficiency; but the specification or description is considered to be a condition of the order; and if the article tendered is not conformable to order, the purchaser may reject it, and may recover the price if he has granted his acceptance for it. Allan v Lake, 18 Q. B. 560, and cases in 1 Sm. L. Ca. p. 175. Cases of this description do not fall within the scope of the 5th section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act (supra, p. 464). Taylor v Macfarlane, 1868, 6 Macph. H. L. p. 1; 1 L. R. H. L. Sc. 245.

In cases of sale of specific goods, a representation of the nature of a warranty merely gives rise to a claim of damages for breach of warranty (Sm. L. Ca. ut supra; Heyworth v Hutchison, 2 L. R. Q. B. 447); but if it amounts to a fraudulent representation, the purchaser has the option of rescinding the contract, and claiming repetition of the price, provided he can restore the article sold in the same state as that in which he received it. Clarke v Dixon, E. B. and E. 148, and cases there cited. We have already seen that a mere expression of opinion is not in the ordinary case equivalent to a warranty, unless it be founded on a fact presumably within the seller's knowledge. Jendwine v Slade, 2 Esp. 572; Power v Barham, 4 Ad. and El. 473, and cases noted in the first paragraph of this note.]

² Brodie, Tr. for Arnot's Crs., v Tod & Co., 20 May 1814, 17 Fac. Coll. 609. Arnot of Leith agreed to buy clover seed from Tod & Co. of Hull, payable by an acceptance at three months. Tod & Co., in sending the invoice and bill of lading, enclosed a draft for acceptance, and added, 'which please return in course.' Arnot received this letter 24th April, but did not return the acceptance till the 26th. Tod & Co., who should have received their answer on 26th, relanded the goods. The Court of Session held, 1. That the words above quoted formed a condition, on the fulfilment of which the bargain depended; and, 2. That the course of post meant the very next post.

4. If one sell a commodity expected from abroad, 'on arrival,' the arrival of the commodity is a condition, and there is no sale if it do not arrive. The same has been held when the bargain is to sell a particular commodity expected, 'on arrival of a particular ship.' If that ship arrive without a cargo, there is no sale.¹

5. In the construction of all express conditions introduced into a bargain of sale, the fair and reasonable and customary interpretation of the condition is to be taken.²

6. If goods be sold 'as good merchantable goods,' this is a warranty or express condition, which will not be defeated by proving the goods to be equal to a sample shown.³

7. If a sale is by sample, it is a condition that the commodity shall answer to the sample (to which effect the sample must be identified); and the buyer may reject the goods, notwithstanding any usage tending to establish a rule only of abatement.⁴ The buyer is [442] entitled to examine the commodity in bulk at any proper and convenient time; and if the seller refuse to show it, after he is by the contract bound to have it in readiness, the buyer may rescind the contract.⁵ But it is of no consequence that samples have been introduced, it could only mean a bill to which no reasonable objection could be made; and that to allow the seller in an arbitrary manner to repudiate the bill, would enable him, according to his interest or caprice, to annul a contract by which the purchaser is absolutely bound.

[Smith, Merc. Law, 7th ed. p. 507. The following specialty deserves to be noticed. In terms of a contract of sale of goods, payment was made (through a broker) by an 'approved banker's bill.' The banking-house (Barned's Bank) failed, consequently the bill was not accepted. The purchaser, not being a party to the bill, did not receive notice of dishonour. Held that his liability on the bill was not more extensive than that of an endorser, and that he was not liable in an action for the price of the goods. Smith v Mercer, 3 L. R. Ex. 51.]

So in Boyd v Siffkin, 1809, 2 Camp. 326, where 32 tons of hemp exported by the Fanny Almira were agreed to be sold on arrival of that ship, and she afterwards came without a cargo, Lord Ellenborough said: 'I think on arrival means on arrival of the hemp. The parties did not mean to enter into a wager. The hemp was expected by this ship. Had it arrived, it was sold to the plaintiff; as none arrived, the contract was at an end.' [Jale v Thornton, 3 Camp. 274; Lovatt v Hamilton, 5 M. and W. 639; Alewyn v Prior, 1 Ry. and M. 406; Johnson v Macdonald, 9 M. and W. 600; Gorissen v Perren, 27 L. J. C. P. 29; Vernede v Weber, 25 L. J. Ex. 326; Simond v Braddon, 26 L. J. C. P. 198; Hale v Rawson, 27 L. J. C. P. 189; Parsons, Contracts, i. 552 et seq.]

² In Hayward v Scougal, 2 Camp. 56, an agreement to sell all the hemp to be shipped by the seller's agent in the ship A, was held to include only what that agent ships for the seller, not what is embarked for others.

³ Tye v Fynmore, 1813, 3 Camp. 462. In this case sassafras wood was sold after a specimen had been exhibited to the buyer, with which the whole quantity was said to accord. But in the sale-note it was described as 'two tons of fair merchantable sassafras wood, in logs, at six guineas per cwt.' Lord Ellenborough held this not to be a sale by sample, and it is not enough to prove that the wood corresponds in quality with the specimen exhibited to the defender before the sale. The question is, Whether it was in the understanding of the trade 'fair merchantable sassafras wood?' which it is clearly proved not to have been. The vendor was nonsuited. [An express warranty of one particular quality excludes any implied warranty of other qualities. Parkinson v Lee, 2 East 314; Budd v Fairmaner, 8 Bing. 48; Dickson v Zizania, 20 L. J. C. P. 72. But see Mody v Gregson, 38 L. J. Ex. 12, 4 L. R. Ex. 49, where, however, the precise point was as to the correctness of a charge to a jury 'in the circumstances of that case;' and the case was clearly one of fraud, with adulteration both of goods and sample by the sellers, who made them both. Josling v Kingsford, 32 L. J. C. P. 94.]

⁴ Hibbert v Shee, 1 Camp. 113. Sixteen hogsheads of sugar were sold by samples drawn, and which were admitted to be those produced at trial. The sugar did not in colour correspond, and dealers proved them to be less valuable by five or six shillings a hundredweight. The seller required the buyer to take them on abatement, which the buyer refused. The seller rested on the usage, and examined brokers to prove that such disputes were settled in this way. Lord Ellenborough said: 'The question here is, Whether the contract has been substantially performed? Does the sugar accord with the sample exhibited at the sale? If I buy a commodity wholly discordant to that which is promised me, I am not bound to accept of a compensation for this dissimilarity. This is not a performance of the contract. And though there should prevail a habitual mode of arrangement between dealers in the article, I have always a right to say, "Is this what I meant to purchase?" A spirit of candour and accommodation may lead to a compromise between the parties; but the legal mode of dealing is, that if the article agreed on is not furnished, I may reject it, and keep my money in my pocket.'

⁵ Lorymer v Smith, 1 Barn. and Cress. 1. This was a sale of wheat by sample at Bristol. By the usage of the place, the buyer is entitled to inspect the wheat in bulk. On a shown at entering into the bargain, unless the sale has been made distinctly in reference to them.¹ Although the samples should not be referred to, so as to make it a sale on sample, the showing of samples is a relevant circumstance in evidence of a deceitful representation.²

8. If the sale be made in reference to the taste, or any other criterion, there is no sale or concluded bargain till that test has been applied, and expressly or tacitly the bargain bound by the seller's approbation.

9. Conditions may be suspending or dissolving conditions; as to the effect of which, see supra, p. 256 [and p. 455, note].³

IV. EFFECT OF INSOLVENCY.—It is a rule in the law of contracts, that both parties are bound, or neither. But sometimes there is a disposition to misapply this rule to the question between the creditors of a bankrupt, and one with whom the bankrupt has made an agreement. To clear this, the distinction must be correctly observed between the contract of sale, and the transference in consequence of that contract. The contract may be completed without entitling the buyer to insist on having the commodity from the creditors, and yet so as to bind him if the creditors choose to insist that the bargain shall be implemented. So it may be effectual to bind the seller, although the buyer is bankrupt, provided the creditors choose to offer the full price; while the seller cannot have anything but his dividend, if he persist in forcing the goods on the creditors. In all these cases the contract is binding, though its effects vary. If a merchant has bought wheat from another who fails, he will not be entitled to insist for delivery, although he may have paid the price, or may be willing to pay it down; for he is under the contract only a creditor for delivery of the corn, and the creditors are not bound by their debtor's contract. But the contract is available to the solvent party, in so far as the universitas of the bankrupt estate is bound [443] to him as to other personal creditors; and so he may on his contract claim damages for non-execution. On the other hand, however, the obligations under the contract may be made available to the purchaser's bankrupt estate, either if the price has already been paid, or if the creditors are willing to pay the stipulated price; for the solvent party has no further interest than to demand full performance of the bankrupt's obligation.

SUBSECTION II.—CLAIMS IN RESPECT OF THE CONTRACT OF SALE.

CLAIMS ON THE PART OF THE SELLER.—The right of action, or of claiming in bankruptcy, which may arise out of the contract of sale, may be either after the goods have been delivered; or while the goods are still with him undelivered or stopped in transitu; or when they have accidentally perished after the risk has been changed.

1. Where the goods have been already delivered, the seller may have a personal action, demand to see it, part was shown; but the buyer, saying he did not choose to disclose his connections, offered to send for a bushel at a time, but would not show it all. A few days afterwards he said the wheat was now in his granaries, and might be seen. The buyer refused to hold to the bargain, and was held entitled to rescind it on the general rule of law as well as the local custom. Ch. J. Abbot, and Bayley, Holroyd, and Best, Justices, present.

In Meyer v Everth, 4 Camp. 22, there was a similar deficiency of reference to the samples. So in Laing v Fidgeon, 4 Camp. 169, where sample saddles were shown, but no reference to them in the sale-note; and the same in Gardner v Gray, ibid. 144. The doctrine in all these cases was, that the sample could not be allowed to be incorporated in the contract, where the sale-note is silent as to the sample. [Powell v Horton, 2 Bingh. N. C. 668.]

² Thus, in Meyer v Everth, 4 Camp. 22, Lord Ellenborough, holding that the samples were not made a part of the bargain, said: 'You should have declared in case for a deceitful representation. It was no part of the contract that the sugar should be equal to the sample. Where goods are sold in this way, I think evidence might be admissible to show that, at the time of the sale, a sample was fraudulently exhibited to deceive the buyers, whereby the plaintiff had been induced to purchase the commodity, which turned out greatly inferior in quality and value.'

or may claim as a personal creditor for the price, and take his dividend along with the other creditors.

2. Where the goods are not yet delivered, the seller may raise action for the price, proffering delivery of the goods; or he may send the goods to a warehouse at the buyer's risk; or he may, in bankruptcy, offer them to the creditors, on payment of the price; and if they are unwilling to take them on that condition, he may apply to a judge to have them sold as under lien, that he may rank for the balance of the price; or he may make his claim for the price, and retain the goods under lien. The seller is entitled to charge warehouse rent, and the expense of preserving the goods in marketable condition, during such time as the goods may have remained with him beyond the time specified in the contract.¹

3. When the goods have accidentally, and without fault on the part of the seller, perished between the completion of the sale and the time of delivery, the seller may still have his claim as a creditor for the price in certain cases.² The general rule is, that the contract of sale being once completed as to a specific subject, the risk is thenceforward with the buyer—'Periculum rei venditæ nondum traditæ est emptoris;' and this notwithstanding that the buyer is bound to pay the price, 'emptoris damnum est, et tenetur pretium solvere.'³ This is a question which has occasioned much controversy among lawyers;⁴ but the true resolution seems to lie in the distinction between the contract of sale and the transference consequent upon delivery. By the completion of the contract the seller is bound to deliver, the buyer to pay the price; and these obligations are counterparts and considerations for each other. The parties reciprocally may refuse performance unless the counter-obligation is performed; but the destruction of a special subject, which the seller has undertaken to deliver, is a good defence against performance provided it has not arisen from his fault.⁵ This is the legal principle of a rule which is fully established in practice. Stair has doubted the efficacy of the rule where the subject has perished. Erskine says that at least the seller is entitled to the full price, notwithstanding any accidental deterioration. But cases have [444] again and again been determined to the full extent of the whole doctrine.⁶

¹ [The seller holds the goods not by a lien, but by an assertion of his right of property not yet divested by any delivery. Whether he could, while refusing delivery till he is paid the price—i.e. while retaining the goods for his own security and benefit, and not for the benefit of the vendee—make any claim for his trouble in doing so, is, at least in England, doubtful; and it is certain there that such claim, if any exists, is personal merely against the vendee, and not covered by the vendor's lien, which extends only to the price. Somes v British Empire Shipping Co., 27 L. J. Q. B. 397; in Ex. Chamb. 28 L. J. Q. B. 220; in House of Lords, 30 L. J. Q. B. 229. The vendor, in Scotland, could retain against the vendee, but apparently not (under the 2d section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act) against a sub-vendee. A purchaser, who rejects goods, may retain in security of repetition of the price, but not for damages; Melville v Critchley, 1856, 18 D. 643. His claim is not a condition of the contract of sale. But see Pothier, Vente, No. 290; L. 9, D. de Act. Empt.; and Greaves v Ashlin—per Ellenborough, C. J.—3 Camp. 426.]

⁶ See the case of M'Donald v Hutchison, supra, p. 180, note 4, determined by the Court of Session in 1744, M. 10070.

In Hinde v Whitehouse, in England, 1806, 7 East 558, a quantity of sugars, which were in the king's warehouse, were sold by auction, and samples delivered in on 20th September. A fire on the 22d consumed the warehouse and the sugars. In an action of assumpsit by the seller against the purchaser, the case was tried before Mr. Justice Rook at Lancaster. There were several points on the English Statute of Frauds besides the question of periculum. The point was reserved, and argued in King's Bench at great length. Lord Ellenborough delivered the judgment of the Court, holding the sale to be complete, 'so as to cast the subsequent risk of loss upon the buyer.'

The case of Phillimore v Barry, 1808, 1 Camp. 513, is of the same description. Here thirteen puncheons of rum, lodged in a warehouse at Dover, were bought at auction, the purchaser to deposit 25 per cent., the rest of the price in thirty days, and to be chargeable with warehouse rent after the expiration of that time. About three weeks after the sale the warehouse was consumed by an accidental fire. Lord Ellenborough held the circumstances sufficient to satisfy the Statute of Frauds, and that the risk was with the buyer; so verdict went for the seller. [See also Tarling v Baxter, 6 B. and C. 360; Whitehouse v Frost, 12 East 613; Alexander v Gardner, 1 Bing. 671; Hansen v Craig & Rose, 1859, 21 D. 432.]

But while the sale is still incomplete, as where the quantity has not been separated from a common mass, or where the price is referred to weight or measurement, and the quantity has not been ascertained, or where the bargain is in reference to some test or criterion not yet applied,¹ the risk is with the seller; and if the goods have perished, he will have no claim for the price.²

² [The rule that every obligation certi corporis is extinguished by the extinction of the subject damno fatali, is a rule also of the English law. See Taylor v Caldwell, 1863, 32 L. J. Q. B. 165, where it is elaborately explained by Blackburn, J.; see also Appleby v Meyers, 35 L. J. C. P. 295, L. R., 1 C. P. 615. But it must be noted that the rule de certo corporis does not involve the doctrine of the buyer's risk, unless when we couple it with the further rule, which is not adopted in England (see e.g. Rugg v Minett, 11 East 210), and which even in the Roman law and our own is peculiar to sale,—the rule, viz., that the liberation of the debitor certi corporis from his obligations does not liberate the other party from his counter-obligations. In location, for example, the lessor's obligation to deliver the subject to the lessee is extinguished by the destruction of the subject; but so also is the lessee's obligation for hire, in other words, Res perit locatori. The exception in the case of sale originated not in any idea that the vendor and vendee's obligations were not reciprocal and conditional of each other, just as much as the lessor's and lessee's were, but from the letter of the old Roman formula expressing the vendor's obligation, which was not to deliver the thing, like the lessors, or to make the vendee dominus rei venditæ, but 'hactenus tenetur venditor ut rem emptori habere liceat, non etiam ut ejus faciat.' (L. 30, sec. 1, D. de Act. Empt.; Poth. Vente, No. 1.) And according to the letter of this formula, the vendor had, as it rather seemed, never failed in his obligation, or given the vendee any ground to plead liberation thereby from his counter-obligation. The vendor's obligation is not so restricted in our jurisprudence, nor in any modern jurisprudence based on the civil law, but the peculiarity remains as the legal principle of the rule res perit emptori. (See Ortolan, Explic. Hist. des Inst. vol. iii. p. 282; Fréméry, Droit Commercial, p. 5; Brodie, Stair, App. 857.) The fact of the vendee's risk, then, arises not from the rule de certo corpore alone: it consists in this, that while the seller is liberated thereby, the buyer is not. Every question between vendor and vendee as to the risk of the total destruction of the subject is soluble by the successive application of the following criteria: (1.) Does the rule de certo corpore apply so as to extinguish the seller's obligation? and if so, (2.) Is the buyer's obligation to pay still enforceable? Of course, where there has as yet been no final engagement between them so as to constitute the relation of vendor and vendee at the time of the destruction of the subject, there can be no room for the rule de certo on the one hand, nor can the buyer be liable in payment on the other, i.e. the risk does not pass. This is the case where 'the bargain is in reference to some test or criterion not yet applied,' as in sales upon trial ad gustum, and in conditional sales pendente conditione, for there is as yet no completed engagement. But a sale 'where the quantity has not yet been separated from a common mass,' or 'where the price is referred to weight and measurement, and the quantity has not been ascertained' (see text), is not an incomplete sale. In the first case, if the whole mass out of which the quantity sold was contracted to be delivered perish damno fatali, the rule de certo corpore applies, whether there has been separation or not; and, on the other hand, the vendee's obligation is not discharged, but remains enforceable; i.e. the risk ought to be held, according to the principles of our law, to have passed to the vendee. The authorities on which Mr. Bell lays down that the risk does not pass, even in case of the destruction of the whole mass out of which the quantity sold is by the contract to be taken, are all English authorities, and it has been explained in a previous note that the principles of the English cases on this point have no application to our law. Where these peculiar principles of English law do not interfere, as in the case of the executory contract in Willard v Perkins, cited in Parsons' Contr. i. 533, note (2), the non-separation of the quantity sold from the whole mass destroyed will not free the vendee from the risk. There is no Scotch decision holding separation in such a case necessary to pass the risk. So, the application of the rule de certo will not, where a mass is sold and destroyed, be affected by the circumstance whether it was sold for a slump price, or for a price to be ascertained, at a certain rate per bushel or per ton; but the vendee's obligation, and the possibility of enforcing it, will. And hence arises the difference, that in the former case, as was held in Hansen v Craig & Rose, the risk will be held to have passed to the vendee, while in the latter, it appears to be impossible that it should. In any case where the price is to be ascertained by weight and measurement, and has not been ascertained,—whether it be a separate and specific subject, or the mass of which it formed a part, that perishes, the contract is not incomplete; that is to say, there is a final engagement from which neither can resilie. And the rule de certo corpore applies to the vendor's part of that engagement, and there is nothing, strictly speaking, to discharge the vendee; but his obligation cannot be enforced against him, because its amount cannot be ascertained by the standard prescribed by the contract: and, indeed, no relevant action could be stated against him. In this case the result is, that the risk does not pass to the buyer; for where the buyer cannot be compelled to pay, male diceretur, as Perezius remarks (Inst. Imp. iii. 24, p. 508), rem perire emptori aut ejus periculo esse. Again, the vendee may acquire a good defence against payment, even where the subject of the vendor's obligation perishes, and the obligation perishes with it. Where the vendor is in mora to deliver, but the destruction of the subject has been by some damnum fatale for which he is not directly responsible, he may still be liable to relieve the vendee of the loss which would in the ordinary case fall on him, upon the same principle upon which an agent is liable for the loss to his principal by a damnum fatale happening to goods deposited in an improper place, or contrary to the usual course of business or to his instructions, though these breaches of his duty were not the causa proxima of the loss,—or where he is held liable for the bankruptcy of a banker with whom he had the funds deposited

Where the bargain is to deliver the commodity at a particular place, the risk is with the seller till delivery at that place; so that if it perish on the voyage, it is lost to the seller, and he cannot claim for the price.¹

Where the goods are to be sent from a distance, and the seller neglects his duty in respect to the safe carriage, he will not be entitled to claim the price should the goods be lost. Thus the seller has to send the goods by sea; but they are delivered so carelessly into the vessel by which they are to be transported, that they are lost. Is he entitled to claim as a creditor for the price? The rule seems to be, that he can have no claim unless he shall have so fixed them on the wharfinger, or on the shipmaster, as to furnish a remedy to the buyer.² The same rule will hold as to a parcel sent by a coach or land-carrier. And the doctrine was in one case carried so far in England, that a person having executed an order for goods, by delivering them to the receiving-house of a vessel trading between the two places, was nevertheless held to have no claim for the price,³ as he had not paid the additional in his own name, though there could have been no complaint against him if they had been deposited in the same bank in his principal's name. (See Story, Agency, sec. 200, note, sec. 218; Caffrey v Darby, 6 Vesey 496; Davis v Garrett, 6 Bingh. 716; Harle v Ogilvie, 1749, Kilk. 377, M. 10095; Massey v Banner, 4 Madd. 413; Knight v Lord Plymouth, 3 Atk. 480.) The principle is, that whatever be the immediate cause of the loss, if the party on whom the loss would otherwise fall can show that the other was under a duty to him, and that but for the breach of that duty the property destroyed would not have been in a situation exposed to the incidence of the damnum which has befallen it, there is a sufficient ground for an action of reparation. In this way, in the case of mora on the vendor's part in delivering the goods, or in the case of a misdelivery by him to some improper medium of conveyance to the vendee, if loss befall the goods in these circumstances, there will emerge to the vendee a claim of damages or for reparation, which will form a set-off against the vendor's claim for the price, or which will rather be held to exclude it, on the principle, Frustra petis quod mox es restitutus. In other words, in this case the risk will not be held to have passed, res peribit venditori. But again, following out the operation of the principle that creates the claim of damage in such a case by principal against agent, just as the agent may in answer to that claim of damages set up and show any ground which would have prevented the principal from taking benefit even though the agent had performed his duty, i.e. which must certainly have prevented him, not which might probably have done so (Story, sec. 222; M'Lean v Grant, 15 Nov. 1805, M. App. Reparation, No. 2); so, if the vendor can show in such a case that the subject would equally have perished in the hands of the vendee had it been delivered, he will elide the vendor's action of damages, and leave him no ground whereon to plead a set-off against his, the vendor's, own action for the price. (Poth. Vente, No. 58; Stair i. 17. 15.) In other words, where the vendee can plead a set-off against the vendor's claim for the price, res perit venditori; where he cannot, res perit emptori. And so, where the loss has happened by the direct fault of the vendor, in breach of that obligation incumbent on him to take proper care and custody of the goods till delivery, this will give the vendee a ground of set-off against the action for the price. (See Poth. Vente, No. 55; Domat. i. 2. 2. 26; Ersk. iii. 3. 7; Stair i. 14. 7.) Again, just as a depositary or an agent may assume, by special agreement, the risk of everything that may happen to the property in his hands (Pothier, Mand. sec. 50, l. 39, D. de Mand.), so the vendor may. (Spence v Ormiston, 25 Jan. 1687, M. 3153; Milne & Co. v Miller, 1 Feb. 1809, 15 F. C. 127; Vale v Bayle, Cowp. 294; Inst. iii. 24. 3, ll. 1 and 10, D. de Per. et Comm. Rei Vend.; Ersk. iii. 3. 7.) An undertaking to deliver at some specified place, different from that where the goods are at the time of sale, has been construed to amount to a special undertaking of this kind.]

¹ Milne & Co. v Miller, 1 Feb. 1809, 15 Fac. Coll. 127, where grain was by letters sold, 'to be delivered at Stirling shore at the mast,' and sample given. About three weeks afterwards it arrived at Stirling; and the buyer being from home, his clerk and servants took it and lodged it in a barn, keeping it carefully apart, as it had been heated and spoilt. An inspection was ordered by the sheriff, from which the grain appeared to have been damaged before its arrival at Stirling. The Lord Ordinary found, that 'in respect the grain was by the bargain to be shipped by the seller, and delivered at Stirling shore, the risk remained on the seller till delivery; and therefore found the buyer not bound to take the grain.' The Court affirmed this judgment. See also Spence v Ormiston, 25 Jan. 1687, M. 3153.

² In Buckman v Levi, 1813, 3 Camp. 414, Lord Ellenborough directed a jury to find a verdict for the buyer, where the seller had neither taken a receipt when the goods were delivered to the wharfinger or carrier, nor taken care to have them booked, nor in any way fixed the goods on the carrier, so as to furnish the buyer with a remedy over against him; and verdict went accordingly. [Fleet v Morrison, 1854, 16 D. 1122.]

³ Clarke v Hutchins, 1811, 14 East 475. In this case Hutchins at Gosport ordered goods from Clarke at Plymouth. The goods were in value £51. Clarke entered them at the receiving-house of the carrying ship between those places, the owners of which had published cards limiting their responsibility to packages of £5 value, unless entered and paid for at a higher rate. The goods were never delivered, and Hutchins refused to pay for them. The seller brought his action of assumpsit; but under the direction of Grahame, B., he was nonsuited. The Court of King's Bench refused a rule. Lord Ellenborough said: 'The plaintiff cannot be said to have deposited the goods in the usual and ordinary way, for the purpose of forwarding them to the defendant, unless he took the usual and ordinary precaution which the notoriety of the sum advertised as requisite to the carrier's responsibility for a package of that value. [445] But that doctrine has been since doubted.¹

The directions given by the buyer as to the carriage, must be followed with reasonable diligence and attention.²

On the same principle that the seller must secure to the buyer his remedy in case of loss, he is bound to furnish the means of insuring, otherwise to stand to the risk himself.³ The regular course is, to deliver the goods to a particular ship, and send the bill of lading; and when that is done, the shipowners are charged with the goods, the buyer enabled to insure, and he has it in his power to dispose of the goods immediately, so that he has all his remedies. Where a bill of lading is taken in the ordinary course of navigation, it seems to be an absolute duty of the shipper to transmit it; and he will be liable for any loss which may arise from the neglect. But it is neither necessary nor possible in all cases to send a bill of lading. The seller may not know the ship by which the goods are to be sent; in which case, as insurance may be done on ship or ships, it seems to be sufficient to give notice that the goods are to go by the first ship, or by the first packet, or by a ship expected to sail soon, or against a certain day, the name of the ship unknown, etc.⁴ General [446] carriers' general undertaking required with respect to goods of this value, to ensure them a safe conveyance; that is, by making a special entry of them. He had an implied authority, and it was his duty to do whatever was necessary to secure the responsibility of the carriers for the safe delivery of the goods, and to put them into such a course of conveyance as that, in case of a loss, the defendant might have his indemnity against the carriers.' The rest of the Court assented.

² Sword v Milloy, 17 Feb. 1813, 17 Fac. Coll. 209. Milloy ordered a cargo of coals to be sent by a particular ship; but that ship being engaged, he ordered the coal merchant to 'freight a gabbart yourself at 2s. 9d. per cart.' He did freight a vessel then in employment at Broomielaw; but she sank, and the cargo perished. In an action for the price the defence was, that the ship was not seaworthy, and that this was notorious and manifest from the appearance of the ship. A proof was taken, and Lord Justice-Clerk Boyle thought that, from the evidence, the pursuer had sufficiently discharged his obligation, the vessel being an ordinary trader there in employment. Lord Meadowbank held the action for the price to lie, unless it were proved that the pursuer was guilty of culpa lata, which was not shown here.

³ This is taken for granted as the very groundwork of all the cases on the subject.

Thus, in Andrew v Ross, Park, and others, 6 Dec. 1810, 16 Fac. Coll. 68, it was laid down from the bench, 'as an essential part of the shipper's duty, to give notice immediately of the shipment, that the purchaser may have it in his power to take measures for his safety;' and as to the special case it was said: 'Here no notice of the shipment or delivery at the wharf was given; indeed, the purchasers had no reason to conclude that the goods were sent at all, in which case it was entirely out of their power to secure themselves by insurance.' See below, p. 477, note 1.

Johnston & Sharp v Baillie, 2 June 1815, 16 Fac. Coll. 387. Baillie bought from Johnston & Sharp three hhds. of sugar, to be shipped for Ayr by the first opportunity. He received on 23d January an invoice, which did not mention whether the sugar was at Glasgow or Port-Glasgow, nor in what ship the sugar was to be sent. Two ships arrived at Ayr, but the sugars were not on board; on which Baillie, 16th February, wrote, expressing his surprise and his conjectures, with provisional directions about shipping them if at Port-Glasgow. To this no answer was returned. The goods had been put on board the John on 2d February, and the bill of lading was delivered to Baillie's correspondent, whom he directed to call and inquire, on the 27th. It was sent to Baillie on the 28th. On that day the ship was lost, about ten miles from Ayr, and Baillie got the intelligence at the same time that he got the bill of lading. The Court were of opinion that due notification of the shipment had not been made. They held that there was a neglect, not only of what was necessary to a correct insurance, but what was most essential to the purchase in many respects, as enabling Baillie to take measures of security during the navigation of the Clyde; and in general, that it is salutary to require, in all cases, rigidly, that the rules of accurate mercantile jurisprudence should be observed. The seller's action for the price was dismissed. Against this judgment was the opinion of two very eminent judges, Lord information of the time of sailing is sometimes the only notice that can positively be relied on. In the carrying trade, which is prosecuted to a great extent by shipping companies, as between London and Leith, London and Dundee and Perth, Leith and Glasgow, Leith and Hamburg, etc., there are a number of ships belonging to the company, and their warehouses fill with goods against the day of sailing, and are emptied indiscriminately into whichever ship is first ready or most convenient; or the intended order of the sailing of the smacks is interrupted by accidents, and the goods intended for one ship are put on board of another. The only safe mode of insuring in such cases is to insure on ship or ships, and there can be no doubt that it will be perfectly effectual.¹ But a question remains of some importance: When goods are sent to a shipping company's wharf, the receipt in general appropriates the goods to a particular ship—the ship next in order for sailing. In this case there can be no doubt that when the seller transmits such a receipt, bearing the name of the ship, he fulfils his duty; and if the goods are afterwards put on board of another ship and lost, whatever question may be raised with the shipping company, no defence can be made against the seller's claim for the price.² But even where no such receipt has been taken, and from the wharfinger's information the seller has himself made up an invoice, expressing the name of a particular vessel, which turns out not to be the ship in which the goods were ultimately sent, the buyer is liable. The custom is held in such cases to construe both the receipt and the information of the wharfinger into an engagement, not so much to send the goods by a particular ship, as by the first ship in which they can be sent; the name of the loading ship being taken for the company's ships.³ The cases quoted below are to be taken as characterized particularly by the custom of the trade; and this effect [447] seems to be due to the custom in the opinion of the judges of England.⁴ Wherever the information is such that no effectual insurance can be made,⁵ or where the information

Robertson and Lord Pitmilley, who held that there was sufficient information given to the purchaser to enable him to insure, while the shipowners were fully charged with the goods.

² Cooke v Ludlow, 2 New Rep. C. B. 119. Ludlow, near Bristol, ordered a patent chaff-cutter from Cooke of London, who sent it to Symond's wharf, where Bristol vessels load, and received from the wharfingers a receipt: 'The Commerce, C. Farquharson, for Bristol, 17th December, received 13s. 6d. J. M.' The same day, Cooke by post informed Ludlow that the Commerce was to sail in January for Bristol, and that the agents were Pollard & Sons. It is the custom, when the vessels loading at the wharf are full, to reserve the overplus goods for the next. The chaff-cutter was thus sent by the Nancy in April, which was the next ship. When the chaff-cutter did not arrive by the Commerce, Ludlow gave himself no further trouble. In the meanwhile it went safe, and lay at Pollard's for a year; and when the price was demanded, Ludlow defended himself on the circumstances. The Court held the compliance with the order to be reasonable, and that it lay with the buyer to give notice of non-arrival.

³ In the following cases there is a degree of looseness in the printed reports, which I have endeavoured to correct:—

1. Hesseltine v Arrol & Co., 1802, M. 10111. Arrol & Co. of Edinburgh ordered three chests of tea from Hesseltine of London; and the tea was sent to the Berwick Shipping Company's wharf. Hesseltine, on sending to learn what ship was to sail for Leith, was told that if his goods came next day they would go by the 'Kelso Packet, Robert Moir master;' and on this he made up his invoice, and inserted those names in it. But having occasion to send to the wharf in the evening, he learned that the tea would go by the 'Union, Jo. Paterson;' and he altered his invoice accordingly, and sent it off on 6th February. He sent the tea to the wharf, but does not appear to have taken a receipt. The goods went by the Kelso after all, and were stranded. Two boxes were lost; one delivered damaged. Hesseltine brought his action, and succeeded. The Court proceeded, I believe, on these grounds:—1. That the shipper having reason to believe the information correct, and the buyer having it in his power to insure on ship or ships, it was enough; 2. That the goods being fixed with the wharfinger, the question thenceforward lay with him; and by the custom of trade, there is no reliance on the particular ship by which a shipping company is to send a particular package.

2. Hammond & Co. v Porteous & Dewar, 13 Dec. 1808, 15 Fac. Coll. 48. Porteous & Dewar, Perth, ordered nine chests of tea from Elton, Hammond, & Co. of London. An invoice was sent, bearing, 'Per Bridport Packet, Wishart, for Perth;' but no bill of lading or receipt. The goods went by the Active. The Bridport arrived in safety; the Active was lost. Lord Glenlee held the buyers liable for the price. The Court held Hesseltine's case as a precedent, and affirmed his judgment.

3. The same doctrine was held generally in the case of Arnot v Stewart. See below, note 5.

⁴ See, in Cooke v Ludlow, supra, note 2.

⁵ Arnot v Stewart, 25 Nov. 1813, 17 Fac. Coll. 462. Stewart ordered molasses from Redfair of London. They were sent to the shipping company's wharf, and went by the Kinloch, which sailed on 24th February. On 27th an invoice was sent, dated on that day, and bearing the Defiance as the name of the ship, but not mentioning the day of sailing. The Kinloch is unduly delayed till it is too late to insure,¹ the seller will not be entitled to claim the price. Where the orders of the buyer are not observed, the risk is with the seller.²

CLAIMS ON THE PART OF THE BUYER.—The buyer, in like manner as the seller, has a right to insist on implement of the contract, by delivery of the goods; and this either before or after he shall himself have done his part. And on the same footing, on the bankruptcy of the seller, the buyer can claim as a creditor, either before the price is paid or after having paid it.

If the price has not yet been paid, the seller's creditors have it in their option to close with the buyer's proposal, and proceed with the bargain. The desire to have the bargain fulfilled may be on their side, where the bargain is a good one, or where the price has fallen, or where the goods have been spoilt or lost at the risk of the buyer; which cases have already been treated at large. Nay, should the buyer have failed, it may be more advantageous for the seller's creditors to insist even against the bankrupt estate of the buyer for such dividend as it will afford, leaving the trustee on that estate to make the best of the goods. But [448] the proper case to be discussed here is, where the buyer, either having paid the price or not yet having paid it, requires delivery of the goods, and the seller's creditors cannot or do not choose to make delivery.

The contract of sale raises only a personal action or claim; jus ad rem. And the claim for delivery of goods sold but not transferred resolves into a personal demand for damages; all personal creditors, whether for money or ad factum præstandum, being only personal creditors marshalled in the same class, and to be paid by a dividend of the inadequate fund.³

was lost, and Stewart refused to pay the price. The Judge-Admiral, and afterwards Lords Gillies and Bannatyne in the Bill Chamber, repelled the defence, and held the seller to have done his duty. The Court altered this judgment on these grounds:—1. That the invoice misled the buyer to believe that the risk was not commenced till the 27th, and that an insurance on that information would have been ineffectual; and, 2. That although no insurance was here made and avoided, the buyer was entitled to use his discretion upon just information.

had the ship come under convoy; that it was in suspense till her arrival; and although, had the sugars come safe, it might have been no excuse for the defender's not accepting them that they had not come under convoy, yet as they came not safe, and that till they arrived at the port of delivery the property of the sugars was not transferred to the defender, neither could they be on his risk.' The defence was sustained. [See Story on Agency, sec. 200, note. Caffrey v Darby, 6 Ves. 496; Davis v Garret, 6 Bingh. 716; Barker v James, 4 Campb. 112; Dale v Hill, 1 Wils. 281; May v Roberts, 12 East 89. The seller, in shipping or engaging freight, is agent ad hoc for the buyer (see notes, ante, pp. 217, 220); and his duty is a question of agency.]

³ [By the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 'where goods have been sold, but the same have not been delivered to the purchaser, and have been allowed to remain in the custody of the seller, it shall not be competent for any creditor of such seller, after the date of such sale, to attach such goods as belonging to the seller, by any diligence or process of law including sequestration, to the effect of preventing the purchaser, or others in his right, from enforcing delivery of the same; and the right of the purchaser to demand delivery of such goods shall, from and after the date of such sale, be attachable by or transferable to the creditors of the purchaser' (19 and 20 Vict. c. 60, sec. 1). It would seem that this enactment applies only to sales of specific goods. See Wyper v J. & W. Harvey, 1861, 23 D. 606. And where goods to be manufactured or reduced into some other species are sold under the denomination of the species, and the seller's estates are sequestrated before these goods are finished and deliverable, they pass to the seller's creditors as part of the seller's estate, the enactment in this section applying only to the case where the article has been ready for delivery, and left with the seller for mere custody, and being inapplicable to the case of an unfinished article remaining with the seller

The claim of the buyer, then, to whom delivery is refused, is twofold: 1. For repayment of the price, if already paid to the seller; and, 2. For indemnification of the loss sustained by non-fulfilment.

1. As to the claim for REPAYMENT OF THE PRICE, the buyer will rank as a personal creditor for the whole price, undiminished by any intermediate fall in the value of the subject. Thus, it may happen that a ship sold by the bankrupt has by sea-risk been much injured, or that corn has fallen greatly in price, or that manufactures have become unfashionable; so that, if now to be bought or delivered to the buyer, the subject would not be nearly of the same worth as when originally bought; while, considering the dividend to be paid from the estate, it may still be of advantage to the general creditors to retain the subject, leaving the buyer to his personal claim. The buyer, as a personal creditor, in such a case will be entitled to rank for the whole price, not merely for the diminished worth of the subject;¹ his claim being truly in the nature of a condictio sine causa.

2. INDEMNIFICATION FOR LOSS.—As to the claim for indemnification of loss, the principle is, that where the person bound to deliver is prevented by insolvency or other accident from fulfilling his engagement, the buyer's claim is for such damage only as at the time of the contract was foreseen as a necessary consequence of the failure to deliver the article. This principle points out as the proper object of such a claim, the indemnification of that sort of damage which is directly connected with the subject of the contract: loss, arising from the want of the article purchased; or gain, of which, by the failure to deliver it, the buyer has been deprived.² Thus, a dealer who is himself under contract to deliver a quantity of corn, buys and pays for 100 bolls at 25s. per boll; and being, on failure to deliver, obliged to go elsewhere for it, he, in consequence of the augmentation of price, pays 50s. for the same quantity;—he will be entitled not only to claim repayment of the price which he paid, but to claim also as a creditor for 25s. more. And, in the same way, if he buy on speculation, and can show that he might have sold the corn at 50s., he is entitled to claim repayment of the price paid, and 25s. more as gain of which he has been deprived.³ He will not, however, be entitled to enlarge his claim, so as by means of his dividend to recover the whole difference. In one sense, indeed, this is the amount of his actual damage; but when analyzed it resolves into two sorts of damage,—the damage on account of non-delivery, and the damage in consequence of insolvency. As every creditor, however, may be said in [449] the same way to suffer damage by his debtor's insolvency, the mutual claims in this respect would be neutralized. It is the amount of the loss, then, considered independently of the effects of insolvency, which constitutes the buyer's claim.

for the purpose of being completed. Wylie & Lochhead v Mitchell, 1870, 40 Sc. Jur. 258. A sale of an article in an unfinished state at its price in that condition, the article being then left with the seller to have additional labour bestowed on it for behoof of the buyer, may be different in regard to this section (ibid.). By sec. 2, a seller of goods is not entitled, in a question with any sub-vendee, to retain the goods as a security for obligations other than the price, which are due to him by his immediate vendee: 'provided always, that nothing in this Act contained shall prejudice or affect the right of retention of the seller for payment of the purchase price of the goods sold, or such portion thereof as may remain unpaid;' or for performance of conditions of his own contract of sale, or any right of retention, except as between the seller and such sub-vendee, or any right of retention arising from express contract with the original vendee. See also the provisions of sec. 3, enabling the seller of goods to attach the same, while in his own hands, by arrestment or poinding.]

³ [See Howie v Anderson, 1848, 10 D. 355; Dickson v Henderson, 1849, 12 D. 306.]

But the general principles already explained will also extend to that sort of damage which, although not strictly attaching to the article sold, is by stipulation, or by necessary consequence at the time of the sale, placed in view of the parties, as foreseen effects of the non-performance of the contract; and as dangers from which, expressly or tacitly, the seller is by faithful performance to save the buyer.¹ Thus, a shipowner, for example, has entered into a contract for beef, stipulating that it shall be delivered in due time, for the supply of his ship, which is destined to sail with a particular convoy or on a certain voyage; the seller of the beef fails; and, in consequence of the non-fulfilment, the voyage is lost: a claim will lie not merely for the higher price to which beef may have risen, but for the damage arising from the loss of the voyage.²

In the further discussion of this matter of damages for non-delivery, attention must be paid to the two cases of damage now distinguished.

1. Where the direct loss arising from non-delivery of an article is in question, it may sometimes amount to much more than double the price of the article. Where the failure is not fraudulent, equity interposes in such cases to restrain excessive damages; an interposition more frequent in cases of estimated damages or penalties expressed in the contract. But the law by which, in the Roman jurisprudence, Justinian restrained the taxing of direct damages to double the value of the article, that value included,³ is held with us as an arbitrary rule, which does not regulate our courts.⁴ Justice is now to be done by a jury, fairly estimating the damage according to the circumstances. One consideration, however, ought ever to be kept in mind in such estimation of damages (and it has always prevailed while this matter remained with the judges), that in matters of contract regard must be had to the express or presumed will of the parties at entering into that contract; and so, in cases like this, the sum ought to be fixed with a view to the probable amount of the damage, in the circumstances in which the contract was made.

It frequently occurs as a difficulty, in settling direct damage for non-delivery, At what point of time the estimate of the damage, to replace expected gain, is to be struck? It is to be observed, that while delivery is possible, the buyer has his alternative to insist [450] for delivery in specie, or for damage. It seems to follow, 1. That if it was a purchase on general speculation, he may select that point of time which to him would have been most advantageous—between the moment when delivery was by the contract due, and the date of the sentence.⁵ And the Court has refused to qualify this by any speculative inquiry

This is now the province of a jury, as the tribunal best of all suited for such a determination. 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, sec. 28.

into what, in the circumstances, might probably have been the fate of the article if duly delivered. 2. If the non-delivery has arisen from bankruptcy, the alternative claim for delivery or damages stops on that event; the claim then resolves into damage, on the maxim, 'In loco facti imprestabilis subsit damnum et interesse.' 3. If the purchase was intended to supply a particular demand, and the buyer has been obliged to supply himself elsewhere, the claim of damage will lie for the price paid, in order to supply that demand.¹ 4. If the buyer, while yet he expected delivery, have entered into a contract to sell that article to another, he may claim as direct damage the difference between the price which he was to receive, and what he had paid or engaged to pay.² 5. It would seem that the buyer can be entitled to nothing more than the value of the article at the stipulated place of delivery.³

2. Where the damage is not strictly speaking direct, but extended to extraneous loss by construction of the contract, although this is not a case to which Justinian's rule was [451] intended to apply, the same equitable interposition will take place as in the former case. Indeed, the very principle on which this construction is grounded dictates the limitation. For the damage not being naturally direct, becomes so by construction of law, only in consequence of a presumption that the parties must have had this in contemplation as a danger against which the faithful performance of the contract was to protect the buyer; and in forming that presumption, no more can be assumed as in contemplation than the probable and manifest results of the transaction. The case quoted below may serve to illustrate at once the rule and its limitation.⁴

damage was laid in the summons at £200; and the Lord Ordinary found 'that, from what is stated by both parties, it appears the loss sustained by the pursuer was at least equal to the sum of £200 concluded for in the libel, on 1st November 1799, the date of citation to this action: modifies the damages accordingly to that sum, with interest.' The Court altered that judgment, and found damages 'according to the highest selling price of whisky per gallon, from 3d October 1799, the date of the sale, to 1st November thereafter, the date of citation.' But afterwards the Court returned to the Lord Ordinary's judgment, which gave more than the highest price between these points, and as high a price as could have been got before decree, and as the restriction in the summons would allow. In this case it was held, 1. That the buyer's demand was not to be limited to the price at the stipulated day of delivery; 2. That although the non-delivery be imputable to no fault, the buyer must be indemnified for his actual loss; 3. That the price at the day of citation was not to be taken as the criterion, since the call to fulfil his engagement would thus discharge the seller from the bad consequences of his subsequent refusal; and, 4. That it was not practicable, without throwing the matter entirely loose, to enter into the consideration of the probable time at which, had the delivery been duly made, the article would have been disposed of.

In Shirra & Mains v Harvie & Co., 11 Dec. 1807, 15 Fac. Coll. 329, note, the above principle was confirmed. Shirra bought a quantity of whisky to be delivered immediately. Harvie & Co. having refused to deliver it, an action was brought before the sheriff, in which Shirra was successful. In a suspension, Shirra was found entitled to the value of the whisky as at the date of the sheriff's decree, deducting the contract price. [It has since been ruled in the House of Lords that this is not to be taken as a universal rule; and that, in estimating the quantum of damage in such cases, the whole circumstances must be taken into view. Higgins v Dunlop & Co., 6 Bell 196, affirming 9 D. 1407. And see Watt v Mitchell, 1839, 1 D. 1157.]

¹ Taylor & Co. v Morison, 17 June 1809, 15 Fac. Coll. 326, where the action was laid for 'the difference of price between 8s. per gallon, at which the spirits were sold to Taylor & Co., and the sum of 11s. 9d. per gallon, at which Taylor & Co. were under the necessity of purchasing spirits, in order to supply the place of the spirits which they should have received from the defender.'

² Dunlop v M'Kellar, 31 May 1815, 18 Fac. Coll. 382. Scougal & Co. bought from M'Kellar 144 bags of coffee. He afterwards sold those 144 bags, with 30 more, to Balfour, Junor, & Co. It became impossible for M'Kellar to deliver the coffee; and Balfour, Junor, & Co. refused to have any part of their purchase. Scougal & Co. having failed, the trustee on their estate brought an action of damages. The Court found him entitled to the sum of £159, as the loss of profit on the 144 bags, by inability to fulfil the bargain with Balfour, Junor, & Co., but refused to sustain any claim of damage for loss on the 30 bags, which was neither direct loss nor in contemplation of the contract with M'Kellar.

⁴ Anderson v Goddard & Co., 21 Feb. 1809, 15 Fac. Coll. 206. William Goddard & Co. agreed to sell 300 bolls of barley to Anderson. He was to send a ship for it to Leith from Beaulieu. The ship was accordingly sent; but Goddard & Co. failed to implement their engagement, and an action of damages was raised. Lord Glenlee found 'the pursuer Anderson entitled to the difference between the price at which the defenders agreed to furnish the grain and the market price thereof at Beaulieu, at the time when the vessel sent for it to Leith would have arrived at Beaulieu if the

SECTION II.

OF CONTRACTS OF HIRING.

The CONTRACT OF HIRING, or LOCATIO CONDUCTIO, is that by which the one party agrees, in consideration of a certain hire or rent which the other engages to pay, to give to that other, during a certain time, the use or occupation of a thing; or personal service and labour; or both combined. It may relate to lands, houses, moveables (including horses, cattle, etc.), or human labour; or these may be hired in various combinations.

In considering this contract in so far as relates to the real right of the subject let, some niceties in questions of property were formerly taken notice of, which may on bankruptcy arise from the complication of locatio operis with that of sale.¹ At present the subject of inquiry relates to the claims which may arise out of the contract, in so far as the respective personal obligations of the parties are concerned.

SUBSECTION I.—GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF THE CONTRACT OF HIRING.

The general principles of the contract are closely analogous to those which regulate the contract of sale; and indeed it may be said, that Hiring is nothing else than the sale of the use and benefit of the thing, or of the labour which forms the subject of it.²

This contract is completed, like that of sale, by consent alone. When the parties have finally agreed as to the subject, the hire, and the time, the contract is perfect; and requires neither delivery on the one hand, nor payment on the other, to entitle the parties to enforce their several rights under it.

The chief practical distinction which it is important to mark, is that the risk [452] does not alter, as in Sale. But in general the loss or injury of the property or labour hired falls on the owner; unless he can establish a ground of liability against the hirer, by reason of negligent or faulty conduct.³

The several varieties of this contract may be reduced under the two great divisions of LOCATIO REI and LOCATIO OPERIS: the former comprehending all contracts for the hire of lands, houses, and moveables, including horses, cattle, ships, machinery, etc.; the latter including the hire of workmen or labourers, and all the varieties of contracts for the carriage of goods. The subject of leases of land or houses falling under the first head has already been considered; and of those which come under the second, the hiring of ships, or charter-party, may be reserved for future consideration as a maritime contract.

SUBSECTION II.—HIRING OF MOVEABLES.

Without distinguishing the several occasions on which this contract is used in the daily intercourse of trade, it may be observed, 1. That fungibles⁴ are not the proper object defenders had delivered the cargo; and finds that the pursuer cannot at the same time claim the above said difference in name of damages, and also the whole freight of the vessel, but must limit the claim in that respect to the additional expense incurred by him in consequence of the vessel's having been detained at Leith a greater number of days than would have been necessary if the defenders had fulfilled the bargain.' The Court unanimously adhered to this judgment.

Here, 1. The voyage and its successful issue, by placing the grain for sale at Beauvy, was in contemplation of the parties, as a direct result of the contract, depending on faithful performance. 2. This supposed the payment of freight (perhaps correctly it should have included the insurance); but it was a necessary consequence of delay that damage should be payable, and this also must have been in contemplation of the parties. The judgment pronounced, therefore, gives effect to these the true principles of the contract.

[On the whole subject of damages, see the elaborate treatises of Mr. Mayne and Mr. Sedgwick.]

of this contract, since they are consumed by use; and, 2. That the contract may effectually be constituted, although specific subjects are not fixed upon; as a horse-hirer may engage to furnish horses for a carriage, although the parties have not fixed on any particular horses of which the use is to be given.

He who lets his property to hire is called the locator, or lessor; he who hires is called the conductor, or lessee.

CLAIMS UNDER THIS CONTRACT.

I. CLAIMS ON THE PART OF THE LESSEE OR HIRER.—The lessee or hirer may have several actions on the contract; or, on the bankruptcy of the person who lets the subject to hire, he may have different claims, according to the state of the contract.

1. Where the subject has not yet been delivered, the lessee will be bound to take possession, and pay the hire, if the lessor or his creditors choose to insist on the contract; and he is, at all events, entitled to demand possession, or damages for the want of it.

The impossibility, however, of delivering the subject (in consequence of its accidental destruction, for example), is a good answer to the lessee's action; and will save the lessor on the one hand from any claim of damages, while it will entitle the lessee to freedom from the hire on the other.

But refusal to deliver on account of insolvency (the subject being extant) will expose the estate of the lessor to a claim of damages; and the lessee will therefore, on a refusal by the lessor's creditors to fulfil the contract, be entitled to be ranked for the amount of his damage as a personal creditor. The same principles regulate the claim of damages under this contract which have already been considered relatively to sale.¹

2. If the subject has been delivered, the hirer is entitled to continue his possession of it under the contract, both against the lessor and against his creditors.

The lessee will be entitled to an abatement of the hire, proportioned to any partial destruction of the subject; for the risk is with the owner. The principle which distinguishes this case from sale is, that sale is the transference of the property; but in hiring, the use and enjoyment only is transferred.²

[453] The hirer or lessee will not be entitled to claim damages on account of any failure, destruction, or defect, occurring during his possession, if it should proceed from accident, without fault or neglect on the part of the person who lets to hire;³ but he will be entitled to damage if that failure proceed from refusal or from insolvency. Suppose, for example, that a person who has a steam-engine too powerful for his own occasions, lets out a share of the power, by affixing additional machinery, and communicating the motion to a manufactory in the neighbourhood, and fails; his creditors may find it inexpedient to keep the engine going; and so the hirer or lessee of the share of this moving power has his whole operations stopped: he will be entitled to claim his damages, with repayment of any advance of rent which he may have made.

3. Although the person who lets to hire will not be responsible, nor his estate on his bankruptcy, for any accidental failure or destruction of the subject, the hirer or lessee will be entitled to claim such expense as he has been under the necessity of laying out upon the subject let. To ground such claim, it will be necessary to show, 1. That the occasion of the expense was not to be ascribed to the hirer or lessee; 2. That the expense was indispensably necessary; and, 3. That the lessor had notice of it as soon as circumstances permitted.

II. CLAIMS BY THE PERSON LETTING TO HIRE, OR LESSOR.—A ground of action, or on the bankruptcy of the lessee a claim, may arise to the person who lets the subject to hire, for payment of the hire of the subject, or for damages on account of injury to the subject of the contract.

³ Ersk. iii. 3. 15; Pothier, Louage, No. 117

1. The creditors of the hirer or lessee may, if they think proper, continue the possession, or insist in proceeding with the contract; in which case the estate will be liable for the hire, not merely for a dividend. But although they should choose not to do so, the person who lets to hire is entitled as a creditor to rank for his rents or hire of the whole term agreed on, as being his damage; deducting, however, the value of the yearly possession, which is given up to him by the lessee's failure.

2. It is an important question, how far the lessee or his estate shall be held responsible for injury received by the subject? This forms a part of the great doctrine of RESPONSIBILITY FOR NEGLIGENCE; a doctrine which has relations to all the several degrees of reliance, which in different contracts it is necessary or convenient for one party to repose in another's diligence or care, and which in Scottish jurisprudence is treated under the name of DILIGENCE PRESTABLE; in England, under BAILMENT.

This doctrine is the subject of an essay of Sir William Jones:¹ it also forms the subject of a short but admirable paper of Pothier.² The doctrine maintained by Pothier, and vindicated by Sir William Jones, is the established law of Scotland. It resolves Neglect into three species: Gross, or lata culpa; Ordinary, or levis culpa; and Slight, or culpa levissima. And the rule of responsibility under these three divisions is, that in contracts beneficial only to the owner, as Deposit or Mandate, good faith alone is required in the custodier, and gross neglect only can render him responsible; that where the benefit is reciprocal, as in [454] Sale, Hiring, Pledge, Partnership, and Joint Property, the care of a prudent man is expected, and responsibility will follow upon ordinary neglect; and that where a person has the custody of subjects only for his own benefit, the slightest neglect will subject him to a claim for indemnification.³

As applicable more especially to the contract of hiring, where the risk independently of fault is with the owner, the rule is, that the lessee is liable in a middle diligence, 'præstat culpam levem.'⁴

¹ Essay on the Law of Bailments, by Sir W. Jones, Knt. In this essay Sir W. Jones has shown how the learning of a scholar and the liberality of a gentleman may be combined with the correctness of legal analysis.

² Printed as an Appendix to his Treatise on Obligations, vol. i. p. 455. This paper was occasioned by a tract of M. Le Brun, advocate of the Parliament of Paris, entitled 'Dissertation sur la Prestation des Fautes, Paris 1764,' of which Pothier speaks highly. He professes not to refute the reasoning of this essay; but he gives in the paper now cited a complete answer to the principles of the tract, and in his Pandectæ Justinianæ answers his arguments on the several laws which he quotes. See Pand. Justin. vol. iii. p. 770, sec. 981; vol. i. p. 489, sec. 32, note f, etc.

³ Ersk. iii. 1. 21.

[The distinctions here laid down as applicable, according to the abstract rules given, to cases occurring on the subject of negligence or diligence prestable, are now perhaps justly held to be of little practical utility. The degrees of negligence are not capable of being discriminated in actual cases; and the question whether there has been sufficient negligence to charge a party with liability, is held to be more properly a question to be determined by the complexion of circumstances in each case. See Toullier, Droit Civile, vol. vi. p. 239 et seq., vol. xi. p. 203; Mackelvey 191; and the late Lord Mackenzie's Studies in Roman Law, p. 186. The doctrine explained there as to diligence and culpa, which blots out the distinction between culpa levis and culpa levissima, was adopted by the Court of Session in Mackintosh v Mackintosh, 1864, 2 Macph. 1357. So also in England, the validity of these distinctions, and their value as practical criteria of liability, have frequently been questioned, more especially that between negligence and gross negligence. See Wilson v Brett, 11 M. and W. 113—per Rolfe, B.; Hinton v Dibdin, 2 Q. B. 650—per Lord Denman; Austen v Manchester Ry. Co., 10 C. B. 454—per Cresswell, J. See also Blythe v Waterworks, 11 Ex. 781; Wylde v Pickford, 8 M. and W. 443, 461-2. And so in America, as in Steamboat New World v King—per Curtis, J.—16 Howard 474; and in Storer v Gowen, 18 Maine R. 177, by the Supreme Court of Maine. See notes to Coggs v Bernard, in 1 Smith's Lead. Cases. It is not, however, to be supposed that in point of principle there are no differences in regard to the extent of responsibility for negligence. There are many cases, e.g., where the gratuitous nature of an agent's undertaking seems to form a legitimate element in assailing the agent, under circumstances where probably a paid agent would have been held responsible. The question as to whether there has or has not been negligence, is said to be a pure question of fact (per Inglis, J.-C., in Mackintosh v Mackintosh, 2 Macph. 1364.)

⁴ Ersk. iii. 3. 15.

Sir W. Jones properly corrects the looseness of Mr. Justice Buller's expression (Introduction to Law of Trials at Nisi Prius, 72), where he says 'that the hirer must take all

A warehouseman having goods in his custody, or the hirer of goods having them in his possession, is not liable for loss by accidental fire.¹

A person hiring a horse is not liable for it if it be stolen from a livery stable.²

The chief difficulty in such cases lies in the evidence. It has been held in Scotland, that where any specific injury has occurred, not manifestly accidental, the onus probandi lies on the hirer or lessee to justify himself by proving the accident;³ while in England the rule seems to be different, it being held necessary for the lessor to give some evidence of negligence.⁴

Where the hirer or lessee has taken a use of the subject excessive and beyond the limits of the contract, such as hiring a horse to carry a certain weight, and overloading him, or riding him farther than bargained for, or overriding him,⁵ the lessee will be deemed guilty of a fault which will make him responsible.

[455] Where, again, the hirer or lessee has either not taken due care to prevent or remedy an accidental injury, or has adopted means extraordinary or hazardous, he must run the risk. Thus, if a horse become ill in the hirer's possession, and he take no means to relieve the malady, and the horse die or become useless when it might have been saved, he will be responsible.⁶ Or if he proceed himself to administer medicines when he might have imaginable care of the goods delivered for hire,' reproving the words 'all imaginable' as too strong for practice, and as even in the mildest sense implying an extraordinary degree of care (p. 86). Sir W. Jones also corrects the expression of Lord Holt, that 'the hirer is bound to the utmost diligence,' as entirely grounded on a grammatical mistake in the translation of Bracton, who borrows diligentissimus from Justinian in the Institute, and which again was copied into the Institute from Gaius, a writer remarkable for the use of strong words, but who intended manifestly, instead of the superlative, to use merely the positive (p. 87).

[Where the hirer of a horse, which fell ill in his hands, prescribed for it himself instead of calling in a veterinary surgeon, he was held responsible by reason of his not having exercised the care expected of a prudent man towards his own property. Dean v Keate, 3 Camp. 4. ³ Binny v M. Veaux, 16 July 1679, M. 10079, where the Court held, that if a horse hired should die, or fall sick or 'crooked' by the way, the hirer 'must prove the casus fortuitus quem nulla præcessit illius culpa;' and that it will not be enough to prove that he rode modo debito, and no farther than the place agreed on. Fountainhall thinks this 'perquam durum.'

In Robertson v Ogle, 23 June 1809, 15 Fac. Coll. 348, a hired horse, after having been rode from Edinburgh to Aberdeen, and thence to Perth, was returned to the owner as unable to carry the rider farther, and was found on examination 'to be swayed or strained over the kidneys, or coupling of the back.' The sheriff held that the horse was a good useful hack, and worth the sum libelled (£9) when it was hired, but had been ill-treated, and was useless when returned; and therefore found the owner entitled to the price of the horse, with costs. The Court held that the onus probandi lay on the defender, the horse-hirer, to show that 'the horse's malady arose from any cause for which the defender was not blameable, and which he could not control;' and as no such proof was given, the Court adhered to the sheriff's judgment.

Marquis v Ritchie, 1823, 2 S. 386, N. E. 342. [Pyper v Thomson, 1843, 5 D. 498.]

⁴ Thus, in Cooper v Barton, 1810, 3 Camp. 5, note, it was held by Le Blanc, J., that where a plaintiff proved the hiring of his horse; that the horse had before been often let out to hire, and had never fallen down; and that it had been returned to him with the knees broken, in consequence of a fall,—it was necessary for him to go further, and give some evidence of negligence; and as none had been given, the judge directed a nonsuit. It may be said (with old Fountainhall in the case above quoted) that this 'is perquam durum.' It may be impossible to prove a negligence, at the commission of which no man may be present. [Subsequent decisions support the author's view. See p. 488, note 2.]

had medical advice, and the horse die, he will be answerable where there is any unskilfulness in the means employed.¹

This implied obligation to diligence makes the master liable for his servants. The diligence is that of a bonus paterfamilias.

SUBSECTION III.—HIRING OF LABOUR.

LOCATIO OPERIS, or Hiring of Labour, includes the simple case of the hiring of Common or of Skilled Labour, which is 'Locatio operis faciendi;' and the hiring of that particular kind of labour to which special rules have been applied, namely, the CARRIAGE OF GOODS, 'Locatio operis mercium vehendarum.'

Referring to what has already been said respecting the property of the thing on which the labour is to be employed, the personal obligation, and the claims thence arising, are here to be considered.

Without being too curious about distinctions, there is some little difference observable between the hiring of the labour of an undertaker in any branch of art, and the hiring of the labour of workmen or servants. The former is a contract for performing some piece of work or operation of art, and has reference to its accomplishment; the latter is an engagement to labour under a master, and has reference to an appointed term.

A contract of locatio operis, to accomplish some particular piece of work or operation of art, implies that the materials shall be furnished by the employer, otherwise it is properly a sale.²

Two questions may arise on this contract:—

1. Where more has been done than the parties have stipulated and expressed in their contract, and there is on the one hand no acquiescence in the change, while on the other the work is inseparably connected with the property of the employer, it would seem that the employer is not bound to pay more than he has agreed to pay. But a departure from the contract, assented to by the employer, will, to the extent of that alteration, substitute for the contracted price the fair remuneration for work and materials, a claim for the [456] quantum meruit; and the workman will be entitled to payment by measure and value. The contract is binding so far as can be traced, and the quantum meruit applies to the remainder.³

2. Where the contract has not been performed in terms of a specific agreement, or has not been duly performed, the employer is generally speaking not liable. It is otherwise where the employer acquiesces in the work as performed.

These are the rules where the work performed is separate, and not united with the property of the employer. Unless he have acquiesced in the change, he certainly is not bound to take or pay for it, if not according to the contract; and will further be entitled to damages for non-performance. But where it is united with the employer's property inseparably, a point of greater difficulty arises: Whether, being thus compelled to take what he has horse was much distressed, and came to the stables in a much worse condition. This was held a want of due care, and verdict went for the price of the horse. [Campbell v Lord Kennedy, 1828, 6 S. 806.]

¹ Dean v Keate, 1811, 3 Camp. 4. Keate having jobbed a pair of coach-horses, and one of them being slightly indisposed, he wrote a prescription for him. The medicine was not calculated to do injury to the horse; but after administering it, Keate had put the horse into harness, given him strong exercise, and kept him exposed to the inclemency of the weather: the animal was seized with an inflammation of the intestines, when the defender gave him a dose of opium and ginger, and the horse soon after died. Medical advice was called in when too late. Dean, who had let the horse to hire, brought his action for the value of the horse. Lord Ellenborough held that Keate had not exercised that degree of care which might be expected from a prudent man towards his own horse, and was in consequence guilty of a breach of the implied undertaking he had entered into when he hired the horse from the plaintiff. The plaintiff had a verdict for sixty guineas.

not bargained for, he must pay for it? In England, it seems that he is not compellable to pay even on the quantum meruit.¹ But this appears to proceed on the peculiarity of English pleading at law. The rule in Scotland seems to be, that balancing the inconvenience and damage arising from the imperfect or faulty performance against the benefit actually derived, the workman is entitled to demand, or bound to make up, the difference.

Another question has been moved, Whether any action or claim will lie where the employer derives no benefit from the work and labour? as where the whole is accidentally destroyed before the workman's labour has been completed, or the thing delivered. There are high authorities in support of such claim, whether the work is finished or not; the reward in the latter case being restrained to the fair value of the work actually performed.² This rests on the principle that the workman is entitled to the price of what he has done, although by accident or force he has been prevented from completing it; and an additional consideration strengthens the rule where the work is an accessory to the property of the employer, and by accretion becomes his: in which case, as an accessory, it perishes with the work to the owner of both.³ Another opinion has been maintained, that in such cases the subject, and the undelivered work bestowed on it, will perish to the employer and workmen respectively.⁴ The rules seem to be: 1. That if the work is independent of any materials or property of the employer, the manufacturer has the risk, and the unfinished work perishes to him. 2. That if he is employed in working up the materials, or adding his labour to the property of the employer, the risk is with the owner of the thing with which the labour is incorporated. And, 3. That if the work has been performed in such a way [457] as to afford a defence to the employer against a demand for the price, had the accident not happened, it will be equally available after its loss.

These are questions which arise chiefly from the occurrence of accidental fires, as in dockyards, manufactories, printing-houses, etc.; and not unfrequently the rule of law is controlled by general or local usage.⁵

³ It would be a necessary consequence of this doctrine, that if the work had been defectively or unskilfully performed a defence would lie against the claim, as if the subject were extant with all its imperfections. Thus, if cloth were sent to the bleachfield, and burnt by lightning, the employer would not be bound to pay as for good work, if it should appear that the cloth was injured in the manufacture.

Gillet v Mawman, 1808, 1 Taunt. 137. This may be taken as a confirmation of the former. It was a demand for work and labour in printing a translation of the Travels of Anacharsis; the paper being furnished by the translator; the work not having been finished, and the whole having in that condition been consumed by fire. A custom of the trade was proved, that the printer is not entitled to be paid for any part of his work till the whole is completed and delivered. The Court held the general rule in favour of the workman to be controlled by the custom. They said: 'This custom is

CLAIMS UNDER THIS CONTRACT.

I. CLAIMS ON THE BANKRUPTCY OF THE EMPLOYER.¹—In consequence of the bankruptcy of the employer, the workman may be left unpaid while the work is entirely completed, or partly finished, or not yet begun. In these circumstances the following claims arise:—

1. If the work be completed, the workman has a claim as a personal creditor (secured by lien if the work is not yet delivered) for the stipulated hire.

2. If the work be partly completed, the workman may be called upon by the creditors to proceed with the contract, they engaging to fulfil the counterpart; or he will have his claim for the price of what has been finished, and for damages on account of the disappointment of the contract, which, however, it may be difficult to ascertain.

3. If the work has not been commenced, still the workman may have suffered loss by the failure of the contract. He may have declined another engagement; but it does not appear that this can form a ground for claiming damages to the amount of the loss thence arising. He may have incurred penalties to workmen and labourers hired to perform the contract; and that, as more direct, appears to afford a better ground for damages. It would also seem that he may claim as damage the profit which he might expect to gain by the performance of the contract according to its terms.

II. CLAIMS ON THE BANKRUPTCY OF THE WORKMAN.—1. The creditors of the workman may, with the bankrupt's assistance, or with the aid of others where the work is of a kind which may be so performed, insist on completing it, and earning for the estate the benefit of the hire. But if the contract be personal, and to be performed by the bankrupt himself as an artist, the creditors cannot compel the employer to proceed with the agreement, unless the bankrupt himself will fulfil it.

2. On the other hand, the employer may suffer direct damage in having to arrange a new contract on terms less favourable; or in having thrown on his hands, in an [458] unfinished state, goods which were to be returned completely manufactured at a particular time, and ready for the market. He will in such cases be entitled to claim damages from the estate of the workman, and to set off the amount against the value of what has been done. Thus, if a builder has undertaken to build a house, or a machinist to erect an engine, or a ship-carpenter to build a vessel, and has become bankrupt after the wages of labour have increased, the employer will have a claim on his insolvent estate for the difference between the sum at which he had contracted to finish the work, and that at which it can now be accomplished, this being direct damage. So, if goods are left unfinished, whereby the market is lost, and the price falls, the difference will form matter of direct damage, for which a claim may be entered. And on the principles already explained,² other consequences may, by the nature and terms of the contract, become legitimate ground of damage; as where goods are stipulated to be bleached or dyed for a particular voyage, but are still unfinished when the voyage must necessarily be performed; or to be ready for sailing with convoy, but are detained till the opportunity is lost. The damage arising in such cases by loss of the voyage raises a legitimate claim of damage. So, under such a contract, an additional insurance made necessary by the delay, or a claim of demurrage incurred by the failure, will ground a claim of damage against the undertaker.

the law of the realm, and so far as it extends, it controls the general law.'

[The rule in England as to the workman's remuneration is, that when the contract is entire for the performance of a specific work for a specified sum, he has no claim if the subject perishes by accident; but it is otherwise if he is to be paid from time to time as the work proceeds. Appleby v Myers, L. R., 2 C. P. 651; Add. on Cont. 6th ed. 394. See also Adlard v Booth, 7 C. and P. 108.]

¹ By a nicety in the application of the verbs locare and conducere, as Heineccius, and after him Sir W. Jones, observes, there is a sort of ambiguity in the terms used in the Roman law for the employer and workman in this contract. The employer is called locator operis, but he is conductor operarum. The workman is locator operarum, but conductor vel redemptor operis. Heinec. in Pand. p. 3, sec. 320, in note. Jones, Bailments, 90.

3. If the subject of the contract perish by inevitable accident, the loss is to the employer, and no claim will lie against the estate of the workman in whose hands the property perished. The rule is, Res perit domino. But the negligence, fault, or unskilfulness of the workman will cast the responsibility the other way. The rule by which such responsibility is judged of is that already explained,¹ namely, that the workman is bound to ordinary care; a criterion not less just because it is versatile, accommodating itself to circumstances, and according with the common sense of mankind. The care required in building a common doorway and in raising a marble pillar are quite different, but both come under the description of ordinary care. The responsibilities under these rules are those of safe custody and of adequate skill.

1. CUSTODY.—The care required of a custodier is such as a diligent and prudent man takes of his own property. The simple case of custody for hire is where one places his goods in a warehouse for which he pays rent: this is properly LOCATIO CUSTODIÆ. It is the contract by which goods are placed in the king's cellar under bond for the duties, or in a private warehouse till put on board ship or in a wharfinger's warehouse when unloaded. The case differs a little where a horse is sent to a livery stable; since in this case there is not mere custody, but also the labour of dressing and feeding.

In such cases, the place of custody must be secure against the ordinary accidents incident to the property to be preserved. The warehouse must be water-tight, secure from attacks without and from damage of fire within, and from all things else hurtful to the property. The grazing field must be properly secured against the escape of the cattle, and free from pitfalls and dangers which may lame or injure them. The livery stable must be wind and water tight, so as not to expose a horse to cold or wetness (besides the food being wholesome, and the hostler fit for his undertaking). A failure in these respects will expose the owner of the cellar, of the field, of the stable, or other place of custody, to a claim for the damage thus occasioned by his fault.²

[459] But if the party be made aware of any peculiarity in the condition of the place of custody, it may by acquiescence or tacit agreement become a part of the contract, or a limitation of the responsibility.³

The chronometer was in a locked drawer, while Earnshaw's own watches and chronometers were deposited in an iron chest. Earnshaw was held liable.

He brought his action against the tenant of the park, who defended himself on the ground of a placard affixed on the gate, intimating 'that he would be answerable for no horses put into the park, although they should be stolen or break their neck.' The Court ordered an inquiry into the fact, and parties to be heard 'on the terms of the agreement when the horse was put in; whether it was told or known to the pursuer that the keeper would not be answerable.' And it was held relevant, that no condition being expressed, 'it behoved to be understood on such terms as were usual with others, which were the terms expressed in the placard.'

The responsibility that belongs to carriers, innkeepers, etc., under the edict, Nautæ, Caupones, Stabularii, will be considered hereafter. See below, p. 495.

2. SKILL.—The general rule as to all workmen is, 'Spondet peritiam artis,' and 'Imperitia culpæ annumeratur.' The engagement, in short, is for a due application of the necessary attention, art, and skill.¹ Under this rule all professional men are comprehended. Their contract is Locatio operarum, not Mandate; and they, as well as smiths, farriers, bleachers, and ordinary artists of all kinds, wherever they engage their services for hire, are responsible for the skill and art necessary to accomplish safely what they undertake, in so far as ordinary skill and art can accomplish it. The public who employ them may exercise a judgment of selection; but having selected the person, they are entitled to presume that he has the ordinary skill in his art, which he holds himself out to the world as possessed of.²

The rules are: 1. That if one applies to an apprentice in an art, or to a man skilled in another, but not professing that in question, such person will be responsible only for the fair exertion of his capacity; as in Sir W. Jones' case, from the Mohammedan law, of a farrier employed to cure the eyes of a man.

2. That although it may be difficult to find a criterion of professional skill, some points at least are clear. Thus, 1. Where a specific act is ordered to be done, it must be done according to rule; neither neglected nor unskilfully performed. So, a notary employed to protest a bill, if he neglect or mistake any of the established rules which regulate [460] that duty, makes himself responsible for the loss arising to his client by the fault in the diligence. So, a messenger is liable who errs in executing a caption put into his hand;³ or an agent employed to expedite a confirmation, who neglects it till his client dies;⁴ or to frame obligatory missives, who fails to have them tested in terms of the statute;⁵ or an agent employed to lodge an aliment for a debtor applying for the act of grace, who fails to do it, and the debtor is liberated;⁶ or an agent who is to procure a security by bond and assignation, and neglects to have the assignation intimated;⁷ or a security by heritable bond, and executes it only with a holding a me, and takes sasine, but does not complete it by confirmation.⁸ 2. Where, although the act to be done is not settled by so unquestionable and fixed a rule, if yet the object to be accomplished may be safely attained by following a known method, the professional man is responsible if he neglects to follow such method. Thus, a law agent employed to 'do such diligence as will place his employer on an equal footing with the other creditors, and who contents himself with using inhibition, although the other creditors have adjudged, neglects a plain and common rule of the profession, and same party, and the effect of the placard, the Court sustained the defence, unless it should be proved that the tenant was accessory to the loss by fraud or negligence.

In a subsequent case (Davidson, 1749, M. 10081), the defence for the loss of a horse was that the pasture ground was an extensive wood, fenced on one side only by the river Findhorn, which in some places was fordable. It was proved that this was in most cases pointed out to those who placed their cattle there; but it was not so proved as to the owner of the horse in question. The decision of the case does not appear; but it may in some degree be collected from the Court having recommended to the Lord Ordinary to order an inquiry as to the care usually taken of cattle in that wood, and what care was taken in this case; that, in their opinion, if the defender should justify himself by showing that there was no undue negligence in looking after the horses in so ill enclosed a field, and giving immediate notice, or making due search on the loss, the action should be dismissed.

must be responsible.¹ 3. Where the operation to be performed is complicated and difficult, a professional man, exerting fairly the best of his judgment, may err and be unsuccessful, and yet not be responsible;² and without some such limitation of responsibility, respectable [461] persons would shun the profession. 4. It is no defence to an agent employed in a joint transaction, as a loan, that he was employed by the granter of the bond, and not by him who suffers from any defect in the security. 'The liability does not depend on who gives the order, but for whose behoof it is given.'³ 5. The responsibility can extend only to the amount of the injury specifically caused by the act of carelessness or unskilfulness, for which reparation is due. Thus, if a farrier by want of skill kill a horse which is already lame, reparation can only be sought for the value of a lame horse. So, if a writer has committed an error which annuls the diligence, but it turns out that this diligence would on another ground have been ineffectual, he will be freed from responsibility.⁴

SUBSECTION IV.—HIRING OF CARRIAGE BY LAND.

This is the application of the contract of locatio operis to one of the most frequent occasions of temporary employment which occur in practice. It is called in civil law, 'Locatio operis mercicium vehendarum;' but it may here be taken both as it relates to goods and to persons. The rules which regulate the contract of location in ordinary cases are also applicable to this example of the contract, but with this difference, that a more strict ² Lennox v Grant, 1784, M. 14381. In making up titles to property and succession, some extremely nice cases occur. And in one case, though of no extraordinary difficulty, it happened that the true method was neglected, and an erroneous one adopted, by which the client lost his debt.

Grant v M'Leay, 1791, Bell Oct Ca. 319. The consequence was an action of damages against the law agent. He defended himself on the difficulty of the professional question, which he proved by the fact that in the original question the judgments of the Court had varied. The Court held this to be a justification.

M'Lean v Grant, 1805, M. App. Reparation, No. 2. A lady was entitled to a provision of £300 out of her father's estate. This estate had come into the person of the son, who having failed, adjudications proceeded at the instance of the creditors, and she employed Grant to make her claim effectual. He led an adjudication, but committed two errors in doing so: 1. A great part of the estate was still in hereditate jacente of the father, but Grant used no special charge in adjudging from the son. 2. His adjudication was conjoined with one posterior to the first effectual. Other agents had committed the same mistakes, but on being informed of it led new adjudications, which Grant neglected. Upon those objections the adjudication was annulled; and the lady, having thus lost her debt, brought an action for reparation against her agent. The Court considered the matter in this light, that the error of conjoining with a posterior adjudication, though against the direction in the statute, was so far sanctioned by the practice of men of business, and by a difference on the bench in pronouncing the decision which found it to be erroneous, that it could form no ground for an action of damages against an agent. But then they held that the error of not having used a special charge was so clearly contrary to common rules, that the writer was liable, and accordingly the judgment was: 'Repelled his defences, so far as regards the omission to lead a second adjudication on a special charge, for attaching Lots 3 and 4; and find him liable in the damage which has arisen to the pursuer from that neglect.'

Thus the claim of the pursuer for reparation, though on the whole successful under the above judgment, failed as to one of the grounds, viz. that Grant had improperly conjoined his adjudication with a posterior one. As to this it may be observed: 1. That the Act of Parliament having laid down a precise rule, it was a strong thing to hold a writer excusable for neglecting that rule, whatever looseness of practice had arisen under the Act; and, 2. That the Court held it to be a sufficient answer to this, that the words were not so absolutely clear that a question of construction might not be raised on them; and that the Court had been so doubtful on that question of construction, that they decided first one way and then the other.

There was a secondary question on the case, which will require very particular attention before it is relied on as a precedent. See below, note 4.

³ Struthers v Lang (p. 489, note 8), 1826, 4 Shaw and Dunlop 418, N. E. 421.

See Wilson v Riddell, 1826, 4 S. 732, N. E. 739. [Cooke v Falconer, 1850, 13 D. 157.]

⁴ In the above case of M'Lean v Grant (note 2), this principle produced a very singular effect. The agent had been guilty of two errors: one of them undoubtedly blameable, and for which the Court held him liable in damages; the other admitting of some question whether it was justifiable or not. If he had committed only the first error, he would have been held by the final judgment, as well as by the first one, liable in damages. But as he had the good fortune to combine this blameable error with another, which some of the Court thought equally blameable, others not, he escaped from the action of damages; the justifiable error having been found fatal to the diligence. [See also Campbell v Campbell & Clason, 1843, 5 D. 1081.]

responsibility has been imposed from views of public expediency, and in order to avoid the dangers to which the goods of merchants and travellers are exposed while entrusted to the care of the carrier.

CLAIMS UNDER THIS CONTRACT.

I. CLAIM BY THE CARRIER.—On the bankruptcy of the owner of the goods, a claim arises to the carrier for the carriage.

1. If the goods have been delivered by the carrier before the estate has come into the hands of the creditors by sequestration or private trust, this claim will be only as a personal creditor of the bankrupt for a dividend along with the other personal creditors.

2. If the goods are still to be delivered, the carrier is secured by his lien, of which hereafter.

3. In the middle case, where the carrier has completed the carriage of the goods, and delivered them to the administrators of the bankrupt estate, the estate is his debtor, and he will have preference on his demand for the whole price.¹

II. CLAIM BY PASSENGERS AND OWNERS OF GOODS.—The responsibility of carriers [462] for persons and goods entrusted to them, is in Scotland regulated partly by the law of the contract of hiring; partly by the rule of the Roman edict, 'Nautæ, Carpones, Stabularii,' on the principles of expediency already alluded to. The former shall be considered here, the latter under the next section.

1. Indemnification to Passengers.—The remedy to PASSENGERS for damage sustained by the carelessness or unskilfulness of stage-coachmen and others, is upon the contract of locatio operarum. It comprehends those who for hire undertake to carry the persons or property of others; common carriers, proprietors of waggons, stage-coaches, hackney-coaches, or post-chaises; as well as all masters and owners of ships, ferrymen, bargemen, and other carriers by water.²

This responsibility is, according to the rule of the contract, for the sufficiency of the carriage, and ordinary care (culpa levis) of those employed. As to the sufficiency of the carriage, it is enough if it be sufficient as far as the eye can discover.³ The same is the case of one who lets to hire a private post-chaise or hackney-coach.⁴

But in construing this responsibility, courts of law and juries have shown an inclination in the case of Stage-coaches to bind the rule much tighter than could be insisted for on the ordinary principles of locatio operarum. The consideration of the danger to the public which may proceed even from slight faults, unskilfulness, or negligence in this particular case, and of the helpless state in which passengers are who trust themselves in such vehicles, have gradually led to a wholesome extension of the rule, so as to subject the principals for the most inconsiderable defect or insufficiency, and for the slightest fault. Neglect of the rules of the road; rashness in going too near to the edge of the road, or to any obstruction; want of skill in driving; racing against other coaches; taking up more passengers than the law allows, where the injury can be traced to overloading as a cause;—all of these will be held sufficient to charge the principals, with the effect of any accident from which loss or injury arises.⁵ In order to afford due protection and a ready [463]

⁵ 1. Rashness and injudicious driving.—Wordsworth v Willin, 5 Espin. N. P. Cases 273, where it was held that the rule remedy to the public, the presumption is against the owner of the coach where it has broken down or has been overturned.¹

Where the injury arises from a rash or undue apprehension or alarm, the coach proprietor will not be liable; as when a passenger, thinking himself in danger, leaps from the coach to save himself when truly there was no danger. Such conduct must be justified by a state of peril sufficient to show that the act done is a natural and prudent precaution to extricate one from a peril for which the coachmaster would have been liable. This delicate point must be left for a jury to determine on the evidence.²

Where the damage has arisen from unforeseen accident or misfortune, the owners are not responsible.³ This is different from the rule of the edict, Nautæ, Caupones, etc. See below, p. 495 et seq.

2. Indemnification for Goods.—In the same way, the owner of Goods has his remedy on the contract against the carrier, for damage received by insufficiency, or by actual fault or negligence.

As to insufficiency, it has been said that there is a distinction between the case of passengers and of goods; there being in the latter an absolute warranty, in the former a qualified engagement, to transport the person as safely as human foresight and care will permit. Under the contract there seems to be no sufficient authority to sanction this dis-of the road is founded in good sense, but not always conclusive; that if a carriage coming in any direction leave sufficient room for any other carriage, horse, or passenger, on its proper side of the way, it is sufficient. But it is a question for the jury whether the loss arose from want of sufficient room.

In Mayhew v Boyce, 1816, 1 Starkie 423, where one coach attempting to pass another overturned it. There were two courses—one safe, the other hazardous. Taking the hazardous was held to make the coach owner responsible.

In Jackson v Tollet, 1817, 2 Starkie 37, the coach was going up a hill slowly; it was met by a waggon nearly in the middle of a road 30 feet wide; and the Worcester coach was descending the hill at a quick rate. In this situation the coachman deviated to the left, and the wheel was drawn on a hillock which, being frozen and unyielding, overturned the coach,—one of the passengers warning the coachman of his danger. Lord Ellenborough left it to the jury whether the coachman could have adopted a better course. In order to subject the master to damages, it must appear that there has been something to blame on the part of his servant; and he is blameable if he has not exercised the best and soundest judgment upon the subject. If he could have exercised a better judgment than he did, the owner is liable. Verdict for the plaintiff, whose leg was broken. 2 Starkie 37.

2. Negligence.—Dudley v Smith, 1808, 1 Camp. N. P. 167. Shocking example of negligence, in not informing a woman, an outside passenger, that an archway was too low to suffer her to pass, and she was struck off from the top. Verdict for £100 damage.

3. Overloading.—Israel v Clarke & Clinch, 4 Espinasse 259. Mr. Erskine stated it to have been laid down by Lord Kenyon, that if the owners of the coach take up more passengers than are allowed by Act of Parliament, that should be deemed such an overloading, that in case of an injury being laid in the declaration to have arisen from overloading, the excess above the number should be deemed conclusive evidence of the accident having arisen from that cause. Lord Ellenborough assented.

But it is no excuse that there has been no excess of number;

still the coach must be 'landworthy.' Lord Ellenborough said, in the above case: 'At all events, he would expect a clear landworthiness in the carriage itself to be established.' Ibid.

See Crofts v Waterhouse, 1825, 3 Bingham 319.

² Such a case occurred in Jones v Boyce, 1816, 1 Starkie 493, where a coupling rein having broke, and one of the leaders becoming ungovernable while on a descent, the coachman drew the coach to one side of the road, where, coming in contact with some piles, the wheel came upon a post, and Jones leapt off to save himself, and was hurt. Lord Ellenborough left it to the jury. Verdict for £300. [Add. 6th ed. 466.]

³ Aston v Heaven, 1797, 2 Esp. Cases 533, where the coach was overset by the horses taking fright, from the reflection of the sun in a tub into which water was falling from a pump, and a passenger was hurt. The plaintiff relied on this, that the coach was at the time not on the left side of the road, but on the middle, where the horses chanced to be more exposed to the object which startled them. Lord Chief Justice Eyre drew the distinction between cases of the loss of goods by carriers, and this; and held that in such a case as arose out of the above circumstances, the owners are to be held responsible for the smallest negligence; but not, as in the carriage of goods, for everything but the act of God and the king's enemies.

inction. Under the Edict, indeed, there is a difference between goods and persons. But in so far as the Contract rules the case, the engagement and warranty seem to be the same; while any claim of damage for loss sustained must rest on negligence or fault.¹

As to fault or negligence, the responsibility is not in the character of public carrier, but under the private contract; and therefore a private person undertaking to carry goods safely for hire is liable to this as much as a public carrier. This responsibility will attach where a carrier is aware that a cask of brandy is leaking, and takes no pains to stop it;² [464] or where a parcel is left in the coach at unloading;³ or where the parcel cart is left unguarded in the street, and a parcel is stolen.⁴

There is a more extensive responsibility in the case of public carriers (in which they have, though not quite accurately, been likened to insurers) to be considered hereafter.⁵ But under the contract itself, the owner of the goods is not aided by any legal presumption. The ground of his action for damage is insufficiency, fault, or negligence; and he must establish his case by the proper evidence.

3. It is a part of the responsibility on the contract, that the master is liable for the acts of his servant.⁶ The servant himself is not in England liable to the public.⁷

4. The responsibility of the carrier begins from the moment the goods come to his hands, or to those of his servants.⁸ But it is not delivery to a carrier if goods be left in the yard of an inn, or in a warehouse at which other carriers have their goods:⁹ there must be special notice to him or his servants that they are so delivered. They must be either booked or delivered to the carrier, or to some one who can be proved to be his servant or agent, for the purpose of receiving them, and at the place where he is authorized to take them.¹⁰ This applies to the post office, where delivery to a bellman is not sufficient; though it is enough if delivery is made to an officer for receiving letters, or if goods be delivered to a servant of a carrier sent round with a parcel cart or otherwise.¹¹

5. The undertaking of a carrier, in respect to the delivery of the goods, may be discharged differently in different circumstances.

The general rule is, that the carrier is not discharged of the goods while anything

Anderson v Pyper & Co., 1820, 2 Murr. 261. Here the question was: Whether, supposing the axle of a coach, which broke down and was overturned, was defective and faulty, but sound so far as human foresight could reach, the proprietors were liable for injury done to a passenger? Verdict was for the defenders, on a direction that the proprietors were not liable in such a case, as they would have been in the case of goods. And a new trial, in which this direction was excepted to, was refused. It appears that too much was conceded in admitting, that in an action for damage to goods the proprietors would have been liable. was delivered to a carrier to be carried from London to Stanfield Lock, and a receipt given for him. He was afterwards tied by a cord which was round his neck in a watch-box; but he slipped his head from the noose, and was lost. The defence was, that being delivered without a collar, he was not in a state of security. Lord Ellenborough held that the insecurity being visible, and the custody of the dog undertaken, the carrier was liable. Verdict for the plaintiff.

remains for him to do as carrier.¹ This may be regulated by custom, as in London, by the usage of the Thames, the master is liable while the goods are delivering into a lighter until the loading is completed,² or by special agreement, or by implied agreement, as by force of the address; for if the parcel be addressed to a person in the place to which the carrier professes to transport goods, the natural and legal implication from the address of the parcel, and the entry in the carrier's book, is that he shall deliver it to the person at the place mentioned in the address. It is one contract from beginning to end, the performance of which the carrier undertakes.³ The porters or carters whom he employs [465] are his servants, for whom he is responsible, whether portorage be paid or not; and whether it is payable for his behoof, the porter getting only a proportion; or he have only the election of the porter.⁴ And at all events, the carrier must give notice of the arrival of the goods.⁵

8. Where the carrier does not go all the length to which the goods are to be carried, then, if the journey is to be completed by another carrier unconnected, the delivery of the goods to that carrier, or to persons empowered to act as his agents or servants in taking delivery of goods, will discharge the original carrier.⁶ It has also been held in England, that where the carrier's journey is at an end, and the goods have reached their destination quoad him, they are not, while lodged in a warehouse or cellar in order to wait for another carrier, held under the high responsibility which subjects the carrier for every loss but inevitable accident or the king's enemies.⁷ If the journey is to be completed by subordinate

It appeared that the contents were abstracted and trash substituted, and that this was done between the delivery to the porter and the placing of it in the warehouse of the agent. The question was, Whether the delivery to the porter discharged the original responsibility? It was held not.

⁶ Denniston v Harkness, 1791, Bell Oct. Ca. 260. Goods were delivered at Glasgow by Denniston to Harkness, carrier to Carlisle, addressed to Manchester, and so entered in Harkness' book. Harkness had no hire but to Carlisle. At Carlisle he delivered the goods to Wilson, the regular carrier between Carlisle and Manchester, and had them entered in his book, and received from Wilson the hire to Carlisle. The parcel was lost between Carlisle and Manchester; and Denniston brought an action against Harkness. He supported his action by evidence of an understanding among merchants, that in such circumstances the original carrier was liable; and the Lord Ordinary decided for him on that ground. The Court of Session were not only dissatisfied with the evidence, but held that such evidence could not be received, as tending to establish a practice contrary to law; and they held that it was quite sufficient for the original carrier in such a case so to fix the goods upon the intermediate carrier as to give the owner his remedy against him. [Bates v Cameron & Co., 1855, 18 D. 186; Gilmour v Clark, 1853, 16 D. 478.]

[In an action against a carrier who carries goods to their destination, it is sufficient prima facie evidence of loss or short delivery to show that the goods never reached the consignee (Hawkes v Smith, Car. and M. 72); but where the contract is to be performed by carrying the goods to a certain place, and there delivering them to another carrier, the sender of the goods must lay his action so as to show whether the loss occurred through the fault of his immediate contractor, or through the fault of the sub-contractor to whom the goods were delivered by the former, and for whom he is alleged to be responsible, and direct evidence must be adduced tracing the goods to the company through whose negligence the loss arose. See Gilbart v Dale, 5 A. and E. 543; Griffith v Lee, 1 C. and P. 110; Midland Ry. Co. v Bromley, 17 C. B. 372. Where goods are received by a railway company to be carried to a place beyond the bounds of the company's undertaking, the reception of the goods properly addressed is evidence from which a Court may infer a contract to undertake the carriage of the goods to their destination under the responsibility of common carriers. Bristol and Exeter Ry. Co. v Collins, 7 H. L. Ca. 194, and other cases cited in 1 Sm. L. Ca. 221. The company by which the carriage was undertaken would in such a case have recourse against the company ultimately responsible under their sub-contract. But if the aggrieved person knows which company is ultimately responsible, it will generally be more for his interest to bring his action directly against that company, as he may then expect to have the assistance of the first company in tracing the goods into their hands. In an action of this description, the pursuer must aver an employment of the company in default, on a contract of carriage, through the agency of the first company acting at his request. persons employed by the original carrier, or of his selecting, the responsibility seems to continue with the original carrier till delivery to the consignee.

The question, how far responsibility may be limited, will be discussed below, p. 501.

SUBSECTION V.—DIGRESSION CONCERNING THE EDICT ‘NAUTÆ, CAUPONES, STABULARII.’

The common rule of diligence and responsibility which exposes the labourer for hire only to losses arising from ordinary neglect, or culpa levis, is in particular cases augmented by a more rigid responsibility. This is a regulation intended to operate as a check on collusion and carelessness, for the safe conduct of that personal intercourse in the way of travelling, and that transit and conveyance of goods which the necessities of a rich and commercial country daily require. This stricter rule was first established by an edict of the Roman prætor, the spirit of which has been so universally adopted in modern Europe, that without any special law, the doctrine has been recognised even in those countries where the Roman law has no avowed authority.

The words of the edict are these: ‘NAUTÆ, CAUPONES, STABULARII, QUOD CUJUSQUE SALVUM FORE RECEPERINT, NISI RESTITUENT, IN EOS JUDICIUM DABO.’¹ The persons [466] enumerated, having once received the goods under their charge, must at all hazards answer for their restitution.

In so far as this enlarged responsibility rests on a voluntary undertaking, it extends no further than to reasonable and prudent care; and Sir William Jones has been at some pains to show, that although in some of the cases falling under the edict (as in the case of innkeepers, who receive nothing for the goods brought in by their guests) there is no direct hire given for the care of custody, so as strictly under the contract of location to ground this responsibility, there is not wanting another ground of responsibility in the application of the principle of the contract ‘facio ut facias.’² But there is a responsibility beyond that, proper to the contract of locatio operarum, resting on the principle of constructive negligence, and constructive fraud, or quasi ex delicto, as applied to the occasions of trade and safe intercourse. As the persons comprehended within this edict, shipmasters and carriers, innkeepers and stablers, have frequent opportunities of associating themselves or their servants with robbers, thieves, and pilferers of all descriptions, while the secret connection often cannot be detected, and as even their negligence cannot always be proved so as to ground a claim,³ the safety of the public is to be secured only by presuming everything against those persons, and taking nothing as an excuse or justification for the loss or injury to goods received by them, but evidence of a natural and inevitable accident.⁴

This edict is not to be considered as positive law in Scotland, but as effectual only in so far as it has become a part of the maritime law of Europe, or as by its general policy it stands recommended to our adoption, and is now in its great principle recognised as a part of our jurisprudence.⁵

³ ‘Nisi hoc esset statutum,’ says Ulpian, ‘materia daretur cum furibus adversus eos quos recipiunt coeundi’ (l. 1, h. t.). Lord Holt has well expressed the principle in saying: ‘This is a politic establishment, contrived by the policy of the law for the safety of all persons, the necessity of whose affairs oblige them to trust these sort of persons that they may be safe in their ways of dealing; for else these carriers might have an opportunity of undoing all persons that had any connection with them, by combining with thieves, etc., and yet doing it in such a clandestine manner as could not be possible to be discovered. And this is the reason the law is founded upon in that point.’ 2 Lord Raymond 918.

See Stypmanni Jus Maritimum, ed. Hienec. 1740, p. 573, No. 12.

⁴ Lord Mansfield, in Forward v Pittard, distinguishes the two principles thus: ‘By the nature of his (the carrier’s) contract, he is liable for all due care and diligence; and for any negligence, he is liable on his contract. But there is a further degree of responsibility by the custom of the realm; that is, by the common law a carrier is in the nature of an insurer. It is laid down that he is liable for every accident except by the act of God or the king’s enemies.’ 1 Term. Rep. 28.

⁵ Stair i. 13. 3.

I. PERSONS LIABLE TO THIS RESPONSIBILITY.—The persons to whom this rule applies are public servants, holding themselves out as such, professing their willingness to take the profits of that employment, with the full responsibility which the law enjoins, and being compellable to undertake the charge which that particular department comprehends.¹ Such are, according to the words of the edict, shipmasters, innkeepers, and stablers. But it requires a commentary to set forth the several cases and questions which have in practice arisen under [467] this brief description.

1. CARRIERS.—Under the word Nautæ, strictly speaking, are comprehended only carriers by water. But the reason and principle of the law has in modern practice extended it to land carriers, both in this country and in England.² In England, where the principle has been applied without any reference to the words of the Roman edict, but on the common custom of the realm, carriers by land furnish the chief examples in the books of this sort of responsibility. And that the rule applies to common carriers never was doubted, since first the principle of expediency was adopted in English jurisprudence; or rather, perhaps, this is the case in which the rule was first judicially applied. The sole difficulty has been, whether the same rule should be applied to those who were not common carriers.³

The description of Nautæ fully comprehends the owners and masters of regular packets, carrying smacks, and ships on general freight. These are the proper cases. Barge-masters, hoymen, canal-boatmen, ferrymen,⁴ all come under the same rule.⁵ It has been held that steamboats, though for the conveyance of passengers, fall under the edict, even in respect of goods received on board, not as luggage of a passenger.⁶ As to particular ships freighted

By the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854 (extended to railway companies' steamers by 26 and 27 Vict. c. 92), provision is made for enforcing, by application to one of the superior courts, the duty of making arrangements for the receiving and forwarding of goods of every description without delay, and without partiality (secs. 1 to 6). A list of the decisions on the construction of the statute is given in 1 Sm. L. Ca. 6th ed. p. 208.]

² Bankton says: 'The edict is extended to common carriers.' Bankt. i. 16. 5. Erskine, with more reserve, says: 'This edict would possibly, from the parity of reason, be also applied against carriers.' Ersk. iii. 1. 29.

Ewing v Miller, 1687, M. 9235. Even in the case not of a common carrier, but a hired carter, the Court of Session applied the rule of the edict.

This doctrine is taken for granted, M'Ausland v Dick, 1787, M. 9246.

[Railway and canal companies are common carriers in relation to goods which they are bound by statute to carry, or which they profess to carry for the public, of which the practice of the company is sufficient evidence. Palmer v Grand Junction Canal Co., 4 M. and W. 749; Pickford v Grand Junction Railway Co., 10 M. and W. 399; Parker v Great Western Railway Co., 7 Scott N. ⁵ Without looking back into the older cases, Lord Holt's direction may be taken in his celebrated argument on bailments, where, speaking of the fifth sort of bailment of goods to be carried, he says: 'It is either a delivery to one that exercises a public employment, or a delivery to a private person. First, if it be to a person of the first sort, and he is to have a reward, he is bound to answer for the goods at all events; and this is the case of the common carrier, common hoyman, master of a ship, etc. The law charges the person thus entrusted to carry goods, against all events, but acts of God and of the enemies of the king.' Coggs v Bernard, 2 Lord Raymond 917.

specially, unless there be a specific agreement, the edict applies.¹ Under this class have also been comprehended wharfingers in the English law,² as indeed the principle of responsibility seems applicable to them as well as the others mentioned.

The rule being once held applicable to land carriers (supra), it follows without much difficulty that all sorts of land carriers, holding themselves out as public carriers, are under it, and that no distinction ought to be made on account of the vehicle, whether a waggon, a cart, or a mail-coach or stage-coach. A distinction, however, seems to have been contended for in the case of stage-coaches, on some such principle as this, that their undertaking is for the carriage of persons, not of goods, and that they are not to be subjected, except for goods entered and paid for. This must appear to be a very questionable ground [468] of distinction, since it is not on the contract that the carrier is responsible, but on the principle of public policy, which is equally applicable to this as to any other sort of land carriage. In England at one time the distinction was actually entertained on the above ground,³ though it now seems to be abandoned, and stage-coachmen held universally responsible.⁴

Hackney-coachmen, however, seem to be in a different situation, as neither employed in the carriage of goods, nor in such journeys as make the carriage of luggage necessary, and as responsible for goods only by contract when received expressly and paid for.⁵

As the establishment of the GENERAL POST OFFICE has been accompanied with a prohibition of the carriage of letters and packets by common carriers, stage-coachmen, and others, it is natural to maintain that there should be a transfer of the responsibility as well as of the employment.⁶ But it is necessary here to make an important distinction. Responsi-

¹ Ersk. iii. 1. 29. Any particular observations relative to ships and sea-carriage, will be found in that part of the work where Charter-party is discussed.

² In a case which turned on a technical objection to an action as of trover, when it ought to have been on the case, to subject a wharfinger for goods which had been received by him, Lord Mansfield said: 'It is impossible to make a distinction between a wharfinger and a common carrier: they both receive the goods upon a contract. Every case against a carrier is like the same against a wharfinger.' Ross v Johnston, 5 Burr. 2825. I should have imagined this to imply merely an opinion that this sort of remedy was the same, not to go the length of holding the same responsibility; because it is not on the matter of contract that the degree of responsibility rests, though certainly the form of action will be affected by it. It seems, however, to be taken otherwise by English lawyers.

³ In Middleton v Fowles, 1 Salkeld 282, Lord Holt held a stage-coachman not to be within the custom as a carrier, unless where he takes a distinct price for the carriage of goods as well as of persons.

So in Livett v Hobbs, 2 Shower 127, it was said that when a stage-coachman commonly carries goods, and takes money for so doing, he is in the case of a common carrier, and is a carrier for that purpose, whether the goods be a passenger's or stranger's.

⁴ In Clark v Gray, 1803, the point was taken for granted. 4 Espin. N. P. Cases, p. 177; 1 Selwyn's N. P. 324, note.

It seems agreed at least, that where a custom prevails of charging for over-weight, stage-coachmen are common carriers.

[The result of the English decisions, as stated in Smith's Leading Cases, is, that a person who conveys passengers only is not a common carrier (6th ed. vol. i. p. 206), on the authority of Sharpe v Grey, 9 Bing. 460, and Blake v Great Western Railway Co., 7 H. and N. 987, 31 L. J. Exch. 346, distinguishing cases in 3 B. and B. 54, and 5 Q. B. 747.]

⁵ So held in England, by Lord Holt, in Upshure v Aidee, Com. Rep. 25, 2 Comyn's Cont. 294, 1 Selwyn N. P. 323; Jeremy, Law of Carriers, 13.

[It has since been held that the acceptance of luggage by a cabman implies a promise to carry safely, with a corresponding liability. Ross v Hill, 2 C. B. 877; Powles v Hider, 6 El. and Bl. 207. See also Brind v Dale, 2 M. and Rob. 80; Add on Cont. 6th ed. 467.]

⁶ The post office was first established in England during the Usurpation, by an ordinance of Cromwell in 1656; not entirely at first for public convenience and safer intercourse, but also with a political view to the whole correspondence of the kingdom being under official inspection, for the prevention of conspiracies. By 12 Charles II. c. 35, the establishment was more fully regulated. In the time of King William, the first Act was passed for a general post office in Scotland, on much the same footing with that of England (1695, c. 20). And by 9 Anne, c. 10 (1710), both the English and Scottish Acts relative to the general post office are recited and repealed, and a new general post office established for the whole United Kingdom. By this Act the post office has become a branch of the revenue, and a branch of police. Of the revenue, the surplus is for the public after payment of the expense of the establishment; and it is secured to the public by requiring, as a branch of police, that the whole correspondence of the kingdom shall be under Government, and the direction and management of it committed to the Crown, and officers by the Crown appointed. The officers take the oath as public officers. They are subjected to heavy penalties; and what in common carriers is, in criminal jurisprudence, only a breach of trust, is with the officers of the post office a capital felony.

bility for constructive negligence, established against carriers for the public safety, has in the case of the post office been superseded by other precautions,—namely, the appointment of public officers, whose fidelity in their office is secured by penal statutes of more than ordinary rigour.¹ But the responsibility for negligence actually committed is reserved in full force, each person being liable in his department for the letters committed to his charge.² [469] The liability for servants does not hold here, as in the case of carriers. Each officer in the post office, from the postmaster-general to the lowest letter-carrier, is regarded as an independent officer, liable in his own department.

Mail-coaches are in this sense no part of the establishment, but mere stage-coaches. See above, p. 497.

2. INNKEEPERS AND STABLERS.—1. Letters of lodgings were by one decision of early date held to fall under the description of innkeepers.³ But in a recent case the Court of Session, where the point was raised, declared the decision not to proceed on this ground.⁴ Innkeepers are responsible, on the principle of the edict, for whatever is placed under their charge, or that of their servants, or brought into their inn by or for their guests (although not otherwise than collaterally the source of gain to them), provided the guest does not himself undertake the exclusive care of his goods.⁵ Where an article is given to an innkeeper to be sent by a carrier or coach going from his house, he is liable for it.⁶ But it has been doubted whether, under this law, an innkeeper is responsible for a parcel addressed to one who was not a guest, but merely called at his inn, and went on with post-horses.⁷

Whitefield v Le Despenser, 1778, Cowper 754. In Lord Mansfield's time the question was again brought forward, as on the establishment of 9 Anne. He delivered the opinion of the Court, denying the doctrine of Lord Holt, and representing the case of Lane and Cotton as a judgment on which the bar and the country relied; and concluding that, 'if there could have been any doubt before that determination, the solemn judgment in that case having stood uncontroverted ever since puts the matter beyond dispute.'

Farries v Elder & Scott, 1799, M. 10103. The question came to trial in Scotland about twenty years after the decision of Whitefield's case, when the Court of Session, both on the general argument, and particularly on the English precedents, dismissed the action.

² Lord Mansfield makes the distinction in the case of Whitefield (see preceding note): 'As to an action on the case against the party really offending, there can be no doubt of it; for whoever does an act by which another person receives an injury, is liable in an action for the injury sustained. If the man who receives a penny to carry the letters to the post office loses any of them, he is answerable; so is the porter in the business of his department; so is the postmaster for any fault of his own' (Cowp. 765).

On this distinction, it will be observed that a case decided by the Court of Session in 1724 (Short v Hamilton, M. 10091) is not, as stated by the editor of the last edition of Erskine (p. 491, note), contrary to that in Farries' case. For Short's was an action against the postmaster at Falkirk for gold sealed up in a letter, and delivered to him as containing money, and of which there was no further trace; but here there was the distinct negligence of the postmaster in not marking the letter as a money letter.

³ May v Wingate, 1694, M. 9236.

[In England the doctrine of special responsibility is limited to the business of innkeeping in its proper sense. A coffee-house is not an inn (Doe v Laming, 4 Camp. 77); nor is a boarding-house (Dansay v Richardson, 3 El. and Bl. 144); nor a hotel when used as such (Parkhurst v Foster, Salk. 388). As to lodging-houses, see Holder v Soulby, 8 C. B. N. S. 254.]

2. Stablers are liable not only for the horses placed under their charge, or that of their hostlers or servants, but also for the horse furniture, etc., which is brought into their stables.

II. EXTENT OF RESPONSIBILITY.—The rule of the edict is, that a public carrier, innkeeper, or stabler, being once chargeable with the goods, etc., as received into his custody, must answer for their restitution in the same condition,¹ unless they have perished, or have suffered injury by inevitable accident.

1. In the construction of this rule, a loss by ROBBERY is not to be received as an inevitable accident. Robbery is one of the main dangers against which the severity of this law was intended to operate as a preventive; yet our authors have spoken so loosely, [470] that robbery might almost be taken as held by them to form an express exception from the responsibility.² The rule as laid down in England is, 'that nothing is an excuse except an act of God or of the king's enemies;' and if an irresistible number of persons should commit the robbery, the carrier is nevertheless chargeable.⁴

2. There never has been any doubt in Scotland, any more than in England, that the responsibility extends to THEFT.⁵

3. FIRE is held as an inevitable accident in ordinary cases; but, looking to the policy of this law, it is not in England so regarded, and was not so held in the Roman law. Being by the act of man, it may be collusive, by the confusion, to favour depredations; and as there is a possibility of the carrier or innkeeper being participant in the crime, the risk is on them.⁶ And this view of the responsibility certainly leads to a wholesome correctness lost. The innkeeper was held not liable, after much difference of opinion among the judges.

[By 26 and 27 Vict. c. 41, no innkeeper shall thereafter be liable for loss of or injury to goods or property brought to his inn, not being a horse or other live animal, or any gear appertaining thereto, or any carriage, to a greater amount than £30, except in the case of wilful default of such innkeeper or his servant, or unless such goods or property shall have been expressly deposited with him for safe custody (sec. 1). As conditions of exemption from further responsibility, the innkeeper is bound to receive the guest's goods for safe custody on demand (sec. 2); and is also bound to exhibit in the hall or entrance to his inn a copy of the first section of the statute (sec. 3).]

² Erskine says: 'The law is express, that if the goods perish even without his fault, he is liable, unless the loss has happened damno fatali by an accident which could be neither foreseen nor withstood.' This is the true rule. But he has added an example of damnum fatale, which may be doubted: 'If, ex. gr., they have been lost by storm, or carried off forcibly by pirates or housebreakers' (Ersk. iii. 1. 28). He quotes no case for this.

These authors refer to the third law of this title of the Digest. But Ulpian there says: 'At hoc edicto omnimodo qui recepit tenetur etiamsi sine culpa ejus (levi scilicet, says Pothier, Pand. vol. i. p. 159), res periit vel damnum datum est; nisi si quid damno fatali contingit. Inde Labeo scribit, si quid naufragio aut per vim piratarum perierit non esse iniquum exceptionem ei dari. Idem erit dicendum et si in stabulo aut in caupona vis major contigerit.' But the true meaning of the law, in using the words vis major, seems rather to be hostile force; with us, 'the king's enemies.' On this matter the commentators seem to differ. Voet is rather of opinion that the analogy holds with housebreakers: 'Cui non absimile est si effracto per effractores fures domo vel stabulo res viatorum ablatae.' But he adds that the onus probandi lies on the innkeeper to justify himself against all suspicion. 1 Voet. Comm. ad Pand. 301. Peckius, in his Commentary, 'In juris civilis titulos ad rem nauticam pertinentes,' says: 'Est autem vis major cui resisti non potest, qua ratione defendi posse existimavero si exercitus præteriens seu hostis urbem vi occupans, res alicujus in hospitio depositas et fidei cauponis mandatas abstulerit' (Opera, p. 825).

But in judging of the analogy in Scotland, the principle of expediency, as established by many practical illustrations in England, will undoubtedly be received as of more authority than hundreds of dicta rescued from the cobwebs of the civilians.

Stair, the best of all our lawyers, says: 'They were made liable for the loss or theft of such things absolutely, from which they were freed by no diligence, but were not liable for accident or force; that is, sea hazard must always be excepted' (i. 13. 3).

Forward v Pittard, 1 Term. Rep. 27. Lord Mansfield lays it down thus: 'Now what is the act of God? I consider it to mean something in opposition to the act of man; for everything is the act of God that happens by His permission, everything by His knowledge. But to prevent collusive litigation, and the necessity of going into circumstances impossible to be unravelled, the law always presumes against the carrier, unless he shows the injury to have been done by the king's enemies, or by such act as could not happen by the intervention of man, as storms, lightnings, tempests,' etc.

2. Case of Carrier.—Ewing v Miller, 1687, M. 9235.

⁶ Numerous cases in England are reported, in which the and care, which might otherwise be utterly neglected. But it has, on the whole, appeared in Scotland, that this responsibility for fire is not to be held as within the true principle of the edict as adopted by us.¹ It is rather considered as damnum fatale, an inevitable accident, for which the carrier, etc., are not responsible.²

[471] 4. So far as the contract of carriage operates, the principal is liable for his servants and deputies (see above, p. 493); but the edict was extended to protect what may properly be said to be deposited, as in the case of luggage in an inn or stage-coach not paid for. And it extended the obligation (which in deposit does not make the depositary responsible for his servants) to a universal responsibility for all servants, and even strangers.³

5. Proof of Loss.—The value of the parcel or thing lost may occasion difficulty if not regulated by a general rule. A person cannot always have direct and positive evidence of the sum which may have been in his pocket-book when stolen from an inn; or of the value of his luggage taken from a coach. In order to get quit of the difficulty, a very clumsy and dangerous remedy formerly prevailed in Scotland,—namely, that the person should by his own oath be allowed to establish that value against the carrier or innkeeper;⁴ it being reserved to the Court to restrain the claim.⁵ The principle on which Lord Stair places this is, that access may be refused to travellers, ‘unless they show what they have; and otherwise he (the carrier) is presumed to trust to their oath.’ But this is not a practicable arrangement. It is not always safe, and in the hurry of travelling quite intolerable, that one should be required to show money or jewels in the confusion of a coachyard, or to undo a package, or turn out the contents of a portmanteau, to satisfy a carrier or stage-coachman. These precautions are quite unsuitable to our times. And the matter seems fairly and equitably to resolve into these propositions: 1. That as to the luggage of a traveller, the coachmaster must take his risk of the probable value, including such a sum of money as may reasonably loss was by fire. In Forward v Pittard, 1 Term. Rep. 27, the fire began at the distance of 100 yards, and without any negligence whatever being proved on the part of the carrier.

In Hyde v Trent and Mersey Navigation Co., 5 Term. Rep. 189, the loss was by fire.

[The law is altered by 19 and 20 Vict. c. 60, sec. 17: ‘From and after the passing of this Act, all carriers for hire of goods within Scotland shall be liable to make good to the owner of such goods all losses arising from accidental fire, while such goods were in the custody or possession of such carriers.’]

² [(1.) The responsibility for injury, as distinguished from loss or abstraction of goods in the custody of innkeepers, rests not on the edict (which is a presumption raised by law to protect travellers against fraud), but on the rule as to diligence prestable by custodiers for hire. Dawson v Chamney, 5 Q.B. 164. Where the question was as to responsibility for injury to plaintiff's horse, which was killed by another horse in defendant's stable, Mr. Justice Cresswell told the jury that the defendant was liable if he or his servants had been guilty of direct injury or negligence, otherwise not. This direction was approved by the Court, subject to the observation that the damage raised a presumption of negligence in the innkeeper. See also, as to the distinction between loss and injury, Morgan v Ravey, 6 H. and N. 265, 30 L. J. Exch. 131.

(2.) The innkeeper is exonerated if it be made to appear that the abstraction of the goods was the result of gross negligence on the part of the guest, as where a cash-box easily opened was left in the commercial room of an inn, and the money was stolen (Armistead v Fuller, 17 Q. B. 261). And in order to exonerate the innkeeper, it is only necessary to show that the loss would not have happened if the guest had used the ordinary care that a prudent man might reasonably be expected to take under the circumstances (Cashill v Wright, 6 El. and Bl. 891).

(3.) The guest is entitled to the benefit of the rule, in a case of theft or loss of goods when stopping at the inn for temporary refreshment, e.g. where a gig was stolen from the street in front of the inn while the horse was being fed in the stable. Jones v Tyler, 1 Ad. and El. 522; and see Lord Holt's dictum in York v Grindstone, 1 Salk. 388, 2 Lord Raym. 860.]

³ ‘By this edict,’ says Stair, ‘positive law, for utility's sake, hath appointed that the custody of goods of passengers in ships, or strangers in inns or in stables, shall be far extended beyond the nature of deposition, which obliges for fraud only or supine negligence in them who have expressly contracted for their own part. But this edict, for public utility's sake, extends it, first, To the restitution of the goods of passengers and travellers, and reparation of any loss or injury done by mariners or servants of the ship, or by the servants of the inn or stable, etc. Secondly, The edict extends this obligation even to the damages sustained by the fact of other passengers or strangers in the ship, inn, or stable, for which the master, innkeeper, or keeper of the stable, could be no ways obliged but by virtue of this edict.’ Stair i. 13. 3.

be carried in his travelling portmanteau for the occasions of his journey. 2. That if the luggage be of extraordinary value, this ought to be stated; and if demanded, a reasonable increase of hire paid, proportioned to the additional risk, otherwise the coachmaster will not be liable beyond the value to be reasonably supposed.¹ 3. That when a loss happens, such evidence as the circumstances of the case may admit, added to the oath in litem, shall be shown of the amount of the damage, in which inquiry care must always be taken to prevent the traveller from taking advantage of the accident to impose on the carrier. 4. That in the carriage of goods or parcels, although the carrier cannot insist to have the packages which have been made up with care for safe transportation undone, at least he may insist on seeing the invoice and knowing the value. 5. That when he does not take this precaution, he must be responsible for the value of the goods, as it may be [472] established by evidence. And, 6. That where the carrier is deceived as to the value, and made to undertake a high responsibility, supposing it to be the ordinary risk, he will not be liable on the edict, but only for his own fraud, or at least not liable beyond the reasonable value according to the appearance of the goods and other circumstances.² And, finally, reasonable evidence will now be required of the nature and value of the thing lost, together with the employer's oath in litem, rather as a precautionary measure to prevent an extravagant demand, than as being of itself the evidence on which the demand is to rest.³

III. LIMITATION OF RESPONSIBILITY.⁴—The question, how far the responsibility of carriers and others is capable of limitation, and by what evidence such limitation may be established, is very important. A sense of the severe responsibility laid on common carriers has, within these twenty or thirty years, given admission to a sort of limitation by means of notices in newspapers, and placards in the carrier's office; which the judges in England seem now to be sensible has been allowed to go too far, and against the evils of which they contemplate no remedy but by the Legislature. There has not yet in Scotland been any encroachment on the principles which ought to regulate this matter; and the doctrine adopted seems at once consistent with the law of the contract, and with the public policy which has been introduced into this class of cases.

It seems to admit of no doubt, 1st, That, as matter of contract, carriers, innkeepers, stablers, and others, may, with the consent of those who employ them, undertake only certain risks and responsibilities. 2dly, That one desiring to be admitted to an inn, or to be transported in a public stage-coach, or to have his goods carried in a public waggon, is entitled to insist that the innkeeper, stage-coachman, or public carrier, shall comply with his request, unless his inn or his vehicle be fully occupied.⁵ 3dly, It seems to be a part of the same rule, that such public servants cannot within the line of their duty and public undertaking, unless with consent of the employer, insist on limiting their undertaking to a less extensive responsibility than the policy of the law has enjoined.⁶ But, 4thly, Between

² M'Ausland v Dick, 1787, M. 9246. M'Ausland sent by a stage-coach between Edinburgh and Glasgow £200 in an ordinary parcel, which he booked, and for which he paid 6d. The coachman defended himself on the unusual hazard; the circumstance of there being no proper place at that time in coaches to preserve such valuable parcels from the frauds of passengers; and the ignorance in which he was suffered to remain of the great risk which he ran by having this parcel occupy in the coach. He was held not liable.

[In Morgan v Ravey, 6 H. and N. 265, a question was raised as to the effect of notice at common law in limiting these opposite principles there is another consideration which cannot be overlooked in this question. The extensive responsibility of the edict, proceeding on views of general policy and precaution, makes carriers and others answerable for fire, robbery, and other risks, although they may be innocent of any collusion or neglect, and the accidents may really be inevitable. But if it be allowable on the one hand to subject such persons to a heavy responsibility, in order to avoid possible evil and repress combination and villany, it is fair on the other that the innocent should be indemnified for the danger they run; and this can be done only by an augmented hire, combining in one payment the price of labour and a premium for risk. And it is considered also as equitable, that carriers should not [473] be made for a small hire to undertake the care of packages of a much higher value than from their appearance is naturally to be inferred.

It is partly under these last considerations, and partly, as it seems, under the power in certain descriptions of public servants to circumscribe their undertaking, that the whole doctrine of limitations by notice has grown up in England. Two points have been admitted. One is, that a carrier's general run of goods may be estimated, and notice given by him that he will not be liable for those of a different description, as jewels, money, etc. of extraordinary value, unless he be informed of the value. Another is, that for the greater risk attending such goods, and the greater care required, a higher consideration, partly as hire, partly as insurance, should be given. But besides limitation admitted in this way, and apparently on sound and equitable grounds, the power of limiting by notice has been carried to a much greater extent in some particular lines. The proprietor of a coach running for the avowed purpose of carrying passengers, not as a common carrier of goods, may also undertake to carry parcels of a particular description; and this limitation, when fully made known, may undoubtedly constitute a special contract with the owner of goods. Whatever licence there may be allowable to a common carrier to limit his responsibility, it seems not to be unlawful to restrict this undertaking. Lord Ellenborough, in summing up a case determined some years ago, gives this sketch of the history of such limitations: 'If this action had been brought twenty years ago, the defendant would have been liable, since by the common law a carrier is liable in all cases except two—where the loss is occasioned by the act of God, or of the king's enemies using an overwhelming force, which persons with ordinary means of resistance cannot guard against. It was found that the common law imposed upon carriers a liability of ruinous extent; and in consequence, qualifications and limitations of that liability have been introduced from time to time, till, as in the present case, they seem to have excluded all responsibility whatsoever: so that, under the terms of the present notice, if servants of the carriers had, in the most wilful and wanton manner, destroyed the furniture entrusted to them, the principals would not have been liable. If the parties in the present case have so contracted, the plaintiff must abide by the agreement. And he must be taken to have so contracted, if he choose to send his goods to be carried after notice of the conditions. The question then is, Whether there was a special contract?'¹ If the carriers notified their terms to the person bringing the goods by an advertisement, which in all probability must have attracted the attention of the person who brought the goods, they were delivered upon those terms.'²

the innkeeper's responsibility. In the bed-room occupied by the plaintiff was exhibited a printed notice, stating that the proprietor requested visitors to bolt their bed-room doors, and leave their valuables at the bar, otherwise he would not be responsible. The plaintiff did neither, and his gold watch and ring were taken from his bed-room during the night. He denied having read anything more than the word 'Notice.' The jury found that there was no negligence on his part, and the innkeeper was held responsible.]

² Maving v Tod, 1 Starkie 79. On another occasion the question arose, Whether a wharfinger, held as in the same situation with a carrier, could avoid responsibility for fire? 'Holroyd submitted whether the defendants could exclude their responsibility altogether;' and added, 'they were going further than had been done in the case of carriers who had only limited their responsibility to a certain amount.' Lord Ellenborough: Since they can limit it to a particular sum, I think they may exclude it altogether, and that they may say we have nothing to do with fire. Holroyd: They were bound

The unhappy consequences of this doctrine are to be ascribed, as it would seem, to a wrong bias unfortunately admitted in the progress of its establishment, from not keeping a steady eye upon the principles which ought to have regulated the practice of giving notices. There seems to be only one point to which legitimately notices of public carriers can be admitted, viz. the regulation of the consideration for risk. Saving always the power of making an express contract, the effect of a mere notice ought justly to be restricted to this point, as to which alone it is competent for a carrier to refuse employment. On this principle, the law would have proceeded conformably to the general system of jurispru- [474] dence, and we should not have seen a sort of legislative power assumed by carriers. Any exorbitancy of charge would at once have been brought to a true standard by judicial determination; while the responsibilities of the carrier, under the common law of his contract, and on the principles of public policy, would have remained untouched but by positive agreement in each individual case. The operation of this law, however, might not have been very extensive, if held only to apply to those who are strictly speaking common carriers. The great extension of the doctrine of notice has been in regard to coaches of different descriptions, which are not strictly speaking within all the restraints to which common carriers are liable, in so far as they are employed to carry goods or parcels, not luggage of passengers; but are so to be considered only to the extent in which they profess to undertake that branch of Carriage.

Of the extravagance into which this doctrine of notice has run, and the distracting questions which come to be involved in it, the newspapers and the books of English reports are full. One carrier frees himself from responsibility for fire,¹ another even from the common responsibility of the contract for negligence.² One man is bound by a notice which has appeared in a newspaper that he has been accustomed to read;³ another, because a large board was stuck up in the coach office;⁴ while a third is freed from the effect of the notice in the office, because handbills were circulated of a different import.⁵ Then it is said, What if he cannot read? or if he does not go himself, but sends a porter, and he cannot read? or what if he be blind, and cannot see the placard? And thus difficulties multiply, the courts are filled with questions, and the public left in uncertainty.

In the proper case of a common carrier, it does seem not only a very dangerous doctrine, and admissible only from absolute necessity, but a thing quite against the principles of law, that the whole public shall be bound to take notice of advertisements by individuals, under the penalty of being held bound by the terms of those advertisements, whether in fact they have seen them or not. But, above all, it is against legal principle, that persons acting in the capacity of public servants, and by the law itself declared liable to certain rules of responsibility for the safety of their employers, shall have this power in their hands. To such a person any of the public is entitled to go, as to one who under the edict is bound to extensive responsibilities; and to disregard utterly every protest which may have been made against those responsibilities, unless actually and personally intimated to him at the time. If a carrier or other public servant choose to express the terms of his contract separately in an advertisement, with a view of recommending himself to public favour, and making known what he means to insist on in each case, it is well; but the onus probandi must in every case remain on him to show, either that he has insisted on the terms announced, and that they have been agreed to, or that a fair consideration for extraordinary risk has been refused; in which case his responsibility will in equity stand limited to losses from fault or negligence, to the exclusion of risks concealed or not paid for.⁶ In England, it is held incumbent on to receive the goods. Lord Ellenborough: Yes, but they may make their own terms. I am sorry the law is so; it leads to very great negligence.

³ Same case.

⁴ Clerk v Gray, 4 Esp. Rep. 177.

⁵ Copden v Bolton, 1809, 2 Camp. 103.

⁶ The only case which has occurred in Scotland on this question is still in dependence. It was this: A gentleman a person wishing to rid himself of this responsibility, to prove effectual notice. A special [475] contract is required to be proved, and whether it exists or not, is always a question for the jury.¹ The delivery of a printed paper containing the notice to every person bringing a parcel to the office, has been suggested as an effectual and easy method of giving notice.²

The true line of distinction seems to be, 1. That in the proper case of a common carrier, notice against responsibility, unless the value is stated and paid for, will save the carrier from everything but the ordinary diligence of the contract,³ and the reasonable amount of loss, according to the appearance of the package delivered, if the owner does not choose to pay the premium;⁴ but that he cannot lessen that diligence, or relieve himself from responsibility altogether, without showing a special agreement, or evidence, not merely of notice, but of assent to that notice. 2. That coachmasters who carry passengers are not strictly common carriers, further than in relation to luggage, as to which the same rule ought to be applied. And, 3. That in respect to the separate carriage of goods and parcels by coaches, steamboats, etc., the proper business of which is the carriage of persons, it is lawful to limit responsibility by notice of the extent to which the carriage of goods is to be undertaken in that particular instance. And in England, in such cases, where goods of greater value than the restricted sum have been delivered to a coach, without paying for them the additional hire, it has been held that no action lies even for the restricted sum. This seems to proceed on the ground that there is in such case a legitimate special contract, under the terms of which no action can lie.⁵

Evidence of a specific bargain, however, cannot justly be required on each occasion of [476] sending goods by a carrier, or travelling in a particular coach. Provided such specific contract or assent to the terms can be established on a previous occasion, it will be held travelling from Inverness to Edinburgh made the waiter of the inn carry his portmanteau to the clerk of the mail-coach. He himself saw it entered, and placed under the care of the clerk and the guard. Observed no placard, though it is believed there was one in the office; had no questions asked or terms insisted for in limitation of the responsibility; and afterwards, on entering the coach, asked the guard whether his portmanteau was safe, and was answered it was in the boot, and quite safe. On arriving at Aberdeen the portmanteau was missing; and notwithstanding every search, could not be recovered. The gentleman brought his action for the value of his portmanteau, in which were his travelling equipment and fifty guineas. The defence was rested on notices and advertisements, and the whole doctrine of limitation, as established in England. Lord Pitmilley held the contractors liable. Cockburn v Richardson; but the case was compromised without any judgment of the Inner House.

¹ Keir v Willan, 1817, 2 Starkie 53, where a truss of goods had been delivered at the office of Willan, a carrier, at the Bull and Mouth Inn, London, to be carried to Dumfries. The defence was on a notice of limitation of responsibility. The answer was, the porter who delivered the truss could not read the notice. Lord Ellenborough said, that 'by the common law the carrier is responsible for loss of goods, unless he enter into a special contract by which he limits that responsibility. This he may do by notice in the public papers, or by any other medium by which the party with whom he deals is effectually apprised of the terms on which he proposes to deal.' A verdict for plaintiff, £240, 15s. 6d. A rule for a new trial was refused. The Court said, that 'the necessity of giving effectual notice imposed considerable difficulty upon the carrier; but the difficulty arose from the attempt to depart from the old rule of common law, which had prevailed for ages, and which could not be avoided without great exertion. No doubt, the rule of law might be superseded in the particular case by a special contract, since modus et conventio vincunt legem; but then such special contract must be proved; and whether it exists or not, is always a question for the jury.'

The same doctrine laid down by Lord Chief Justice Abbot in Davis v Willan, 2 Starkie 279. See Munn v Baker, 2 Starkie 255. Rowley v Horne, 1825, 3 Bingham 2. It was held not enough that the defender had for years taken in a newspaper in which this notice was advertised weekly.

² Rowley v Horne, preceding note.

³ In Beck v Evans, 3 Camp. 267, 16 East, a notice was found no defence against negligence, where the thing delivered was a cask known to contain brandy, etc., obviously above the value of £5.

In Wilson v Freeman, 3 Camp. 527, the bookkeeper was told the value; and though no additional sum was paid, the notice held unavailing to restrict.

⁴ Beck v Evans, 16 East 247. It does not seem to be very different even from the English doctrine. 'I think,' says Mr. Justice Le Blanc, 'that the exemption of carriers from general responsibility, by reason of notices of this sort, has been carried to the utmost extent, and cannot be supported on any other ground than this, that they shall not be held liable to a large amount, where they only get a small reward for the carriage.'

that, till altered again by specific contract, the future employment continues on the footing once acquiesced in.¹

SECTION III.

OF MERCANTILE AGENTS OR FACTORS.

Some points in the law relative to mercantile agency have already been touched, in speaking of the effect of possession and reputed ownership on property in the hands of factors;² and under the doctrine of lien, the effects of that sort of security in giving a

¹ [The doctrine of the limitation of responsibility by notice is now superseded in a great measure by the provisions of the Land Carriers Act, and the Railway and Canal Traffic Act.

(1.) By 11 Geo. iv. and 1 Will. iv. c. 68, no common carrier by land for hire shall be liable for loss (Hearn v London and South-Western Ry. Co., 10 Exch. 793) or injury to any gold or silver coin, gold or silver in a manufactured or unmanufactured state, precious stones, jewellery, watches, clocks, time-pieces, trinkets (Bernstein v Baxendale, 6 C. B. N. S. 251, overruling Davey v Mason, 1 Car. and M. 45), bills, bank-notes, orders, notes or securities for the payment of money (Stoessiger v South-Eastern Ry. Co., 3 El. and Bl. 549; M'Call v Taylor, 19 C. B. N. S. 301, 34 L. J. C. P. 365), stamps, maps, writings, title-deeds, paintings, engravings, pictures, gold or silver plate or plated articles, glass (see Owen v Burnett, 4 Tyrwh. 143), china, silks manufactured or unmanufactured, wrought up or not wrought up with other materials (see Bernstein v Baxendale, supra; Brunt v Midland Ry. Co., 2 H. and C. 889, 33 L. J. Exch. 187), furs (see Mayhew v Nelson, 6 C. and P. 59), or lace contained in any parcel (other than machine-made lace, 28 and 29 Vict. c. 94, sec. 1), when the value exceeds the sum of £10, unless at the time of delivery the value and nature of the article shall have been declared, and the increased charges, or an engagement to pay the same, accepted by the person receiving the parcel. This Act applies to the case of a delivery to the carrier or his servant, whether at his office or elsewhere (Hart v Baxendale, 6 Exch. 769). By section 2, the carrier may demand for such parcels an increased rate of charge, which is to be notified by a notice affixed in his office, and customers are to be bound thereby, without further proof of the notice having come to their knowledge. The carrier loses the benefit of the Act, if after declaration of value he receives the goods without demanding the extra charge (Behrens v Great Northern Ry. Co., in Ex. Ch. 7 H. and N. 950). By section 4, carriers can no longer by public notice limit their responsibility in respect of articles not within the Act. Special contracts, however, between the carrier and his employer are still allowed; and such a contract may be inferred from the fact of a notice given by a carrier to his customer, and the customer having subsequently sent goods to be carried without objecting to the terms of the notice. Walker v York and N. M. Ry. Co., 2 El. and Bl. 750; Van Toll v South-Eastern Ry. Co., 12 C. B. N. S. 75, and other cases cited in 1 Sm. L. Ca. 6th ed. p. 211. By section 5, the Act is not to protect carriers from their liability to answer for loss occasioned by the felonious acts of their own servants, nor is it to protect the servant from answering for his own neglect or misconduct.

VOL. I.

(2.) By 17 and 18 Vict. c. 31, sec. 7 (Railway and Canal Traffic), it is enacted that every such company shall be liable for the loss of, or for any injury (Allday v Great Western Ry. Co., 5 Best and Sm. 903, 34 L. J. Q. B. 5) done to, any horses, cattle, or other animals, or to any articles, goods, or things, in the receiving (Hodgman v W. Midland Ry. Co., 5 B. and S. 173, 33 L. J. Q. B. 233; aff. 35 L. J. Q. B. 85), forwarding, or delivering thereof, occasioned by the neglect or default of such company or its servants (Van Toll v South-Eastern Ry. Co., 12 C. B. N. S. 75; Harrison v London and Brighton Ry. Co., Ex. Ch., 2 B. and S. 152), notwithstanding any notice, condition, or declaration made and given by such company contrary thereto or in any wise limiting such liability, every such notice, etc., being declared null and void: provided that nothing in the statute contained shall be construed to prevent the companies from making such conditions with respect to the receiving, etc., of any of the said animals, etc., as shall be adjudged by the court or judge, etc., to be just and reasonable. Then follows a provision limiting the amount of damage to be recovered for injury to live stock.

After several conflicting decisions, it was finally adjudged by the House of Lords, in the case of Peek v North Staffordshire Ry. Co., 32 L. J. Q. B. 241 (see also M'Manus v Lancashire, etc. Ry. Co., 4 H. and N. 327), that under this Act the validity of conditions limiting the common law liability of the carrier is subject to their being both adjudged just and reasonable, and also embodied in a signed special contract. In the case before them, a condition exempting the company from responsibility for injury to marbles, unless insured, was held to be unreasonable (idem as to similar condition respecting live stock in the case of M'Manus, supra). But in Beale v S. Devon Ry. Co., 3 H. and C. 337, a condition was held valid freeing the company from responsibility for loss or injury to fish from any cause whatever, other than gross negligence or fraud. Idem in Rain v Glasgow and South-Western Ry. Co., 1869, 7 Macph. 439. Conditions applicable to loss from insufficient package were held unreasonable in Simons v Great Western Ry. Co., 18 C. B. 805; idem, as to conditions disaffirming liability for delay, in Allday v Great Western Ry. Co., 5 B. and S. 903. Contra, as to conditions stipulating for insurance of horses and dogs above a certain value (Harrison v Brighton, etc. Co., 3 B. and S. 122); as to condition requiring claims within a certain time (Lewis v Great Western Co., 5 H. and N. 867); and also as to disaffirmance of liability for damage beyond the limits of the company's railway (Aldridge v Great Western Ry. Co., 15 C. B. N. S. 582, 33 L. J. C. P. 161). See, on this subject, Add. on Cont. 6th ed. 473; Smith, Merc. Law, 7th ed. 285.] preference to factors for their general balance, or for special advances, shall be considered. In this place, the personal contract and its effects are to be discussed, independently of the questions which may arise as to the property or real rights of the several parties.

SUBSECTION I.—GENERAL PRINCIPLES RELATIVE TO MERCANTILE AGENCY.

1. Constitution of the Power.

In the civil law, MANDATE was a different contract from that by which in modern practice one appoints another to act as his representative, agent, or factor in conducting his mercantile transactions, in buying or in selling goods, in sailing or in freighting ships, in effecting insurances, or doing any other mercantile act in which the ministry of another is required. The one was a gratuitous, the other is an onerous contract. And as the effects of this difference on the rights and obligations of the parties are important, it is material to observe that the Roman jurisprudence relative to mandate, in questions arising between a merchant and his agent, is not on all occasions to be held as applicable in the decision of Scottish cases.

This is one of the contracts, in the application of which to the intercourse of life the different condition of ancient and of modern Europe is most apparent. In Rome, commerce and its relations and facilities were discouraged, or not regarded with favour. In the world as now constituted, they form the very object, and supply one of the ruling principles, of the jurisprudence of contracts. Instead of the amicable and gratuitous MANDATE, there has been introduced the onerous contract of agency or factory, the relation of principal and agent, imposing duties more imperative, entitling the principal to more entire reliance on the performance of his orders, and raising with third parties relations of great extent and importance in trade. Instead of SOCIETY, an arrangement merely for the joint management of a common subject, the important contract of PARTNERSHIP has brought into combined operation, for the extension of modern commerce, the skill, the industry, and the capital of many associated persons. The contract of INSURANCE may be said to be entirely modern, by which trading enterprise is so much encouraged and sustained; and the very circulating medium of a mercantile age, PAPER MONEY, in its various forms of bills, and notes, and bank-checks, was utterly unknown in the ancient world.

In mercantile agency there is a vast variety of forms in which the authority of a principal is in daily practice delegated to others. Besides the occasional authority by PROCURATORY [477] or PROCURATION to accept or draw bills of exchange,¹ the charge given to a clerk to manage a store or shop, which is called INSTITORIAL power, the extensive trust given to a shipmaster called EXERCITORIAL power, the powers of FACTORS, AGENTS, BROKERS, are all included under this contract.

1. A FACTOR is distinguished from a merchant in this, that a merchant buys and sells for his own direct mercantile profit; a factor only buys or sells on commission.² Again, a factor is distinguished from a broker by being entrusted with the possession and apparent ownership,³ as well as with the management and disposal of the property of the principal.

his lien extends, otherwise than in money; and other similar extensions of authority, as perhaps authority to give warrantice as to quality, and large powers as to the management and disposal of the goods. But it is quite a different thing to say, that in every case a factor has the apparent ownership of the goods, as if apparent ownership were a legal incident of factory. That will be just as the circumstances of each particular case may determine. As a general rule, a factor's possession and powers of disposal will not create reputed ownership. The statute of James I. c. 19, secs. 10 and 11,

He is distinguished from an agent, in his authority being extended to the management of all the principal's affairs in the place where he resides, or in a particular department. He is distinguished from an institor, in being in point of law a person separate from his principal; whereas an institor (at least where that term is confined to shopkeepers and clerks) is assimilated in all respects to his master, so far as relates to his transactions in that character. A factor is generally the correspondent of a foreign house, or of a merchant or manufacturer at a distance from the place of sale; and he usually sells in his own name, without disclosing that of his principal, and has an implied authority so to do.¹ He receives consignments on the one hand, and makes sales and remittances in return, proceeding for a considerable course of time, and balancing at regular intervals his accounts with his principal; and in general, he gives a del credere guarantee, and has a commission for it. Sometimes he makes large advances on goods consigned to him, while the sales of those goods are either made in his own name; or bills are drawn by his principal on the buyers, payable to the factor; or the bills are drawn by the principal, and sent to the factor to procure acceptance, with blank endorsements. The goods entrusted to a factor or agent, or the price of them, are impledged for his advances, and liable to retention for the general balance.

2. An AGENT is one entrusted with the accomplishment of a particular act or course of dealing; as the riding agent of a manufacturing house for taking commissions, or a supercargo sent out with goods to sell or dispose of them, or one appointed specially to manage the sale of a cargo, the purchase of a commodity, or the effecting of an insurance. His powers within the range of the thing committed to him, unless where expressly limited, are similar to those of a factor.

These are, strictly speaking, the true descriptions of agent and factor, as contradistinguished. But the names are generally confounded in common speech, factors being included under the name of agents.

3. BROKERS are employed merely in the negotiation of contracts relative to property, —declaring that goods in a bankrupt's possession, order, and disposition, with consent and permission of the true owner, and whereof the bankrupt is reputed owner, and of which he takes upon himself the sale, alteration, or disposition as owner, shall be liable for the bankrupt's debts,—though very broadly worded, has always been considered not to include the case of a factor having property of his principal in his possession, though the case is not expressly excepted. So held in L'Apostre v Plaistrier, 1708, 1 P. Wms. 318, 1 Atk. 175—per Holt, C. J.—and afterwards by the Court of King's Bench; Godfrey v Furzo, 1733, 3 P. Wms. 185; ex parte Dumas, 1 Atk. 234, 2 Vesey 585; Tooke v Hollingworth, 5 T. R. 226; Bryson v Wylie, 1 B. and P. 82; Garratt v Callum, Buller's N. P. 5th ed. 42; ex parte Oursell, Ambl. 297. It is said by Lord Kenyon, that the case of a factor has been so frequently decided, and so much taken for granted for a series of years past, that it must now be considered as at rest. Tooke v Hollingworth, supra. The reason assigned is, that as factors must by the course of trade have the goods of other people in their possession, it does not therefore hold out a false credit to the world (per Buller, J., 1 B. and P. 83, in Bryson v Wylie), nor carry to the understanding of the world the reputation of ownership (per Le Blanc, J., Horn v Baker, 9 East 245). Possession, sale, and disposition of chattels by factors and commission agents for sale, in the ordinary course of their trade and business, is not a possession, sale, and disposition by them as reputed owners, although they sell their own goods as well as the goods of other persons, and all are confounded and mixed together, so that it is impossible to tell which goods belong to them and which to their customers. Their possession is known not to be necessarily their own possession as owners. The principle extends to all persons in a trade in which there is a custom to receive and sell the goods of third persons on commission. (Whitfield v Brand, 16 M. and W. 282; Carruthers v Payne, 2 M. and P. 441; Hamilton v Bell, 10 Exch. 545; Addison on Torts, p. 345.) But there may be cases, undoubtedly, where the principle of the exception will be overcome by the facts indicating not merely a possibility that the goods may be, but that they are, the bankrupt's. See Paley, by Lloyd, p. 84, and note (z); Livesay v Hood, 2 Camp. 83; Shaw v Harvey, 1 Ad. and E. 920. So it is settled in England, that goods sent to the premises of a tenant for trading or manufacturing purposes, including goods sent to a factor, commission agent, warehouseman, or other agent, to be sold or exported, or otherwise dealt with in the course of trade, are by the policy of the law exempt from the landlord's right of distress. 'The principle of the exemption,' observes Parke, B., 'is the public good; that is, that all men may freely, and without interruption or danger of the loss of their goods, deal with those who carry on trades or businesses for the benefit of all indiscriminately.' (Joule v Jackson, 7 M. and W. 451; and cases in Addison on Torts, 507.) See ante, p. 270, note 5; and as to the statutory powers of factors to deal with goods of their principals by way of sale or pledge, see p. 521, notes.]

with the custody of which they have no concern. Having no property entrusted to him, the broker ought not to sell in his own name: he has no authority for it, and his principal is entitled to rely on his not doing so. The broker makes it his business to find out the buyers and sellers of commodities, to cultivate that sort of information which may best enable him to bring the buyer and the seller together, or the merchant and the insurer, or the bill-holder and him who is willing to buy bills. In this country, brokers are neither incorporated nor entered by any public authority. Their profession is private; and their success dependent on their integrity, intelligence, and skill. They take their distinguishing appellation from the particular object to which they attach themselves, as insurance-broker, stock-broker, bill-broker, etc. They are paid by an allowance or commission called Brokerage.¹

[478] Sometimes agents or factors act as the ostensible vendors of property belonging to merchants resident in the same place, having warehouses and places fit for exhibiting the goods for sale.²

Sometimes they act as factors both for buyer and seller, the sale being perfected and the delivery transferred by delivery of the bills for the price, and an entry in the factor's books to the debit of the one party and the credit of the other.

The character of factor and broker is frequently combined, the broker having possession of what he is employed to sell, or being empowered to obtain possession of what he is employed to purchase. But, properly speaking, in these cases he is a factor.³

Constitution of Mercantile Agency.—The power of a factor, or agent, or broker, is conferred either, first, In writing, formally by power of attorney, or more loosely in correspondence; or, secondly, By parole agreement;⁴ or, thirdly, By mere employment.

If the powers are special, they form the limits of the authority. If general, they will be more liberally construed, according to the necessities of the occasion, and the material or ordinary or reasonable course of the transaction and usage of trade.

1. In the management of the affairs of a foreign merchant, especially where there is occasion to discharge debts and receive money, or to carry on judicial proceedings, a power of attorney is the proper evidence of authority. It empowers the factor to represent the principal, and act as he might have done if present.

2. But agents, or factors, or brokers, are generally appointed in mercantile affairs by letter. So, a confidential clerk is authorized to accept or endorse bills by a letter addressed to him. It is expressed in the simplest terms, and without either technical words or the solemnities of a formal deed, the powers varying with the circumstances and intentions of the parties. The most extensive powers are sometimes thus conferred on a son or a confidential clerk, and the mandate runs in some such form as this: 'With power to manage his trade and business in general, to accept bills, make promissory notes, endorse and discharge bills and notes, grant bills for money, subscribe policies, and every other thing to do relative to the granter's trade and business.'⁵ So, in the course of correspondence, goods are consigned from abroad, with directions to the consignee to sell them, and either

² [A man, it seems, cannot act as agent for both parties, where he is entrusted with authority to conclude the sale and fix the terms himself in behalf of each, for such a power would enable him to effect frauds. Story on Agency, sec. 31; Wright v Dannah, 2 Camp. 203; New York Central Insurance Co. v National Protective Insurance Co., 4 Kernan 85 (Amer.); Story, Sale, sec. 89, where it is said that in making a contract

requiring the exercise of judgment or discretion, a person cannot act as the agent of both parties; and when he undertakes to do so, a Court of Equity will avoid the contract upon the application of either of the parties. But it cannot be meant that two parties may not give express authority to a broker to adjust a fair contract between them at his own discretion.]

to apply the proceeds in a particular way, or to place them to account; or merchants or manufacturers with an accumulation of goods on hand, place them with another (ex. gr. a general agent or another merchant), who agrees to manage the sales, and to advance a certain proportion, to be reimbursed out of the sales; or one is desired to buy goods for another, and either entrusted with credit or money for that purpose, or left to make the purchases as he can on his own or the principal's general credit; or goods are sent to the warehouse of a general agent, with particular directions as to their disposal, or to be sold at the ordinary rate of the market.

2. Implied Mandate and Actio Institoria.

I. IMPLIED MANDATE.—In the course of mercantile dealings, goods are placed with general agents, or sent to public warehouses, and the power of disposal entrusted to brokers; and so an agency to this effect is constituted without writing of any kind. Many merchants in London and elsewhere have neither goods nor warehouses in their possession, but entrusting all their goods to brokers and agents, confine their own attention to the great lines of commercial intercourse.

Where goods are consigned to one at a distance, there is an implied mandate to sell at such price and time as may seem most beneficial;¹ and this is especially to be [479] inferred where advances have been made on the goods.²

II. ACCREDITED SERVANTS.—Mercantile agents have authority frequently conferred on them by mere implication.³ This generally is grounded on the sanction given by the employer to credit raised by a person acting in his name. Such is the power implied from giving sanction to the acts of a procurator; as where a clerk accepts or endorses bills for his master, which that master pays as legitimately accepted, or allows to be as well transferred as if endorsed by himself.

Such also is the authority with which a domestic or other servant, or a rider or travelling clerk, is invested by his master's employing him in ordering or procuring articles, or in receiving orders for goods, and afterwards recognising his act.⁴ An agent or factor of any kind may in the same way be accredited.⁵ But in all those cases it is from the recognition of the act that the authority is inferred.⁶

III. PRÆPOSITURA.—There is also a delegation of power by presumption of the law, where one places another at the head of an establishment, or in the management of a shop, or in the management or command of a ship. The maxim of the law here applies, Qui facit per alium facit per se.⁷

³ A chief example of this is in the case of shipmasters. See below.

Gilman v Robinson, ibid. 226, was a case of the same complexion, disposed of in the same way under Chief Justice Best's direction. [Add. on Cont. 6th ed. 606.]

⁶ Courteen v Touse, 1 Camp. 43, n. a. It is said here to have been held by Lord Ellenborough, that although one had often signed policies for another, there being no evidence of a loss had on such policies, it was not sufficient. Yet there is some confusion about this case as stated by Campbell.

⁷ [The institorial power was held to render the granter

1. A wife is by the law held to be præposita rebus domesticis while she remains in family with her husband. Things furnished on her order, within the range of domestic use, and proper for a family, are held as ordered by the husband. He is liable for the price as the sole debtor, although the articles may have been misapplied, or although he may have given to the wife money to provide them.¹ The presumption of this authority ceases, 1. Where the wife leaves her husband's family, and takes up her residence elsewhere;² and, 2. By the husband publicly depriving her of the administration by means of inhibition.³

Whoever is de facto at the head of the family, and in the management of the domestic establishment, is held as præposita.⁴

² Even in this case, however, the husband is liable for the wife's necessities, if he has not furnished her with the means of providing them; and for the expense of law proceedings between them to the dissolution of the marriage. Harman v M'Alister's Trs., 6 July 1826, 4 S. 799, N. E. 806. This does not, however, depend on præpositura; but the husband is liable to these as proper burdens on the common stock under his administration. [James v Downie, 1837, 15 S. 1151.]

⁴ See Hamilton v Forrester, 1825, 3 S. 572, N. E. 394.

⁵ [With regard to the constitution of mandate or agency, tacitly and by implication, prior to or simultaneously with the agent's actings (the question as to its creation by ratification being alluded to afterwards), the broad principle is, that whenever one man, to the knowledge of another, transacts any business belonging to that other, as for him and in his place, there intervenes, by that very fact, without more, a contract of mandate between them, whereby the latter charges the former with that business, and from which all the consequences of an express mandate shall ensue on both sides. (Poth. Mand. sec. 29.) The rule of the civil law is: 'Semper qui non prohibet aliquam pro se intervenire mandare creditur' (D. de Reg. Jur. 60; Mand. l. 6, sec. 2, l. 18, l. 53). Not only the appointment, but the extent of the authority conferred, at least in a question with third parties, is ordinarily ascertained by the acquiescence and recognition by the principal of acts so permitted to be done in the character of his agent. See Prescott v Flinn, 9 Bing. 19; Davidson v Stanley, 2 M. and G. 721; Levy v Pyne, Car. and Marsh. 453; Hazard v Treadwell, 1 Str. 506; Summers v Solomon, 26 L. J. Q. B. 301; Pickering v Busk, 15 East 38. If one is repeatedly employed to do certain things, any one dealing with the person thus usually employed is justified in believing him authorized to do those things with the assent and approbation of the employer, and in the way in which he has hitherto done them, but not otherwise. (Watkins v Vruce, 2 Stark. 368; Brockelbank v Sugrue, 5 C. and P. 21; Haughton v Ewbank, 4 Camp. 88.) Thus, if a servant is usually employed to buy, but always for cash, this implies no authority to buy on credit. (Rusby v Scarlett, 5 Esp. 75; Flemyng v Hector, 2 M. and W. 181—per Abinger, C. B.) And wherever one regularly or repeatedly employs another to act for him in a specific character or capacity, or in a department of business to which certain powers are by usage always incident, the employer shall be taken to have given him authority to exercise those powers in any question with a third party ignorant of any limitation. The distinction between a general and a special agent, or a general and a special authority, is said by Lord Ellenborough, in Whitehead v Tuckett, 15 East 399, to turn upon this, that a general authority imports not an unqualified authority, but that which is derived from a multitude of instances, whereas a particular or special authority is confined to an individual instance. In that case, Sill & Co. were, it is said, general agents; for they had bought and sold, in a multitude of instances, in their own names, paid and received money in their own names, and blended their accounts of receipts and payments, without carrying each order to a separate account with the defendant; and although there was a communication between them and the defendant as to the price and time of sale, yet the world was not privy to the communication, and had no means of knowing that their general authority was controlled by the interposition of any check. In other authorities the distinction is made to turn on this, that a general agent is one who is appointed to transact business of a specific kind, or to act in a specific capacity, which usually requires, and has conceded to it by employers, certain powers in the agent; so that third parties dealing with the agent in that sphere of business, or in that capacity, are entitled, unless they have notice of any particular limitations, to suppose, without special inquiry into the actual limits of his authority, that he has the powers usually incident to such an agency. (Paley, by Lloyd, pp. 136, 199, note; Parsons, El. Merc. Law, 135; Story on Agency, secs. 17-22, 73, 126-133; Smith, Merc. Law, p. 128.) The importance of clearly understanding the distinction, if one can, lies in this, that while it is said that a person dealing with a special agent must inquire, at his peril, into the actual authority given to the agent, and is bound by the limitations placed by the principal on the agent's powers, a person dealing with a general agent 'cannot,' it is said, 'be limited by any private order or direction not known to the party dealing with him.' It rather appears, however, that too much has ments for sale or purchase. And the principle of this remedy has been adopted in the law been made of a distinction the precise line of which it is impossible in practice always to discern or follow; and there seems to be a tendency among writers on the subject to push the doctrine laid down as to general agency a great deal too far—so far, indeed, that if the courts were to give full swing to the principles laid down, they would go far to endanger in a serious degree the security and safety of transactions conducted through agents, and to make the employment of them at all a snare to the employer. The doctrine, however, as laid down in Story on Agency, secs. 126 to 131; in Smith on Merc. Law, 128; and in Paley, 136, has been materially shaken by the observations made in Baines v Euing (35 L. J. Ex. 194) in reference to these and similar passages in other writers; and, indeed, Mr. Story himself (sec. 73, and note to sec. 127) seems to have felt that the distinction was not satisfactory, nor even very useful, except in certain cases. He observes (note to sec. 127, and sec. 73) that there is but one general principle which pervades all cases on the subject, whether the party be a general or a special agent; and it is this: that the principal is bound by all acts of his agent within the scope of the authority which he holds him out to the world to possess, although he may have given him more limited private instructions, unknown to the person dealing with him. He adds: 'This is founded on the doctrine, that where one of two persons must suffer by the act of a third person, he who has held that person out as worthy of trust and confidence, and having authority in that matter, shall be bound by it. It will at once be perceived that this doctrine is equally applicable to all cases of agency, whether it be the case of a general or of a special agency.' This general maxim has often been applied to questions of agency, as per Holt, C. J., in Hern v Nichols, 1 Salk. 289; and per Buller, J., in Fitzherbert v Mather, 1 T. R. 12, 16, both referred to by Story, l.c. And if it be properly understood, and applied with the requisite limitations, no objection can be taken. But there is always a danger, in attempting to condense a department of legal doctrine into the compass of a maxim, of leaving out the limitations of the doctrine; and errors are perpetrated in name of the maxim which are not countenanced by the full doctrine, of which it is the imperfect compendium. The maxim in question appears to be merely such a summary of the doctrine of estoppel. Its inadequacy to the solution of questions of agency, unless under conditions which appear just to be the regulative conditions of the doctrine of estoppel, was pointed out by Abbott, C. J., and Bayley and Holroyd, JJ., in Baring v Corrie (2 B. and Ald. 137). In cases where the maxim is sought to be made use of, the question is often put as merely one arising between two innocent parties, each contending de damno evitando; and then it is said, that as one of the two must suffer by the fraud of the agent, or his assumption of an authority which he did not possess, it is just that the principal who selected and employed him, and trusted him, and held him out as a person worthy of trust and confidence, ought to suffer, as it was his employment of the agent that enabled him to commit the fraud, or put him in a position where he had the opportunity of assuming authority. There is no sound legal principle warranting this way of applying the maxim, which would just lead to the result that in no case whatever can the loss fall on a party dealing with the agent,—a result tantamount to a reductio ad absurdum. The only ground of liability, on the part of a principal, to third parties dealing with an agent, for the acts of the agent done in excess of the powers given him, and which he would be held to have even in a question between himself and the principal, is such culpa or quasi culpa on the principal's part as would be a relevant ground for the plea of estoppel against his pleading the actual terms of the authority given to the agent. Where the principal by his words or conduct witfully causes another to believe the existence of certain powers in the agent, and induces him to deal with the agent on that belief; where the principal has, by words or by conduct, made a representation to another as to the agent's authority, in order to induce others to act upon it; where the representation or conduct complained of, whether active or passive in its character, has been intended to bring about the result, whereby the other dealing with the agent has altered his position to his loss;—in such a case, and in such a case alone, will the doctrine of estoppel apply to bar the principal from pleading against the third party the terms of the real authority which he gave to the agent. Mere negligence, although it may have afforded the agent an opportunity for the undue assumption of authority, or the perpetration of a fraud by which a third party has been damnified, is not of itself a ground of estoppel. See Pickard v Sears, 6 Ad. and El. 469; West v Jones, 20 Jur. Ch. 363; Swan v North British Australasian Co., 32 L. J. Ex. 273–279; Haines v East India Co., 11 Moore P. C. 57; Piggott v Stratton, 29 L. J. Ch. 9; M'Cance v London and North-Western Railway Co., 34 L. J. Ex. 39; Smith's L. C. vol. 2, notes to Doe v Oliver; Parsons' Contr. ii. 792–800, and cases in notes; More's Lectures, ii. 265–6. If Mr Story's principle be understood with these qualifications as to what is meant by 'holding the agent out,' viz. as possessing certain powers, not merely as generally worthy of trust and confidence, it seems that it does afford a criterion equally applicable to all cases of agency, whether general or special; and if so, the importance of the distinction between general and special agency becomes very much diminished. No principal can be held, by merely appointing one as his agent, to guarantee the world against any undue assumption of powers on his part, or fraudulent abuse of the opportunities his agency may give him for deceiving others; and if, without any culpa creating a ground of estoppel against the principal's pleading the actual extent of the agent's authority, damage has accrued to a third party by the agent's assumption of authority or abuse of his position, the loss must fall upon the party dealing with him. See Grant v Norway, 10 C. B. 665; Hubbersty v Ward, 6 Ex. 330; Coleman v Riches, 16 C. B. 104; Mechanics Bank v New York and New Hampshire Railway Co., cited in Parsons' Contr. i. 46. Where no positive blame of this nature can be attached to the principal, as misleading the public, the loss by an agent's fraud or abuse of his position, arising to those dealing with him, must fall on them, on the ground that, by not inquiring into the extent of his powers, they trust his veracity and honesty at their own peril, not at the principal's. See Baring v Corrie, supra, and the observations of Bramwell, B., in Baines v Euing, supra, and of the Lord Chancellor in Barber v Meyerstein, L. R. 4 H. L. 317. Care must be taken to distinguish between the agent's autho- of Scotland. In England also, in the same class of cases, a general authority seems to be ity to do a thing, as to accept a bill or conclude a charter-party; and the purposes for which he may abuse the powers of drawing the bill, or the improper means he may adopt for inducing the contract. Where the power to do the act is conceded, the misapplication of it to improper purposes, or the accomplishment of it by improper means, of which the third party dealing with the agent has no notice, will not make the act done, in virtue of the principal's authority, any the less his proprium negotium, than if the same act had been done for a proper purpose, or by means lawful or specially authorized by the principal. (Story, sec. 73.)

An agency may be confirmed and established, and its powers extended, or it may even be entirely created, by subsequent adoption and ratification on the part of the principal, according to the rule, Omnis ratihabitio retrotrahitur et mandato priori æquiparatur. (Coke, Litt. 207, a; Poth. Oblig. n. 75; Dig. 50. 17. 60, 46. 3. 12. 4.) The act of ratification draws back, and is treated throughout as if the transaction had been originally authorized: and this not only between the principal and unauthorized agent, in which case it operates not only to give authority where there was none, but to condone all misconduct and deviations from the limits of any mandate actually given; but, as a general rule, it also operates between the principal and third parties who have dealt with the agent, as if it had been an authority given him antecedent to the transaction. The ratification binds the principal, whether it be to his detriment or advantage, whether the act ratified be a writ or a contract; and once deliberately made, it cannot be recalled. Hagedorn v Oliverson, 2 M. and S. 485; Lucena v Crawford, 5 B. and P. 269; Taylor v Plumer, 3 M. and S. 562-580; Bird v Brown, 4 Ex. 786; Routh v Thompson, 13 East 274. But there are several conditions necessary, in order that ratification should have this effect. (1.) The principal must have full knowledge of all the material facts, otherwise ratification will not be equivalent to a mandate by him; and that whether his want of knowledge arise from designed concealment or misrepresentation by the agent, or from his inadvertence. In Horsfall v Fauntleroy, 10 B. and C. 755, where the agent stated, and the principal bona fide adopted a different contract from that really made, and on which the action was laid, the plaintiff failed in his action. Davidson v Stanley, 2 M. and G. 721; Story, sec. 243. (2.) For ratification to avail, the act must have been done by one purporting to act as agent of the principal, or by an assumed authority as from him. Saunderson v Griffiths, 5 B. and C. 909; Wilson v Tumman, 6 M. and G. 242; Vere v Ashby, 10 B. and C. 288; Barber v Gingell, 3 Esp. 60; Lucena v Crawford, 1 Taunt. 325; Leake, Contr. p. 269; Story, sec. 242; Pars. El. Merc. Law, p. 137. One cannot adopt as his own act what was not meant nor pretended to be done by his authority, or for his behoof as principal. But the subsequent ratification is in some cases equivalent to prior authority, where the agent professes to act for persons filling a certain character, though the actual persons are not then ascertained, or are not then known to him. (Foster v Bates, 12 M. and W. 226; Hill v Pickergill, 1 Brod. and Bingh. 282.) Thus an administrator, after taking out letters of administration, may ratify a contract made before the letters were taken out by an agent acting avowedly on account of the estate of the intestate. Nor in this case does the objection (infra, (3.)) apply, that this particular administrator could not himself have legally made the contract at the time it was made; for the vacant succession sustinet personam defuncti; and it was on its account the contract was made, and the representative of the defunct confirmed it. (See Poth. Negot. Gest. No. 174, Oblig. No. 126.) And upon the same principle, a policy of insurance may be effected in respect of the interest of persons who could not be named at the time, provided they are such as were contemplated at the time of making the policy, and intended to come within it. (Watson v Swann—per Erle, C. J.—11 C. B. N. S. 756-769; Lucena v Crawford; Routh v Thompson, supra.) But where a broker, having effected a general policy with the defendant on goods 'to be valued and declared as interest might appear,' and having afterwards received an order from the plaintiff to insure certain goods for him, endorsed a declaration of the plaintiff's goods on the policy, it was held that the plaintiff could not sue on that policy, because it had not been made with him, nor on his behalf, and was not intended at the time it was made to be applied on his behalf (Watson v Swann, supra). And in Saunderson v Griffiths (5 B. and C. 909), where a written agreement had been made, purporting to be between an agent on behalf of plaintiff's wife and the defendant, it was held that plaintiff was not entitled to ratify the agreement, and join his wife in suing on it; for, as Holroyd, J., put it, 'If the agent, at the time when he made the agreement, had professed to have authority to act for the husband, then the subsequent ratification would have been a recognition of the authority which the agent assumed to have when he made the agreement; but here the husband never previously authorized the agent, nor is he named as the party for whom the latter professed to act.' So, in Vere v Ashby, 10 B. and C. 288, 298, Parke, B., said: 'The rule as to ratification applies only to the acts of one who professes to act as the agent of a person who afterwards ratifies.' (3.) It has been held that the act of ratification must, in questions with third parties, take place at a time and under circumstances where the ratifying party could himself have lawfully and effectually done the act as principal. (Bird v Brown, 4 Ex. 786. See Parsons, El. M. L. 139; Story, Jr., on Sale, sec. 324, sec. 77, and note.) In Bird v Brown a stoppage in transitu, without authority from the seller, was made by defendant. After the transitus was ended, but not before, the seller ratified what defendant had done. From that time the stoppage was the seller's act, but it was then too late for him to stop. The goods had been received by the purchasers, and had vested in them free of any authorized stoppage; and the Court refused to hold that the ratification could draw back over the mid-impediment created by the right they had acquired by obtaining possession, so as to place the parties' rights in the same position as if the stoppage had been authorized from the beginning. See Hutchings v Nunez, 1 Moore P. C. N. S. 243, but see contra, Bird v Brown; Newhall v Vargas, 13 Maine (Amer.) 93. There is a series of American cases cited by Mr. Story, Jr., sec. 77, notes, in which it has been decided that the principal cannot, by the subsequent ratification of the unauthorized act of one professing to be his agent, affect any right of a third party, which has attached between the act and the ratification. Though, as a general rule, the ratification draws back with conferred, as contradistinguished from a limited. Under this rule, in Scotland, are included complete retroactive efficacy; still, as between the principal and third parties, this is not always so where the unauthorized act afterwards ratified is one which, if authorized originally, would have created an immediate duty or obligation on the part of the third party, or made him immediately liable to any burden or charge, or have supported an action of damages against him. The ratification will not draw back to the date of the act, so as to validate it as the foundation of such claim or charge against the third person, if the agent's act—supposing it done only as of the date of ratification—would not then have created such claim or charge; nor will it draw back, as we have said, if the allowing it a retroactive efficacy would operate to defeat any right or interest which has vested in a third party in absence of any authorized interference on behalf of the principal, even though the principal's interference in time would have prevented such right or interest from vesting. Thus, when a lease was to determine on six months' notice, and notice was given as for the landlord six months before, but by a person who had no authority to do so, the subsequent adoption and ratification by the landlord of that notice will not draw back to defeat the tenant's right to remain for another term, acquired by his not having got notice to quit from the landlord in time. The tenant was entitled to notice on which he could have acted with certainty at the time he received it. (Right d. Fisher v Cuthill, 5 East 491; Doe d. Mann v Walters, 10 B. and C. 626; Doe d. Lyster v Goldwin, 2 Ad. and Ellis 143.) So, a demand for delivery of property on which to found an action of trover, and necessary to make out a case of wrongful conversion of the property, being made by an unauthorized person in name of the plaintiff, is not validated by the plaintiff's bringing his action on that demand, and adopting it as his own act; nor would a refusal to pay money on such unauthorized demand be construed as a refusal made to the creditor subsequently ratifying it, to the effect of preventing the defender from relying on a tender of the debt to the creditor between the demand and the ratification. Payment to an unauthorized demandant would not have discharged the debt, and the debtor was not bound to risk the chance of doing so. (Coore v Callaway, 1 Esp. 115; Coles v Bell, 1 Camp. 478; Solomons v Dawes, 1 Esp. 73.) So, timeous notice of the dishonour of a bill by a stranger, not a party to it, and not then authorized thereto, would not be good notice to bind a party to whom the holder is bound to give notice, and who, by non-receipt of notice at a given date, is liberated from liability. The adoption of the act out of due time will not draw back to validate the notice as at its date, so as to defeat the discharge from liability acquired in the interim by the debtor. (Story, Agency, sec. 247.) It is said, however, that there is a distinction as to ratification between an act the effect of which, if authorized, would be to create an immediate duty to be performed by the third person, on whom it operates, and liability for the breach thereof, and an act merely intended to assert on behalf of the principal some previously existing claim or right of the principal's, the assertion of which may be beneficial to him, without creating any immediate obligation, charge, or claim of damage against a third party. In this case it is said he is entitled to adopt the act, and to have his adoption drawn back for his benefit, as e.g. in the case where an unauthorized agent has kept up on his behalf a continual claim, merely preventing a right of his from lapsing, or has, on his behalf as landlord, made an entry on lands for condition broken by the tenant. But the principle of the distinction is not very clear. (Story, Agency, secs. 245-6.) Mr. Story says that the retroactive effect of ratification is allowed only in cases where the conduct of the third party on whom it is to operate cannot in the meantime depend on whether there be a ratification or not, illustrating the distinction by the case of a tenant receiving an unauthorized notice to quit, the tenant's action on receipt of which would depend entirely on whether it is or can be made a valid notice or not; while in the case of an entry on the principal's behalf, without authority, for conditions already broken by the tenant, the question is not as to any future act to be performed by the tenant, but as to a breach already committed at the time of the entry. The position of the principal, as having an election whether he will adopt the unauthorized act or not, is one which obviously gives him an advantage over the third party with whom the unauthorized agent has dealt, as the principal may ratify if that would be for his own benefit, or disavow if adoption would be to his disadvantage. Yet that element of unequal advantage, where the uncertainty of ratification has not left the third party uncertain as to his course of conduct in the meantime, has never been allowed to interfere with ratihabition. Thus in Hagedorn v Oliverson and Routh v Thompson, supra, it was held no defence by the insurers that the policy had only been ratified after the loss, and that the shipowner would not have been bound to adopt the contract or pay the premium if the ship had arrived in safety. For the underwriters had their claim on the agent for the premium; and if he had paid it, he could not have recovered it on the ground of having had no authority to insure, or of no interest having been insured by reason of the owner's refusal to adopt the insurance, for the owner had always the choice at any time of adopting the contract and saddling the underwriters with the risks (see Bayley, J., in Routh v Thompson; Parsons' El. M. L. p. 436, note). (4.) The ratification by the principal cannot be partial: he cannot ratify in part and repudiate in part, but must adopt the whole or none; and the ratification of a part being proved, establishes the whole transaction (Thompson v Carrington, 9 B. and C. 59); and once deliberately made, a ratification is eo instanti obligatory and irrevocable (Smith v Cologan, 2 T. R. 189, note; Paley, by Lloyd, 115, 172, 324, 331). Next, what amounts to ratification? Not only express, but implied confirmation, deduced from the acts or proceedings of the principal; and these will be construed liberally in favour of an adoption of the acts of the agent, and a small matter will be evidence of the principal's assent. (1 Livermore, Law of Principal and Agent, 394; Story, Ag. sec. 253; Paley, p. 171.) Generally, wherever one receives and holds a beneficial result of the act of another as his agent, he shall be held to have ratified the agency. Thus, if an agent sell goods below the price authorized, and send account sales to the principal, who draws for the balance due on account sales, that is ratification. So, if the principal were to sue the agent for the money received by him on such a sale, and not for damages, that would be ratification of the sale (Wilson v Poulter, 2 Str. 859; Billen v

VOL. I.

the superintendents of shops, manufactories, farms, banks, and all similar establishments for commercial purposes.¹

1. A clerk or shopman, having the management of the shop, is institor or præpositus, sells and receives the price, or buys articles in the course of the trade, so as to bind his master.²

2. A woman managing the shop of her husband, or keeping a shop herself, with his permission, is likewise institor; and for her contracts the husband is liable actione institoria.³

3. The manager of a bank, the officers placed there to deal with the public, or the agent managing a branch of the banking business at a distance from the head establishment, are all institors by whose acts the bank is bound. In this case, however, particular attention is necessary to avoid stretching this implied authority too far, considering the peculiar dangers attending money transactions, the precaution of the law in requiring written proofs as evidence of payment in money, and the very particular regulations and checks under which

Hyde, 1 Atk. 128; Hovil v Pack, 7 East 164. But see Hunter v Prinsep, 10 East 378, where a master, having sold cargo, the owner brought against the purchaser an action not on the contract, but for money had and received to his use. This form of action was held not to be an affirmation of the master's sale. Paley, p. 146, note; Cornwall v Wilson, 1 Vesey 509; Taylor v Plumer, 3 M. and S. 562; Parsons' El. M. L. 137, and notes; and acquiescence without objection, and even silence, frequently raises a conclusive presumption of ratification. If one, knowing that another has acted or is acting as his agent, does not disavow the agency as soon as he conveniently can, but lies by and permits another to go on dealing with the supposed agent, or to lose an opportunity of indemnifying himself, this is an adoption and confirmation of the acts of the agent. (Poth. Mand. No. 29; D. de Reg. Jur. 60; 1 Livermore, 49, 396, citing Decis. Rotæ Genuæ, 24, n. 4, 147, n. 4; Pars. El. M. L. 138, and American cases there; Emerigon, i. 145, case decided by himself, and authorities there; D. xiv. 6. 16; Cujacius ad l. 59 pen. D. Mand.; Story, Ag. 258.) If an agent makes a contract, and his principal ratifies it, he thereby ratifies the agent's representations made at the time of the sale, and in relation to it, and is bound by them. (So held by Story, J. in Doggett v Emerson, 3 Story 700. See Udell v Atherton, and cases cited ante, p. 469, note.) With regard to frauds and fraudulent misrepresentations by the agents of an incorporated company, the authorities seem to be somewhat contradictory. Any representations made by the agents of a company, which form the foundation of a contract between that company and a third person—these misrepresentations lying at the root of a contract—will entitle the other party to avoid the contract; and the company must in that case take upon themselves the consequences of the misrepresentations of their agents. (Henderson v Lacon—per Wood, V.-C.—Law R., 5 Eq. 261.) But in The Western Bank of Scotland v Addie (L. R., 1 H. L. Sc. App. 145) the following principles were laid down by Lords Chelmsford and Cranworth:—A company cannot retain any benefit which they have obtained through the fraud of their agents, but they may be made responsible at law for the frauds of those agents to the extent to which they have profited from them; and the fact that the complainant is himself a member of the company whose agents had committed the fraud, would not be a valid objection to his suit in equity for a rescinding of his contract to take shares. A person so defrauded, however, cannot bring an action for deceit against the company; and if he wishes to pursue the remedy, he must bring his action against those who were guilty of the fraud personally. Their Lordships seem to have thought that if the company had made no profit, the party deceived would be without remedy against the company, and they seem also to have thought that the proper form of action would be for money had and received (pp. 158, 167). See, however, Barwick v The English Joint-stock Bank (L. R., 2 Ex. 259), where the Court of Exchequer Chamber held that a company would be liable for the fraudulent misrepresentations of their agent, as in general a principal is liable for the torts of his agent acting in the course of his employment. The Court also held that such misrepresentation would be properly described in common law pleading as the misrepresentation of the company. Willes, J., when delivering the judgment of the Court, seemed to think that an action for deceit would be still more appropriate than one for money had and received. The opinions of the common law judges thus appear in direct conflict with those of Lords Chelmsford and Cranworth in Addie's case, and of Lord Westbury in New Brunswick Ry. Co. v Conybeare (9 H. L. Ca. 711). As no part of the decision in the House of Lords, however, necessarily involves a principle inconsistent with the ruling in Barwick's case (which is distinctly in point with the question whether a company is bound by the misrepresentations of its agents or directors), the latter decision may fairly be regarded as a safer guide to the law on this point than the dicta in Addie's case.]

² [Where the authority is denied by the master, the contracting party may prove it by circumstantial evidence. E. of Galloway v Grant, 1857, 19 D. 865. Special authority must be proved with respect to transactions out of the ordinary course of business, e.g. borrowing money without security. Woodrow & Son v Wright, 1861, 24 D. 31. It has been held that an authority granted to a managing clerk to issue delivery orders for goods in the course of business, did not make the employer responsible for orders fraudulently issued, and not for value. Colvin v Dixon, 1867, 5 Macph. 603.]

banks always place their officers, especially in regard to their power of receiving money so as to charge the bank. When this question first occurred, the Court of Session applied the strict rules of the actio institoria, without any very critical examination of the vouchers on which money was paid into the hands of the bank agent. Taking his official place and station, as institor of the bank, to imply sufficient authority as a general agent to receive money for his principal, they held the bank chargeable with money so received.¹ On the next occasion on which the question arose, the Court at first viewed the matter differently, and held the bank chargeable only where the powers delegated to the agent were correctly exercised. But afterwards nearly the same views prevailed as in the former case.² On appeal to the House of Lords, a doctrine considerably different was applied to this [481] class of cases. The notion of a general agency or implied authority, as in the actio institoria, was rejected; and the case of a bank agent placed on the footing of a limited agency, like any other limited mercantile agent or factor, his power being measured by his commission, and his principals no otherwise chargeable than as the authority granted to the agent gave him power to bind them.³ And it is a strong confirmation of this view, that in all bank transactions, being dealings in money, the law requires correct written evidence, the terms and import of which the party must be bound to examine.⁴

IV. TRAVELLING AGENTS.—Another case, in which it is sometimes contended that there is an implied power, somewhat of the nature of the institorial, is where a mercantile or manufacturing house employs a RIDER or TRAVELLER to receive their debts, and take orders to be executed by the principal. The authority of such a person may depend either on the instructions which he receives, or on the custom of the trade, or on the extent to which his exercise of authority has been recognised. In general, it appears that a riding or travelling agent has not only authority to receive payment for his principal of the moneys due to him, but to take orders by which the principal shall be bound as much as if he himself had accepted and bound the contract.⁵

² Watson v Bank of Scotland, 1806, M. App. Mandate, No. 3. The Bank of Scotland had a branch at Brechin, under the management of James Smith & Sons as their agents. The place of business was in a room, over the door of which was painted, 'The Bank of Scotland's Office.' Receipts for money paid to the bank were engraved with blanks for sums and dates, and were signed 'James Smith & Son, agents for the Bank of Scotland.' The agents did much business, and in particular discounted bills, and as bankers received deposits of money on their own account. They transacted their business in the bank office, and they gave notes for sums deposited, engraved as the bank receipts were, dated 'Bank Office,' and signed 'James Smith & Sons.' Watson placed £60 in the bank, and received a receipt of the latter description; and on the failure of Smith & Sons, raised an action for the money as deposited with the bank. The Court found the bank liable for the contents of the receipt, chiefly on the ground 'that it would be of dangerous consequence to the public, as well as contrary to the implied nature of such a business, if banks were not answerable for the transactions at their known office by the clerks and servants employed by them in the common operations of banking.'

³ Bank of Scotland v Watson, H. L., 26 March 1813, 1 Dow 40. The Lord Chancellor said: 'There was nothing peculiar that he knew in bank agency to take it out of the rule that the agent could not bind his principal beyond the limits of his authority. The Chief Justice Ellenborough had sat at the table at the hearing of the case, and had observed that if it had come before him, it would not have occupied more than ten minutes. There were a variety of considerations and circumstances stated to raise a presumption in favour of the respondent, but all of them appeared to him insufficient to show that this was an instrument by which the bank could be bound.' Lord Redesdale concurred in this opinion. [See also Normand v Macartney, 1823, 2 S. 404; Craw v Commercial Bank, 1840, 3 D. 193; Chanter v Borthwick, 1848, 10 D. 1544; National Bank v Martin, 1848, 11 D. 1.]

3. Commission and Diligence Prestable.

This contract, while it partakes of the contract of mandate, in so far as it involves a delegation of power, may be classed with locatio conductio, in so far as the skill, labour, and attention of the factor, agent, or broker, are purchased by the payment of a hire or commission. This commission is regulated either by stipulation or by usage. In England, the rate of brokerage is in some cases settled by statute; and it is enacted by the 12 Anne, statute 2, c. 16, which applies to Scotland (in the second section), that the rate of brokerage for procuring a loan of money shall be limited to 5s. for £100, under the penalty of £20.¹ It is by the effects dependent on this admixture that the modern contract of commission or factory is contradistinguished from the mandate of the civil law.

The diligence prestable by a proper mandatory, as understood in Scottish jurisprudence to be grounded on the equity of the Roman law, is only for his actual intromissions, and such diligence as he employs in his own affairs.² But the diligence implied in the onerous [482] office of a mercantile factor, agent, or broker, is that of a prudent man in managing his own affairs.³

Besides the ordinary commission, there is frequently stipulated a commission del credere, the responsibility under which has already been considered.⁴

4. Extent of Authority.

In all those cases in which there is not a general authority implied, as in the case of institors and others already treated of,⁵ the extent of a factor's authority and his powers are to be gathered from the mandate under which he acts.

1. If the mandate be general, it is to be construed according to its object, as implying all powers within the scope of the employment;⁶ if limited, it is to be executed strictly according to its terms.⁷

2.⁸ Even a special agent's authority is held to include all the necessary or usual means of executing it with effect. Thus, if one authorize his agent to get a bill discounted, without restraining him as to the way of doing it, this is an authority to endorse it in the principal's name, so as to bind him.⁹ An order to send goods implies a power to load them generally, so as to bind both the goods and the principal for the freight.¹⁰

3. An agent or factor cannot, without express power, or power necessarily implied in principals. But they refused to execute it, as Milne had not settled the former dealing correctly. Milne immediately wrote that cash should be paid down, but his order was not answered. Harris, James, & Co. defended the action by Milne, on the ground that Milne's offer was not accepted by them. The Court held the rider to have authority to receive orders, and to bind his principal to the execution of them. Some of the judges held that this general rule must admit the exception of a refusal for sufficient cause, and the irregularity of the former dealing they held sufficient; but this did not prevail. See Telford v James, Wood, & James, 3 Shaw and Dunlop 167, N. E. 113.

² Ersk. iii. 3. 36.

Sir William Jones, in his Essay on the Law of Bailments, has placed the obligation to stricter diligence than seems to accord with a gratuitous contract on its fair principle; namely, that an undertaking to do an act may happen to infer a degree of diligence beyond responsibility for the mere violation of good faith (p. 53).

the circumstances, delegate his authority to another.¹ But delegation is sometimes necessarily implied. Thus, an order to an agent to recover a debt implies a power to delegate the execution of the necessary diligence to the proper officer; or to delegate to the agents necessary or fit to be employed before the courts to which resort must be had; and the natural consequence is, an implied guarantee by the agent so delegating his authority, of remuneration to persons who may be utterly ignorant of the credit of the principal.²

4. The construction of mercantile commissions is to be extended, restrained, qualified, and in general assisted by the usage of trade. Thus, it is the custom to sell goods upon credit, and an agent employed to sell without special restraint may follow that course; but as it is the custom to sell stock only for ready money, a factor is not, without special authority, empowered to dispose of it otherwise.³

5. Factor's Power to Pledge.

It has been much questioned, both on the Continent and in Great Britain, what [483] power a factor has to pledge the goods of his principal. In England, at common law, he had no such power. In Scotland, it has been decided that he has the power, to the effect of conferring on one who lends money on the security of the goods, an unexceptionable real right; or of raising to a sub-factor, or other person receiving the goods and advancing money on them, an effectual lien. And on this point the law of England has by statute been placed nearly on the footing of the law of Scotland.⁴

The doctrine of the law of Scotland on this subject may be reduced to the following propositions:—

1. Where a factor, having made advances on goods sent to him for sale, transfers to another the right of pledge or lien which he himself holds, the transfer is effectual. Even in England he is entitled to do this, provided he does it fairly and openly: for lien is not a mere jus incorporale, but is accompanied by possession of corporal subjects, and consists in the continuance of that possession. As the creditor to whom the lien is assigned holds only the qualified possession which his debtor was entitled to, his right, like that of the assignee to a liferent, expires with the original lien; but to this extent the security is as complete as the factor's own; that is to say, the creditor will be entitled to avail himself of the pledge to the extent of the balance due to the factor.⁵

2. Although at first it was held that a factor having goods in his possession could not pledge those goods, or receive advances on them, to the effect of constituting a lien available against the owner,⁶ yet this soon yielded to views of commercial expediency, first in

[Milne v M'Lean, 1825, 4 S. 46; Gordon v Sinclair, 1826, 4 S. 714.]

³ In Wiltshire v Sims, 1 Camp. 258, Lord Ellenborough applied this doctrine to a case where a broker having sold £500 of the stock of the Commercial Road, on a credit of fourteen days, by promissory note, the plaintiff, in an action to have the stock transferred, was nonsuited.

Mr. Justice Chambre lays down the law thus: 'There is no doubt of the authority of a factor to sell upon credit, though not particularly authorized by the terms of his commission so to do. Houghton v Mathews, 3 Bos. and Pull. 489; Scott v

Surman, Willes 407, S. P. But this doctrine is founded on "the constant and daily experience, that factors do sell upon credit, without any special authority," and therefore confirms the general maxim, that when an agent is employed to do any act, he shall be supposed to have an authority to do it in the manner in which it is usually done. Goods are almost always, stock is scarcely ever, sold upon credit; and hence the distinction between the powers of the factor and the stockbroker. An agent can in no case bind his principal by any act beyond the scope of his authority. Fenn v Harrison, 3 Term. Rep. 757.' 1 Camp. 259, note.

⁶ Mitchell v Burnet & Mowat, 1746, M. 4498. The goods were Mitchell's, but were lodged in a warehouse at Campvere

a foreign case, in deference to the laws of Holland;¹ and afterwards it was held that a person holding goods in this country as factor for a trader abroad, could place those goods [484] with another, as his factor or consignee, and take advances on the security of them, to the effect of conferring an unexceptionable lien for the advances available against the true proprietor of the goods.²

3. Where a factor, however, places goods in the hands of another as factor, or for any in Holland by Sinclair. There they were arrested by creditors of Sinclair; and a competition arose between the arrestors and Burnet & Mowat, the owners of the warehouse, who alleged that the goods had been pledged to them by Sinclair for debt. The Court found the goods the property of Mitchell; and that the impignoration was neither proved, nor relevant to encumber Mitchell's property.

See next note.

² 1. Colquhoun v Findlay, Duff, & Co., 15 Nov. 1816, 19 Fac. Coll. 208, First Division. Twenty hogsheads of sugar were consigned by Mr. Colquhoun from the West Indies to H. Crawford to be sold. The invoice was directed to him, and the bill of lading deliverable to him or his order. Crawford employed Findlay, Duff, & Co. as brokers to sell the sugars; and he gave an order on the keeper of the bonded warehouse to deliver them to their order. Findlay, Duff, & Co. took the goods to be Crawford's, and made advances to him on the credit of them. The judgment of the Lord Ordinary, Alloway, 'finds, That by the bill of lading, the sugars in question appeared to be the sole property of Mr. Crawford: That upon the 20th September 1814, Mr. Crawford, by a regular invoice and order, desired the persons in whose warehouse the sugars were deposited, to deliver the same to the order of Messrs. Findlay, Duff, & Co.; and that from this period, when the said order was delivered, these persons continued to hold the sugars for behoof of Messrs. Findlay, Duff, and Co.: That the possession of the sugars being thus transferred by Mr. Crawford, apparently the unlimited proprietor, to the defenders, they were entitled either to sell the same, or to advance money to him on account of those sugars; and that having made advances to Mr. Crawford, bona fide, without ever having heard of the claim of the pursuer, who sent the sugars to Mr. Crawford, they are entitled to retain and apply the proceeds of those sugars to account of the advances made by them; and are only liable to account to the pursuer for any balance of the proceeds of the sugars which may be in their hands beyond the amount of these advances; and decerns.' The Court adhered. 'Per curiam, the transaction cannot be correctly considered as a pledge. The factor did not exceed his powers; besides, it is clear that a factor authorized to sell can effectually pledge the goods of his constituent. The English authorities on this point ought to have no weight.'

2. Ede & Bond v Findlay, Duff, & Co., 15 May 1818, 19 Fac. Coll. 509. In August 1814, Francis Garden & Sons, extensive West India merchants, had, as consignees and importers, thirty-nine hogsheads of sugar in the bond warehouse in their own name. They had thus an apparent ownership of those sugars; and having put them into the hands of Findlay, Duff, & Co., with power to sell, and given an order of delivery, which was duly intimated at the king's cellars, Findlay, Duff, & Co. advanced £1000 on the consignment. They afterwards sold them for £1500; and Garden & Sons becoming bankrupt, Ede & Bond of London claimed the proceeds, as being the proprietors of the goods which Garden & Sons had held merely as factors, with no authority to pledge. The Lord Ordinary found, 'that Findlay, Duff, & Co. were entitled to retain and apply the proceeds of the sugars to account of all advances made or obligations come under by them on the credit of these sugars.' To this judgment the Court adhered.

3. Johnson & Manley v Findlay, Duff, & Co., 13 Feb. 1818. This was a similar decision in circumstances nearly the same. The goods (coffee) had been entrusted to Garden Brothers & Co. as managing partners of a joint adventure. They consigned them to Findlay, Duff, & Co. to be sold. Large advances were made by Findlay, Duff, & Co. on the faith of this consignment. They insisted on a lien, both for those advances and for their general balance on transactions with Garden Brothers & Co. as their factors. Lord Pitmilley, as Ordinary, gave his 'opinion that the bill of lading of the coffee having been made out in the name of Garden Brothers & Co., and the coffee deposited in their names in the bond warehouse in Leith, the defenders, Findlay, Duff, & Co., were entitled, on receiving an unqualified order for delivery of the coffee from Garden Brothers & Co., to make advances to that company on the faith of the coffee thus delivered to and bona fide received by them.' But before pronouncing final judgment in the case, his Lordship ordered further discussion of the right to retain for the general balance.

4. Johnson v James Scott & Son, Nov. 14, 1818, 19 F. C. 561. Johnson, residing at Wakefield, was desirous of turning his capital to account; and having applied to Hickson, he helped him to purchase a cargo of deals for Leith. It came consigned to James Scott & Son from Hickman, though Johnson was the true owner; and the consignees knew nothing of Johnson's interest. Hickman being partner of a company whose acceptance had been discounted by James Scott & Son, he wrote to Scott & Son, that the company could not pay the bill, and desired Scott & Son to retire it, and take other purpose which in the case of his own goods would confer a lien for a general balance, the sub-factor, though ignorant of the true ownership of the goods, must, in so far as he has not made actual advances on the consignment, but claims only a general balance, take [485] the goods under the qualification of the limited right which the factor himself had in them.¹

But although these were the rules followed in Scotland, they had been established chiefly on grounds of public expediency, and from favour to commerce, though undoubtedly bottomed on a sound principle of law, by which property in moveables is presumed from possession. The same course was followed on the Continent; and against authorities of great weight, the bias of favour and encouragement to the free transfer of goods in trade had influenced the whole practical jurisprudence of the trading nations of Europe. The general rule of the civil law was, Nemo plus juris ad alium transferre potest quam ipse habet.² And under this general rule the power to pledge was absolutely denied.³ In France it was held that one could not pledge the property of another for his own debt.⁴ In Holland the same law was established.⁵ In Italy also this was held as law.⁶

But an abstract rule laid down in law books sometimes does not square with the actual business of life; and in favour of commerce a relaxation of the above rule was introduced, to the effect of allowing the possessors of moveables, and those otherwise in the apparent right of commodities, not only to sell, but to pledge them.⁷

reimbursement on the consigned cargo. They answered that they would take up the bill, and pass it to account of the consignment. No reply was made; and on Hickman's failure James Scott & Son had notice of Johnson's right. They claimed retention for the bill, and sent the balance to Hickman. The Court held James Scott & Son to have an effectual security for the advanced money, holding the application of the proceeds by order of the consignor to be an advance.

¹ Black & Co. v M'Call & Co., 22 June 1820. In this case sugars were bought by Thomson, Gibson, & Co., as agents or factors, for and to the use of a secret company or joint adventure of Thomson, Gibson, & Co., William Tennant, and Gibson and Duncan, and were placed in the hands of M'Call & Co. on a mere broker's commission, not as factors. They were the agents of Thomson, Gibson, & Co., and had so acted for them on a large commission for occasional advances. Of course in these circumstances M'Call & Co. made no advances on the faith of those sugars. But there being a considerable balance due to them on their account with Thomson, Gibson, & Co., and all the parties becoming bankrupt, M'Call & Co. claimed retention for their general balance against the creditors of the joint adventure. And so the question was, Whether they were entitled to exercise the same right for security of this balance, which by the above cases they would have had for advances on the goods? The Court drew the distinction clearly, and rejected the claim of lien on this principle, that either a factor may sell, or pledge, or make advances of money on the security of retention as a pledge; yet a sub-factor, whether he knew the true owner or not, can take, as a resulting security for his general balance, only such right as the primary factor has. This judgment was affirmed in the House of Lords. The affirmance cannot be taken as establishing the doctrine of the judgment in the Court of Session, but it does not invalidate it. The view taken in the House of Lords was, that without inquiring into the right of M'Call & Co., had they in this acted as proper factors, there was sufficient ground for affirming the judgment in the fact that the goods in question came into their hands not as factors, but on a brokerage commission, a character not entitling them to a lien.

The judgment was moved by Lord Gifford, 4 May 1824, 2 Sh. App. Ca. 188.

Casaregi reports a case decided by himself, of a valuable string of pearls delivered by a lady to Maranna, a jeweller, to be sold, which he pledged to his creditor to prevent his imprisonment. The pledge was held bad, and the plea rejected, that, as a public dealer in jewels, Maranna was a person from whom the free course of trade entitled the pledgee to take those pearls. Discursus de Commercio, 106, vol. i. p. 334.

The same doctrine seems also established by a decision of the Court at Genoa. Rot. Genuæ de Mercatura, etc. Decisiones, No. 199,—a book which Casaregi says, 'In causis mercantilibus maximæ est auctoritatis.' Disc. 36, sec. 3.

⁷ In Holland this exception is asserted by some authors, while it is denied by others.

Groenwegen, in his Tract de Leg. abrogatis et inusitatis in Hollandia, p. 56, says: 'Si quis rem sibi traditam aut commodatam citra formam mandati vendat, aut quovis modo alienet, moribus hodiernis adversus eum qui rem justo titulo et bona fide accepit actionem non habet rei dominus: aut si res non alienata sed tantum modo pignori data sit rei suæ vindicationem non habet nisi pignus luat.' This Van Leewin vehemently reprehends as not correct: 'Qua in re non admodum perspete judicasse mihi videtur Groenwegen' (p. 472). And speaking of a statute of Antwerp, to which that author refers, he says: 'Sed irrationabilis et odiosa mehercule hac in re est dicti statuti ratio in favorem forte mercaturæ ibidem

[486] In the inquiries ordered by Parliament concerning this matter, it was found that in foreign countries the rule of lien, as applied to moveable property, is, that 'possession constitutes title,' and that persons making advances of money upon such property are not required to inquire to whom it belongs, and are fully protected for the advances they make.¹

In England the law had towards the middle of the last century taken a bias against the direction which it had received both here and abroad, and which is said not to have accorded with the spirit of the former law, and indeed to have proceeded rather from an erroneous report than from the judgment of the case by which it had been supposed to be established. This was the case of PATERSON against TASH, tried before Chief Justice Lee, who is reported to have held, 'that though a factor had power to sell, and thereby bind his principal, yet he cannot bind or affect the property of the goods, by pledging them as a security for his own debt, though there is the formality of a bill of parcels and a receipt;' and so the jury found.² This doctrine appears to have been first shaken by the authority of Lord Eldon in 1800.³ But still the course of decisions proceeded against the right [487] implied in possession.⁴ The bad effects of this doctrine on trade were so much felt, that the House of Commons named a committee of inquiry, who, after very extensive investigations into the law and practice of trade both at home and abroad, were inclined to report, 'that if no easy mode suggested itself for the alteration of the law, so as to remove contra dispositionem juris communis introducti quod sane ultra ejusdem civitatis territorium extendi minime potest, quum vel alias statuta juris communis correctoria strictissimam accipiant interpretationem.'

In Italy, we have seen Casaregi deciding a case by the rule of law. But there are other cases reported by him, in which, on a very elaborate discussion, he gave full weight to the exception in mercantile law. The doctrine of an exception in favour of mercantile dealings he lays down in his 76th Dissertation, No. 4 et seq.; and in his Treatise, entitled Il Cambisto Istruito, c. 3, No. 43 et seq.; and in the introduction to his judgment in the case of Greenwood & Cooper, Disc. 124, No. 1 et seq. In that case, David Cayrel had consigned from D. Vais Nunez a cargo of sugar, which he impledged with Greenwood & Cooper for his own debt. Nunez claimed the goods by rei vindicatio as theirs. The Court of Leghorn decided in favour of Greenwood & Cooper; and Casaregi, in a court of appeal, affirmed the sentence. In explaining the grounds of his judgment, he says: 'In istis impropriis furtis vel rebus dolose ac fraudulenter extortis, favore libertatis publici commercii præmittere pro indubitabili regula oportet, talium rerum aut mercium dominum rei vindicationis actione illarum restitutionem minime prætere posse, nisi prius per eum persolvatur pretium vel pecunia mutuata vel quicquid aliud datum aut creditum restituatur illi cui respective venditæ, etc., dummodo hic de tempore venditionis, vel in solutum dationis vel hypothecæ aut hujusmodi nullam habuerit scientiam, rem aut mercem in eum perventam ad alios proprietatis ac dominii titulo spectare.'

In another case, where a trader at Ferrara had consigned a bale of silk for sale to a Florentine merchant, who pledged it for a loan of money, and afterwards sold the bale to a third person, under burden of paying the loan; the Florentine merchant failed, and a question arose between the owner and the pledgee for the price in the hands of the purchaser. Casaregi adjudged the case for the pledgee, on the same grounds with the above cases. Disc. 187. To the arguments of the owner Casaregi says: 'Attamen respondebam hac nullatenus procedere inter mercatores, quia de eorum universali stylo, aut consuetudine, contrarium servatur; et sic cum jure communi iste præcipuus stylus seu mercatorum mos prævalere debeat, ideo cessant omnes juris regulæ quæ desuper in contrarium allegantur vel allegari possunt.' And he proceeds to say, that he was not only satisfied that this was the constant usage of merchants, from his own long continued practice in such cases, but from careful inquiries he had made.

Ansaldus treats of this question in the general dissertation with which he concludes his excellent work, De Commercio et Mercatura, ed. of 1751, p. 371, and contends for a preference to mercantile usage over the rules of the common law, sec. 41 et seq.

the present inconvenience, consistent with other principles of our jurisprudence, it would not be unwise to adopt the principle of foreign laws, that "possession constitutes title," because, though your committee are aware that some frauds would be the consequence of such an alteration in the law, yet the great and almost universal benefit to be derived by trade from the removal of injurious restrictions, would so enormously overbalance the disadvantage as to render it of comparatively little importance.' It was thought better, on the whole, considerably to limit the remedy, and the statute of the 4 Geo. iv. c. 83 was the result.¹ But the words of this Act were not held adequately to reach the full extent of the evil, and therefore the Act of the 6 Geo. iv. c. 94 was passed; whereby, 1. Any person entrusted for consignment or sale with goods, wares, or merchandise, who shall have shipped them in his own name, or any one in whose name goods shall be shipped by another, shall be deemed the true owner, to entitle the consignee of such goods to a lien thereon for money, etc., advanced for the use of such person, as if he were the true owner; provided the consignee shall have no notice by the bill of lading or otherwise, at or before the time of advance, that such person is not the true owner, etc. 2. Persons entrusted and in possession of bills of lading, dock-warrant, warehousekeeper's certificate, etc., shall be deemed owners, so as to give validity to any contract for sale, in whole or in part, or for the deposit or pledge thereof as a security for money, etc.; provided there is no notice by the document, etc. 3. No one is to acquire by deposit, pledge, etc., of goods in the hands of an agent or factor, for any debts or demand previously due, any further or better right, title, or interest, than was possessed by such person so possessed and entrusted at the time of the pledge or deposit. 4. That all persons may contract and agree with factors, known to be such, to the effect of purchasing and paying for articles entrusted with and in possession of such factors, provided the agreement be in the ordinary course of trade, and that such person shall not at the time have notice of the factor's power to sell. 5. That goods may be taken in pledge from known agents, but only to the effect of acquiring such interest as the factor has. 6. That the true owner shall be entitled to follow and demand his goods in the hands of his agent, or of assignees in bankruptcy, on paying the advances secured upon them. 7. That agents fraudulently pledging the goods of their principals shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction subject to transportation not exceeding fourteen years. 8. But this not to apply to a case where the factor has impledged goods only to the amount of his own right over them, provided it be not for bills accepted but not paid.²

1. Persons in whose name goods shall be shipped shall be deemed the true owners to entitle the consignees to a lien thereon, in respect of their advances, or of money or negotiable securities received by the shipper, provided the consignees have no notice that the consignors are not the actual proprietors of such goods.

2. All persons may take goods or bills of lading in deposit or pledge from consignors, to the effect of acquiring only such right, and no more, than the consignee has.

3. The true owner shall have right to follow his goods, whether in the hands of his agent or of the assignees of the agent in bankruptcy, and to recover them upon paying advances secured upon them.

² [By 5 and 6 Vict. c. 39, the provisions of the last-mentioned Act are re-enacted, and in some respects extended to meet decisions in which, by the stringent constructions of the courts, cases supposed to be within the former statutes had been excluded. The most important of these decisions were: Evans v Trueman, 1 Moody and Ry. 10; Taylor v Kymer, 3 B. and Ad. 320; Fletcher v Heath, 7 B. and C. 517; Phillips v Huth, 6 M. and W. 572, 9 M. and W. 647; Bonzi v Stewart,

4 M. and G. 295. Thus, by sec. 1, the statutory powers are made applicable to the case of 'any agent who shall thereafter be entrusted with the possession of goods, or of the documents of title to goods;' and agreements under the powers of the statute are declared to be binding, 'notwithstanding the person claiming such pledge or lien may have had notice that the person with whom such contract or agreement is made is only an agent.' According to the English decisions, the word 'entrusted,' at the commencement of the enabling sections in these Acts, has a limiting signification. On the construction of sec. 4 of the Act of 6 Geo. iv., it was held that a wharfinger who received flour in that capacity, but without any authority to sell it, was not within the meaning of the words an 'agent entrusted with goods,' so as to be able to sell, although he was in the habit of doing business as a flour factor. Monk v Whittembury, 2 Barn. and Ad. 484; and see Phillips v Huth, 6 Mus. and W. 572; Hatfield v Phillips, 9 Mees. and W. 647. So in Lamb v Attenborough, 1 B. and Sm. 831, it was held that a clerk employed to do dock business, and who had been in the habit of holding and transferring documents of title, was not an agent or so entrusted with the documents as to be able to pledge them. In Hayman v

6. Termination of Factor's Powers.

[488] The subsistence and determination of a factor's powers have been supposed to depend on certain metaphysical distinctions. And in attempting to settle the principles by which questions of this sort are to be determined, it has been said on the one hand, that

Flewker, 13 C. B. N. S. 519, Mr. Justice Willes observed that the Act does not apply in the case of a mere servant or caretaker, or one who has possession for carriage, but not in order to sell. In that case, a picture dealer, whose ordinary business was not to sell pictures, but who was authorized to sell the particular pictures in controversy, was held to be an 'agent' entrusted with the goods under the Act, so as to validate a pledge of them by him. In Baines v Swainson (4 B. and S. 270, 32 L. J. Q. B. 281), the plaintiffs, cloth manufacturers, were informed by E, a factor and commission agent, that he could get them a customer for some of their goods, giving the name of Sykes as that of the intended purchaser. It is a common practice for manufacturers to send their goods to agents, who warehouse them and sell them in their own names. The plaintiffs sent the goods to E's warehouse to be 'perched,' and E was then to send them to Sykes. E's statements about Sykes were untrue, and he sold them to defendants, who purchased bona fide. It was held by Wightman and Crompton, JJ., that E was an agent entrusted with the goods within the Act, and the sale valid; and by Blackburn, J., that at any rate the question should be left to the jury to say whether or not the facts showed that E was such an agent, and whether the sale was in the ordinary course of business. Crompton and Blackburn, J., were of opinion that the agencies referred to are such as are mercantile only, and of persons who, as mercantile agents, would have to make sales in the ordinary course of business, as had been previously held by Wigram, V.-C., in Wood v Rowcliffe (6 Hare 183); not merely mercantile agencies to forward or keep, but agencies to sell, the goods in the ordinary course of business, and to receive payment. Blackburn, J., drew attention to the 4th section of the Act of Victoria, which says that an agent in possession of the goods 'shall be taken for the purposes of this Act to have been entrusted with them by the owner, unless the contrary can be shown in evidence;' and added: 'I do not think that the mere fact of an agent having possession of the goods, although they have been handed to him by the owner knowing that he carries on such a business, amounts to an "entrusting" him as agent, though I think that under the 4th section of 5 and 6 Vict. c. 39, to which I have called attention, the fact that he had given them to the agent is a fact calling upon him to give a satisfactory explanation, and to show that it was not an entrusting. I do not think that the mere fact that the agent was in possession, and that possession was given by the owner, amounts to an entrusting. There are cases in which the goods might come to a known agent from having been lent to him, or from being pledged or hired, or in fifty other ways; but I do not think that would be an entrusting, independent of authority to pledge or sell.' After alluding to Monk v Whittembury, he then adds: 'It seems to me, therefore, that the question to be determined is whether the goods came from the owner to E as a branch of that agency, which in the ordinary course of business would be to sell goods belonging to others, and receive payment for them.' In Fuentes v Montes, infra, Willes, J., expressed an opinion, that in holding E to be an agent in the sense of the Act, the Court of Queen's Bench had in Swainson's case carried the law to its utmost stretch. But he deliberately adopted the construction put by Blackburn, J., on the words at the end of the 4th section, above quoted, which attributed to these words the effect of enabling the owner to set aside a sale or pledge if he could succeed in disproving an ostensible entrusting in the character of an agent for sale. The language of the learned judge is: 'In the case of an agent for sale, whose general business it is to sell, being entrusted for a purpose other than sale,—as, for instance, if he were entrusted upon an advance against the goods, but with directions not to sell, being a mere lender, and upon his pledge of them; or, if he happen to have a warehouse, though his general business was that of a factor, and not that of a warehouseman, and on the particular occasion the goods were put in his warehouse at a rent,—in both cases he would be a person who prima facie would be justified in dealing with goods under the Factors Acts. And yet there is an express provision with respect to such a person, that he shall only be prima facie in the situation of being able to deal with the principal's goods more generally than the principal has authorized him; that the principal, on proving the true nature of the transaction between them, should be able to rebut the presumption of his enlarged authority under the Factors Acts, and should be entitled to call for a better account from a third person dealing with his goods without his authority than that they were obtained from an agent; and that the Factors Acts applied.' He assented to the opinion of Blackburn, J., in 4 B. and S. 285, that it is sufficient for a person making an advance on goods to show that the agent who was in apparent possession of them was an agent whose general business was one that would bring him within the operation of the Factors Act, and thereby throw upon the principal the burthen of proving that in the particular transaction, with respect to the goods in question, the agent was not such agent, i.e. an agent for sale of the goods as above described. Accordingly, in that case of Fuentes v Montes (L. R., 3 C. P. 268, 37 L. J. C. P. 137; affirmed in Cam. Scac. L. R., 4 C. P. 93), the Court of Common Pleas held it competent for the owner to show that the former agency for sale under which the agent had got possession had been withdrawn prior to the pledge, and that although the revocation was unknown to the bona fide pledgee, to the effect of defeating the pledge, the mere apparent ownership not being sufficient to conclude the question. Mr. Justice Willes took the view of Blackburn, J., in Swainson's case, that 'the authority given by the Factors Acts quoad third persons was an authority superadded and accessory to the ordinary authority given by a principal to his factor,'—an authority of a special kind; and that the intention of the Acts was not to create anything like apparent ownership in factors generally, nor 'to provide a remedy for those hardships which have accrued to innocent persons by mandate operates by an incessant renewal of the consent which confers the authority, like the operation of gravity on a descending body; on the other hand, the force of mandate has been ascribed to the effect of the first act of will operating like impulse on a natural body, the motion from which continues after having been once communicated. The cases attempted to be distinguished or assimilated by these analogies are those of death and insanity, dealing with people in the apparent ownership of goods as if they were the real owners.' And see also the observations of Crompton, J., on same point. Accordingly, the agent whose right to possess had been revoked not being at the time within the terms of the Act, the Court laid it down, 'that the person who under the Acts is to create a valid pledge of his principal's goods must be an agent who is entrusted at the time of doing the act which is to have that effect. That being so, it appears that an agent whose authority has been revoked, and who wrongfully retains possession of goods which he is bound to give up at the time when he purports to make a pledge, is not an agent at all, but a wrongdoer, and is not within the Acts, nor is the pledge a transaction within their protection.'

By sec. 3 (5 and 6 Vict. c. 39), if the pawnee is aware that the agent has not authority to pledge, or is otherwise guilty of mala fides, the pledge shall not be valid. See Add. on Cont. 6th ed. 281; Sm. Merc. Law, 7th ed. 133; Pochin v Robinow & Co., 1869, 7 Macph. 622.

It is to be observed that the statutes do not protect a party taking goods from a factor in satisfaction or security, directly or indirectly, of an antecedent debt, but only apply to goods taken in security of advances made at the time or subsequently. Learoyd v Robinson, 12 M. and W. 745; Navulshaw v Brownrigg, 2 D. M. and G. 450; Jewan v Whitworth, 2 L. R. Eq. 692. A pledge in security of a current acceptance or other contingent liability is not a valid security under these Acts; Macnee v Gorst, 4 L. R. Eq. 315. As to the power of extending the pledge so as to cover subsequent advances, see Portalis v Tetley, 5 L. R. Eq. 140.

With regard to what notice is required to invalidate a sale or pledge, it may perhaps now be considered as established, that it is not necessary for the owner seeking to recover property thus alienated to show that the receiver had positive information; but that it is sufficient if the circumstances are shown to have been such as might, and with a reasonable man would, have led to the conclusion that the agent had not authority to pledge or sell. See per Lord Tenterden in Evans v Trueman, 2 Mood and M.'s N. P. C. 10; and the report by Mr. Paley from his own notes, in Paley, by Lloyd, pp. 227-9. Slight suspicion, his Lordship said, would not be enough; but he left to the jury the question, in the absence of evidence of direct notice, whether the circumstances were such that a reasonable man, and a man of business, applying his understanding to them, would know that the agent had not authority. Still it must be remembered that Lord Tenterden's views on this subject, in connection with the taking of bills in the course of business, have been materially modified. See Goodman v Harvey, 1836, 4 Ad. and Ellis 870; Raphael v Bank of England, 1855, 25 L. J. 33, and cases there. The incidence of the principle is, however, not the same in a case as to the transference of moveables, and the transference of a document ex sua natura negotiable.

Although the Factors Acts were pleaded in Smith v M'Ewen in H. L. (6 S. Bell, 340), and in Pochin v Robinow (1869, 7 Macph. 622), the Court avoided the question whether they applied to Scotland, but from the terms of sec. 7 of the Act 6 Geo. iv. c. 94 it appears that they do; and Mr. Brodie (App. Stair, 896) expresses an opinion that they are general statutes, and have considerably modified the Scotch law on the subject with which they deal. If the English judges are right in the view that the effect of these statutes is not to interfere with the ordinary question of apparent ownership, but to create a special authority in the particular kind of agents for sale referred to in the Acts, they may very well apply to Scotland, to the effect of investing such agents with the statutory power, and still leave a large number of cases, relative to the dealing of agents with their principals' property, to the operation of our common law. The case of the transfer of negotiable securities or instruments, in which the property passes by the delivery alone, such as navy bills or bills endorsed in blank, depends on the principle that the title of a bona fide holder is derived from the instrument itself, and not from the title of the person he received it from; and therefore the only question is as to the honesty of the transaction on the part of the person receiving. (Paley, by Lloyd, p. 233; Goldsmid v Gaden, 1 Bos. and Pull. 649; Collins v Martin, 1 B. and P. 649; Beauchamp v Parry, 1 B. and Ad. 89; Peacock v Rhodes, Doug. 633.) In the case of Mitchell v Burnett and Mowatt, referred to by Mr. Bell, it is clear from Kilkerran's report that the Court went greatly, in sustaining the relevancy of the alleged impignorator by the agent, upon the consideration that, although at common law a man's property can only be affected by his own deed, and that the presumption of property from possession cedit veritati; yet the expediency of trade and commerce requires that, wherever any person is vested in the nominal property by a bill of lading, third parties contracting with him as proprietor, whether by sale or pledge, should be safe. The Court, in short, went on the ground that the property passed by the bill of lading,—a doctrine now exploded, so far at least as concerns any question not arising in precise terms of the Factors Acts, by the doctrine laid down by Lord Campbell in Gurney v Behrend (3 E. and B. 622, 23 L. J. Q. B. 265), and by Lord Loughborough in Lickbarrow v Mason. See ante, note 2, p. 214. But observe, that in any question under the Factors Acts, there appears to be some reason for thinking that bills of lading, as well as dock-warrants, warehouse-keepers' certificates, warrants or orders for delivery of goods, were intended to be dealt with by the Legislature in a character different from that in which the common law regards them, viz. as documents of title, i.e. documents the title represented by which is derived from the instrument itself, and not from the title of the person the holder received it from. See, on the apparent conflict between the common law and statutory conception of these documents, and of their operation and effect, Benjamin on Sale, 607-624. Perhaps, however, the meaning of the statute of Victoria, sec. 4, which give birth to many interesting difficulties in the law of mandate. Without entering into these subtleties, it may be observed that no question of this sort, practically considered, can be settled on its true principles without recollecting that there are three parties concerned—the principal, the factor, and the public; the interests arising to the public under delegated authorities giving birth to many exceptions to the ordinary rules, by which the authority of the factor as in a question with the principal is regulated.

The general rules are, that the power expires, 1. By death; 2. By recall; 3. By renunciation.¹ But the dealings of a commercial people do not present themselves in forms so simple, that general rules of this sort can always be usefully applied. The factor has begun operations before his death, or the principal dies after important contracts have been set in motion by the factor. The death of either happens in a foreign country, and is long unknown to the other; or the mercantile world, trusting to the arrangement which has been formed, have proceeded in good faith with transactions after the factor's powers have secretly expired. It is for the decision of cases of this complicated description that courts of law are resorted to; and digests of jurisprudence are defective where they do not supply rules on which such cases may be determined. It may be useful, in this view, to distinguish some of the more prominent cases.

The first case to be distinguished is that of general mandate, præpositura, or institorial power. Under a power such as is occasionally conferred in this way,² the trade is managed, and the acts of the procurator relied on. To the recall of such a power two things are necessary: 1. The will or intention to recall; and, 2. Special notice or general notoriety.

1. DEATH is held to be a recall of such a power, sufficiently answering both requisites. Either it is, according to one hypothesis, the intended termination of the authority; or, accord-is that these documents are merely, in questions under the Act, to raise a presumption of title 'unless the contrary be shown in evidence,' which would bring the view of their operation taken by the statutes near to that taken by the Court of Common Pleas in Dracacchi v Anglo-Egyptian Navigation Co. (L. R., 3 C. P. 190, 37 L. J. C. P.). In questions not under the Factors Acts, the law laid down in Gurney v Behrend will rule, i.e. that the mere possession of an endorsed bill of lading can confer no greater right to the goods than the endorser himself had, and intended to convey. Apart from these Acts, it should seem that the mere possession by a factor of his principal's goods creates no ostensible ownership (note 3, p. 506 ante); nor will the possession by him of documents relating to the goods, such as a delivery order in his favour to enable him to get possession, be of any higher force than mere possession itself; unless the document were one which in law carried title with it, like a bank-note, if there be any such document relating to chattels known to the law, i.e. any document having the effect which was erroneously ascribed to a bill of lading in Mitchell v Burnett's case. It seems that unless the case is within the Factors Acts, or unless the agent hold some document such as is supposed, the question between the owner and a bona fide vendee or pledgee, receiving the goods from an agent with no authority to sell or pledge, must come to be decided not on any loose notions of commercial expediency, but on the strict rules of the law of estoppel, already explained (p. 305, note 2, and p. 511, note, ante). See Swan v N. B. Australasian Co., 32 L. J. Ex. 273, 2 H. and C. 175. Where the document held by the agent is merely a delivery order, or document enabling him to obtain possession, but contains no representation by the principal that such possession is intended to complete a right of property, arising in virtue of some antecedent transaction between him and the person holding the document, it seems to be clear that a pledgee, trusting to the agent's representations that such is the purpose for which he holds it, is misled by his own misplaced confidence in the veracity of the agent, or by some mistake as to the legal effect of the document, as of itself creating more than a right to receive physical possession of the goods. But there is no misrepresentation there on the principal's part which should create an estoppel against the principal's pleading that there was no such intention; and to hold that there was such estoppel, would merely be to hold that the agent's fraud or the pledgee's ignorance could convert what the law holds to be a mere document of possession, into what the law holds it not to be—a negotiable document of title. (See Baring v Corrie, 2 B. and Ald. 137; Baines v Euing—per Bramwell, B.—35 L. J. Ex. 194; Barber v Meyerstein—per Lord Chancellor—4 L. R. H. L. 317; and M'Ewan v Smith, 6 S. B. 340, 352—per Lord Cottenham, C.) Certainly the basis on which the author places the security of the pledgee—viz. public expediency, favour to commerce, and the presumption of property arising from possession all combined—is not satisfactory in point of legal principle; nor do all or any of these elements afford a practical criterion by which cases can be decided, unless every case is to be decided in favour of the pledgee, which is the logical but inequitable result to which this application of the presumption from possession would lead.]

ing to the other, the cessation of that will, the continuance of which is necessary to the existence of the factor's power; while on either supposition the event is or is supposed to be notorious. But exceptions are admitted where the death is unknown, and the authority in the meanwhile is in action, and relied on.¹

2. BANKRUPTCY is a revocation of such powers, as of all delegated authority, by which the principal may be bound or his property altered; and it also is notorious. But where a factor holds a power to sell, and has made advances on the consignment or goods in his hands, the bankruptcy of the principal is not a recall of the mandate: the factor is [489] still entitled to sell for his indemnification.²

3. INSANITY is not an implied natural termination to a mandate; nor is there an existing will to recall the former appointment; nor is the act notorious by which the public may be aware of such failure of capacity. It was to this interesting question chiefly that the metaphysical discussion already alluded to was applied; but the strong practical ground of good sense on which the question was disposed of, as relative to the public, was that insanity, considered as terminating the agent's authority, is contradistinguished from death by the want of notoriety; that all general delegations of power on which a credit is once raised with the trading world, subsist in force to bind the granter till recalled by some public act or individual notice; and that while they continue in uninterrupted operation relied on by the public, they are in law to be held as available generally, leaving particular cases to be distinguished by special circumstances of mala fides.³ The question does not appear to have occurred in England; but the opinion of very eminent English counsel was taken on the case which was tried in Scotland, and they held the acts of the procurator to be effectual to the public against the estate of the person by whom the procuratory was granted.⁴

EXPRESS REVOCATION will not be available in such a case, unless it be publicly made known.⁵ But it may be difficult to establish such publication. Perhaps the analogy of the publication necessary in the dissolution of partnership would be followed; namely, special notice or circular letters to the customers, and advertisement to the world at large.

1. Where the authority has reference to a particular occasion (as proceeding on a narrative of the granter's absence or indisposition), the natural expiration of the power is on the return of the granter or his reconvalescence. But the credit attached to general powers, when once raised, may be continued by mere permission, while the exercise of the authority is unchecked.⁶

2. The next case is that of a common mercantile factor. Express or tacit revocation

⁶ In the above case of Paterson, the procuration proceeded on the propriety of appointing one 'to act for the granter at any time when absent.'

by act of the principal, or by death, bankruptcy, or insanity, will have no effect either to deprive the factor of the benefit of his authority in extricating himself from transactions already begun, or from the consequences of his having acted; or to deprive others who have relied on his powers of the benefit of the transactions on which they have previously entered with him; or even to disturb transactions entered into, while he still appeared to hold his authority undiminished.

[490] 3. Limited mandates for doing a special act expire by performance of the act, or by death or revocation, and are not, like general powers, capable of extension by mere inference and bona fides.¹

SUBSECTION II.—CLAIMS UNDER THE CONTRACT OF COMMISSION OR MERCANTILE AGENCY.

Under the contract of mandate or mercantile agency, various claims may arise on a sudden disorder in the affairs of the several parties. These may be either on occasion of the bankruptcy of the principal, or on the bankruptcy of the factor or agent.

I.—CLAIMS ON THE BANKRUPTCY OF THE PRINCIPAL.

Two classes of cases may arise on occasion of the bankruptcy of the principal: one, of cases involving the rights of the principal, now vested in his creditors, as in relation to the party with whom the factor has entered into contracts; and another, comprehending the claims which may competently be made against the principal's estate.

1. Claims by the Creditors or Bankrupt Estate of the Principal.

To the creditors or estate of the principal, claims may arise against third parties, or against the factor.²

¹ [The doctrines of the English law with regard to the absolute expiry of mandate by the death of the mandant, whether known or unknown to the mandatory and those dealing with him in the belief of the continued subsistence of the mandate, appear to be so strict and rigid, that little illustration can be drawn from them in aid of a jurisprudence founded like our own on the more equitable doctrines of the civil law. In Smout v Ilberry, 10 M. and W. 1, it was held that the authority which a married woman has, in the absence of her husband, to pledge his credit for necessities supplied to her, is revoked by his death, so that his executors are not liable for such necessities supplied to her on the husband's credit after the death, although before notice of it had been received. Nor is the wife herself liable in such case, because she contracted merely as agent, and did not pledge her own credit. See Campanari v Woodburn, 24 L. J. C. P. 13; Tasker v Shepherd, 30 L. J. Ex. 207; Watson v King, 4 Camp. 272; and cases cited in Smart v Sandars, 5 C. B. 895, 917, note (a). In America, the influence of the civil law, and of our own, has apparently enlarged the views of the courts on this subject. See Story, sec. 488, note; Livermore, ii. 310; Parsons' Contr. i. 71, notes and cases. With regard to the right of a factor to sell for his own indemnification, either on the bankruptcy of his principal, or in the event of the principal revoking the agency without settling the claims of the agent against him, see Story, secs. 74, 371, 477; Parsons' Contr. i. 70, 98. The case of Smart v Sandars, 5 C. B. 895, where it was held by the English judges that a factor's autho-riety to sell is revocable at the will of the consignor, notwithstanding advances to the full value, and a request for payment uncomplished with, is contrary to the course of American decision on the subject, as well as contrary to the principles of the civil law, and our own, and apparently also to natural justice (Story, secs. 466-8, sec. 424). But see De Comas v Probst, 2 Moore P. C. C. N. S. 158, where it was held that mere advances by a factor, whether at the time employed as such or subsequently, cannot have the effect of altering the revocable nature of an authority to sell, unless the advances are accompanied by an agreement—the existence of which, however, may be inferred from the circumstances—that the authority shall not be revocable. As to revocation by the principal's insanity, see Kent, Comm. ii. 645; Parsons, Contr. i. 71, notes.]

² [As to the Rights of the Principal on the Agent's Contracts against Third Parties.—Where an agent contracts, whether in his own name or the principal's, the principal, as the party having the ultimate interest, and liable to implement the contract, is also in the general case entitled, as against the third party, to all the advantages and benefits of the contract. Where it is made in his name, he is the only person who can sue thereon. (Story, Agency, sec. 419.) But in suing, even in this case, he is not only bound by the terms of the contract itself as made with the agent, but also—ad civilem effectum—by all the consequences of any false and fraudulent representations held out by the agent to the third party as inducements to enter into the contract. Where the agent has acted

I. CLAIM AGAINST THIRD PARTIES.—The creditors of the principal are entitled, against the party with whom the factor has contracted, to demand performance of the contract, but under certain qualifications. Thus, 1. Where the factor has acted in his own name, and has

as if he were the sole party concerned, the principal is entitled at any time to step in and supersede the agency by disclosing himself as principal, and suing on the contract; but in this case he will be liable to all the pleas the third party would have had against the agent, supposing the agent to have been the real principal. (Sims v Bond, 5 B. and Ad. 393; George v Claggett, 7 T. R. 359; Warner v Mackay, 1 M. and W. 591; Skinner v Stocks, 4 B. and Ald. 437; Cothay v Fennell, 10 B. and C. 671; Garrett v Handley, 4 B. and C. 664.) Although the contract is in the name of the agent alone, and in writing, parole or other extrinsic evidence is admissible to show that he contracted, in reality, not for his own behoof but as agent only, and that either at the instance of the principal, to the effect of giving the benefit of the contract to the unnamed principal, or at the instance of the third party, in order to show that the contract was really made with the principal, who has chosen to describe himself by the name of his agent, just as it would be admissible to show his identity if he had used a feigned name; for neither of these things is to contradict the written agreement, but to apply it. (Higgins v Senior, 8 M. and W. 834-44; Trueman v Loder, 11 A. and E. 589; Beckham v Drake, 2 H. L. C. 579, 9 M. and W. 79.) The cases of bills of exchange, and in England of contracts under seal, are exceptions (per Parke, B., in Beckham v Drake, 9 M. and W. 79, 96; Siffkin v Walker, 2 Camp. 308; Emly v Lye, 15 East 7; Bottomley v Fisher, 31 L. J. 417): for if a person uses his own name as a party upon such instruments, though in reality he is acting for a principal, the liability is exclusively his; and the principal cannot either be charged, nor can he sue on the instrument. But where an agent signs a contract in his own name, without mentioning his principal, it is not competent for the agent to introduce parole proof to show that he did not intend to bind himself. (Higgins v Senior, supra; and see Smith's L. C. vol. ii. 349, in notes to Thomson v Davenport.) The right of an unnamed principal to intervene and claim the benefit of the contract made by his agent is subject to the condition that the other party to the contract is not prejudiced thereby. Thus, if an agent entrusted by the owner with the possession of goods for sale, sells them in his own name or as his own, and the buyer does not know that he is an agent in the transaction, though the principal may intervene and sue the buyer for the price, the buyer may set off in such action, against the demand of the principal, any debts previously due by the agent on his own account to the buyer himself. (Raboné v Williams, 7 T. R. 360 (a); Stracey v Deey, ibid. 361 (c); George v Claggett, ibid. 359; Carr v Hinchliff, 4 B. and C. 547; Purchell v Salter, 1 Q. B. 197.) But such set-off will not be allowed if the buyer knows at the time of the sale that the person selling to him is an agent, though he may not know who the principal is. (Moore v Clementson, 2 Camp. 22; Baring v Corrie, 2 B. and Ald. 137; Fish v Kempton, 7 C. B. 687; Ferrand v Bischoffsheim, 27 L. J. C. P. 302; Semenza v Brinsley, 34 L. J. C. P. 161; Dresser v Norwood, 32 L. J. C. P. 201, 34 ibid. 48.) Nay, if the buyer had the means of knowing, though not expressly told, and must be supposed to have known, that the party dealt with was only an agent for some one or other, he will not be allowed to plead a set-off against the principal upon his own personal claims against the agent. (Ibid.; Smith, L. C. vol. ii. in notes to George v Claggett.) In Dresser v Norwood, supra, where the plaintiff sold through an agent, and the buyer also bought through an agent, and the purchasing agent knew that the goods were not the property of the person immediately selling them, this knowledge on the part of the purchasing agent was held to be knowledge on the part of his principal, so as to disentitle the latter to a set-off against the plaintiff of a debt due by the plaintiff's agent personally. In order that the buyer may succeed in establishing a plea of set-off against the principal on a debt due to the buyer by the agent personally, it must be shown, (1) that the contract was made with a person whom the principal has entrusted with the possession of the goods; for, generally speaking, and apart from special powers given, or implied by previous dealings, or by usage of the particular trade, an agent who has not possession has not authority to sell in his own name; and though he should do so, the principal will have the same rights and remedies against the purchaser as if his name had been disclosed by the agent, inasmuch as in selling in his own name he exceeded his proper authority (Baring v Corrie, 2 B. and Ald. 137; Story, Agency, sec. 28, sec. 88): or, (2) that the agent has sold the goods as his own, and in his own name as principal, by the authority of the principal: (3) that the defendant dealt with him as, and believed him to be, the principal: and (4) that before the defendant was undeceived in that respect, the right of set-off accrued (Smith, L. C. vol. ii. p. 117, 6th ed.). The right of the principal to intervene and claim the benefit of the contract made by the agent, may be excluded by the terms or circumstances of the contract expressly restricting the title under it to the actual party making it; as, where one of several partners making a contract in his individual capacity, but really for the firm, declared that he alone was interested in it, it was held that the other partners could not join in an action on such contract, though they might be jointly interested. (Lucas v De la Cour, 1 M. and S. 249.) So also where the third party contracts with reference to the known personal capabilities or character of the agent appearing as principal. (Robson v Drummond, 2 B. and Ad. 303.) See also Humble v Hunter, 12 Q. B. 310, and per Pattison, J., 316. It is said by Story (Agency, sec. 423), that wherever an exclusive credit is given by the third party to the agent, the principal cannot be considered a party to the contract, or entitled to sue on it. But the authorities he refers to do not bear out the proposition, and it seems to be very questionable in point of principle as a matter of Scotch law. The principal is entitled, according to the plainest principles of the civil law, to demand from his agent a cession of all rights of action which he has in the execution of his mandate acquired (Poth. Mand. No. 60, L. 8, sec. 10, D. Mand.); and even if the third party has no claim against the principal by having renounced it or barred himself of it, the principal seems still entitled, without the formality of an assignation in this more than in any other case, to sue on the agent's contract made for his behoof, being of course liable, as any assignee would be, to the defendant's counter claims against the agent. It is not easy to see how been relied on as principal, the third party cannot be deprived of the benefit of the securities which he could fairly contemplate as resulting from the contract. And so he may set off against the demand of the principal, for the price of goods sold by the factor, a debt due the third party's election to abandon his claim against the principal, and to trust entirely to the credit of the agent, should, without the assent of the principal, involve an abandonment on the part of the principal of his rights against the third party, under a contract made for him and by his authority. The right of a principal against a third party will also be limited by payments already made at the time the principal makes his demand against the third party to the agent, provided the agent had authority to receive such payment, and it was made in such a way as to bind the principal, and that whether the agent has or has not paid over the money to the principal, and whether the existence of the principal was or was not known to the third party paying to the agent. All such payments are obligatory on the principal, and he must allow them in accounting with the third party. An authority in an agent to receive payment is not—apart from usage or other implications than those involved in the bare fact of his being deputed to receive it for the principal—an authority to receive it in any mode the agent may choose. He is ordinarily deemed entrusted with power to receive it in money only. (Favenc v Bennet, 11 East 38; Blackburn v Scholes, 2 Camp. 343; Todd v Reid, 4 B. and Ald. 210; Russel v Bangley, 4 B. and Ald. 395; Bartlett v Pentland, 10 B. and C. 760; Scott v Irving, 1 B. and Ad. 605; Barker v Greenwood, 2 Y. and Coll. 415; Richardson v Anderson, 1 Camp. 43; Bousfield v Cresswell, 2 Camp. 545; Howard v Chapman, 4 C. and P. 508; Hudson v Grainger, 5 B. and A. 27.) He cannot without special authority receive payment so as to bind the principal in any other way, as e.g. by receiving goods, for which he does not pay the party, but gives him instead a discharge of the debt belonging to his principal; or by setting off a debt due by himself to the principal's debtor against the sum due to the principal; or, if instead of actually receiving money from the third party, he discharge a debt due from him to the payer, and then give a receipt as for money paid to the principal. (Todd v Reid, Russel v Bangley, Bartlett v Pentland, and Scott v Irving, supra; Cattell v Hindle, 1 L. R. C. P. 186, 35 L. J. C. P. 161.) Nor can he take a note, or bill, or banker's check (Ward v Evans, 2 L. Raym. 930; Thorold v Smith, 11 Mod. 71, 87; Sykes v Gill, 5 M. and W. 645; Williams v Evans, 35 L. J. Q. B. 111), or other personal property. (Doct. and Stud. 286.) So, an agent authorized to sell for money cannot barter. (Howard v Chapman, 4 C. and P. 508; Guerreiro v Peile, 3 B. and Ald. 616.) In these cases, the debtor cannot in a question with the principal plead that he is discharged, and that the agent himself has become debtor to the principal. But if an insurance broker or other mercantile agent has been employed to receive money for another in the general course of his business, and where the known general course of business is for the agent to keep a running account with the principal, and to credit him in that account not only with sums he may have received in cash, but with sums which he may have received by credits in account between himself and the debtors with whom he also keeps running accounts; it must be understood that if one of these debtors' accounts is bona fide settled according to that known usage, the original debtor is discharged, and the agent becomes the debtor according to the meaning and intention and with the authority of the principal. (Stewart v Aberdein—per Lord Abinger—4 M. and W. 228; and cases in Arnould on Insurance (MacLachlan's ed.), i. 183.) Whether such a mode of settlement, however customary between agent and debtor, be of any binding effect upon the principal, is a question of fact as to his assent to this kind of settlement, see Sweeting v Pearce, 30 L. J. C. P. 109, 113—per Bramwell, B.; and on Lord Abinger's dicta in Stewart v Aberdein, the observations of Judge Duer (Duer on Insurance, ii. 260-1). Again, if the principal, being indebted to the agent, authorize the agent to receive money due to him from the debtor, intending that the agent should thereout pay himself his own debt, he is held to authorize the agent impliedly, to the extent of that debt at least, to receive payment in any way he may think fit. An agent with an authority of that kind is only bound to receive payment in such a way as thereby to put it in his power completely to discharge the duty he owes to his principal. If, therefore, he is bound to pay the whole over to his principal, he must receive it in cash from the debtor; and a debtor who pays an agent, and who means to be safe, must see that the mode of payment does enable the agent to perform this his duty. If the agent be not creditor of the principal, he must receive the whole in cash; for otherwise he does not, by the act done between him and the debtor, put himself into the situation of being able to pay it over. See cases of Todd, Russel, Bartlett, Scott, supra. If the principal is debtor to the agent, and the principal intends, when he makes him his agent to receive, that he shall retain his own debt out of the sum received, his agent's only duty is to pay over to the principal the balance, after deducting his own debt. If he therefore receives in cash that balance, he is put in a position as completely to discharge his duty to the principal as if he received the whole in cash. It can make no difference to the principal whether the agent receive the whole and retain part, or receive only the balance, which he himself is entitled to receive in turn from the agent. A person, however, who does not take the ordinary and proper course of paying the whole in money, must take care to be able to prove that the agent is in this situation. If he pay by settlement on account or otherwise, he takes on himself the risk of being able to show the debt due by the principal to the agent, and the specific circumstances under which the agent was appointed to receive the money. (Barker v Greenwood—per Alderson, B.—2 Y. and C. 418.) The same reasoning ought to apply where the agent has a lien or right of retention over moneys coming into his hands on account of the principal, to the effect of entitling him to receive payment to the extent of his lien otherwise than in money. (Barker v Greenwood, supra; Howard v Chapman, 4 C. and P. 508; Hudson v Granger, 5 B. and A. 27; Paley, by Lloyd, 287, 326; Drinkwater v Goodwin, Cowp. 251.) The right of the debtor to pay to the agent to the extent of his lien holds even after notice, and after revocation of his agency. (Per Bayley, J., in Hudson v Granger, supra; Lloyd's Paley, pp. 287-8.) The debtor, however, by paying the factor after notice, takes on himself the proof of the factor's right to receive. (Cowp. 255, per Lord Mansfield.) Of by the factor to himself.¹ 2. Where the contract is impeachable for fraud or concealment by the agent, the objection equally affects the principal. 3. Even where the bargain has been course a payment to an agent, in whatever way it is made, will be valid against the principal where the debtor had no knowledge, at the time of payment, of any other person being a party to the contract. (Paley, p. 326.) Some doubts, however, appear now to exist in England as to the debtor's right to set off payments made to a factor where the factor was believed to have a right to sell, and has sold, to pay himself. (Warner v M'Kay, 1 M. and W. 595; Smart v Sandars, 5 C. B. 399; Fish v Knapton, 7 C. B. 694—per Creswell, J.) Where there is no lien or right in the agent, as the surrogatum of the lien, to pay himself out of the money received, the principal may intercept such payments by notice to the debtor not to pay; and if payment is made after that notice, when there is no lien or right to pay himself in the agent, it is not a valid payment as against the principal, and must be paid over again to him. (Mann v Forrester, 4 Camp. 60, Buller's N. P. 130, Strange 1182.) The factor having such lien or right should give the buyer or debtor notice thereof, and require him not to settle with the principal, otherwise a payment to the principal will operate as a discharge to the buyer. (Coppin v Walker, 2 Marsh. 497, 7 Taunt. 237; Williams v Millington, 1 H. Bl. 81; Robinson v Rutter, 4 E. and B. 954; Coppin v Craig, 7 Taunt. 243; Holmes v Tutton, 5 E. and B. 65.) But if the factor have such lien on the price for his balance, it entitles him to receive payment in preference to the principal, even though the purchaser is aware of the representative capacity in which the agent dealt. (Paley, p. 326.) It is sometimes said that the factor's or agent's standing del credere for the price entitles him to receive, and the debtor to pay him, even after interpellation by the principal (Paley, by Lloyd, ib.); but that is not law. The mistake arose from Grove v Dubois. See Mr. Lloyd's note, Paley, pp. 111-4. With regard to the two distinct questions—(1) the validity of payment by the debtor to the agent in face of a prohibition by the principal; and (2) the debtor's right to set off the agent's debt to him against the principal's claim,—observe that the former turns on the title of the agent to receive the money; and therefore, if such title exist, it is of no moment whether the agency was known to the debtor at the date of the contract, or not until the receipt of the interpellation. But the latter question turns not on the right of the agent, but of the debtor; and the debtor's right is built on the principle, that when the debtor has been led to contract under the impression that his contract is with one person, he cannot be deprived of the rights acquired as against that person by the introduction of a third to whom he was a stranger, and therefore this right cannot exist if he had notice of the agency at the time of the contract. Again, wherever the debtor pleads payment to the agent against the claim of the principal, he must show that the payment was made to the agent in the course of business, and that it was appropriated by the payer to the specific purpose of extinguishing the debt sued on. If a shopman, who is authorized to receive payment over the counter, receives the money elsewhere than in the shop, the payment is not good as against the master: for the master may be willing to trust the agent to receive money, in the regular course of his business in the shop, when under his own eye or the eyes of others in whom he has confidence, or under the control of checks which he is satisfied are sufficient to regulate the shopman's fidelity; but he might not be willing to trust the agent with the receipt of money elsewhere. (Kaye v Brett—per Parke, B. —5 Ex. 274.) Authority to receive moneys in a particular branch of the principal's business will not imply authority to receive payments not connected with that branch. Thus a legacy to a tradesman, paid to a shopman who was in the habit of receiving daily payments, was held not sufficient payment to discharge the executor. (Sanderson v Bell, 2 C. and M. 313. See Monk v Whittembury, 2 Moo. and Ry. 81.)

The principal is entitled to sue not only on the agent's contracts; but he has right to recover his money or goods paid or wrongfully transferred by the agent, by an action against the third parties receiving them. He may do so though the agent has paid or transferred under a contract made in his own name, without mention of principal, when the consideration of the contract to come from the other party has failed: as, e.g., if the agent has made a deposit on a contract concluded in his own name, the principal may sue for repetition of the deposit. (D. of Norfolk v Worseley, 1 Camp. 337; Dalzell v Marr, 1 Camp. 532; Power v Butcher, 10 B. and C. 329, Lloyd and Welby 115.) So where agent has paid through mistake of fact, or money has been illegally extorted from the agent in the course of his employment. (Anchor v Bank of England, Doug. 637; Trentell v Barandon, 8 Taunt. 100; Sigourney v Lloyd, 8 B. and C. 622, Dan. and Lloyd 132; Lloyd v Sigourney, 5 Bingh. 525; Stevenson v Mortimer, Cowp. 805, Roll. Abr. 98, Cro. Jac. 223, Cro. Car. 37. So where the principal's goods or money have gone, through fraud or imposition, either practised on the agent or participated in by the agent. (Clark v Shee, Cowp. 197; Taylor v Plumer, 3 M. and S. 562; Bryson v Coles, 6 M. and S. 14.) In the case of money or goods paid away by the agent for an illegal purpose, there will be a difference if he has done so as agent, but without authority, or has done so on his own account. In the former case the principal would be entitled to recover in any event; in the latter, only by identifying the goods as his in the receiver's hands: for any other medium concludendi would make him sue in the place of the agent, who, as particeps criminis, cannot sue. The principal cannot adopt the agent's right of repetition, but must follow his property by proceedings in rem, which will be successful only where the property is identifiable, unless the defendant be proved cognizant of the fact that the agent was dealing with the principal's property without authority. (Paley, Lloyd, pp. 337-9; Story, Agency, secs. 435-9.)]

Moore v Clementson, 1809, 2 Camp. 24. It is not sufficient to alter this rule, that the factor or agent was known to act generally as an agent. Lord Ellenborough said: 'If the defendants had merely a general knowledge of this person being a factor, this, I think, would not be enough to deprive them of the privilege they derived from his actually selling these goods as a principal. A man who is in the habit of selling the goods of others, may likewise sell goods of his made as with a factor, the principal's claim will be affected by the factor's lien for his general balance, or by the factor's right to recover from the third party under a del credere commission.¹

The creditors of the principal are entitled to recover from a third party to whom the agent has given over his goods, or paid his money, in the following cases: 1. Where the third party has the goods in temporary custody from the agent. But the demand will be subject to all legal liens where the name of the principal was not disclosed. 2. Where the goods have been delivered, or money paid, on such mistake, misrepresentation, concealment, or fraud, as would give the agent a remedy had he been the principal; there is rei vindicatio or condictio indebiti to the principal as the true owner. 3. Where the contract is with the agent, factorio nomine, but beyond the terms of his power.

[491] The estate of the principal has the full benefit of the delivery of goods to the agent, where he is not merely an intermediate agent to forward the goods, but the person in whose administration the goods are to be after delivery.²

II. CLAIMS AGAINST THE FACTOR.—The rights of the principal's estate against the factor are to recover all the property entrusted to him, and to have an account of all the proceeds, and of the result of the contracts which he has entered into, under deduction of the commission, and of any balance that may arise on the factor's transactions.

The responsibility of the agent is for ordinary diligence, according to the general rule already laid down. See above, p. 487. In applying this rule, the Court has pronounced two decisions, which may serve to illustrate it: 1. A gratuitous mandatory was found not responsible for theft, where extreme prudence and care might have prevented the loss.³ And, 2. A common mechanic was found not responsible for a short delay in effecting an insurance which he was desired to get done; whereas a broker would have been held to stand to the loss.⁴

own; and where he sells goods as a principal, with the sanction of the real owner, the purchaser, who is thus led to give him credit, shall on no account afterwards be deprived of his set-off by the intervention of any third person.'

See distinction in the case of brokers, p. 537.

³ Grierson v Muir, 1802, Hume 329. This was in the case of a man who undertook gratuitously to carry a sum of money. The money, being £50, was delivered to him in Keltonhill fair, to be carried to Kirkcudbright, for the purpose of paying a bill there. Muir, who undertook it, put it in his pocket with some money of his own, and both were stolen or lost in the fair. Muir did not miss the money till he arrived at home, when he found his pocket cut. The Court held the circumstance of his having lost at the same time a sum belonging to himself, and a bill of £100, as, in all the circumstances of the case, sufficient proof of his not having been guilty of supine neglect.

⁴ Kay v Simpson, 16 Dec. 1801.

[As to the Claims by the Principal against the Agent.—Pothier, Mand. sec. 37, has classified the agent's duties to the principal under the threefold obligation: (1) To perform the business forming the subject of the mandate; (2) to bestow on it all the care it requires; (3) to render an account of his agency. As to responsibility of agents for neglect of duties undertaken, whether gratuitously or not, see Poth. Mand. sec. 38. Dig. Mand. l. 22, sec. 11; l. 5, sec. 1; l. 27, sec. 2. Cod. Mand. l. 11. Even a gratuitous mandatory is by the civil law responsible not only pro his quæ gessit sed etiam pro his quæ gerenda suscepit (Cod. supra). This is also the law of England to a certain extent (Coggs v Barnard, 2 L. Raym. 909), on the ground that when the principal has entrusted a gratuitous agent upon his undertaking to be careful, and the undertaking has commenced, the agent puts a fraud upon the principal by being negligent. See Wallace v Telfair, 2 T. R. 188, note; Wilkinson v Coverdale, 1 Esp. 75; Seller v Work, N. P. 1801, Marsh. Insurance 299. In England no action will lie against a gratuitous promiser for non-performance, even though damage result from reliance on the performance promised; but if the agency be undertaken, and be begun to be proceeded in, and afterwards by negligence nothing be done, or the business be misdone, action lies. And by the custom of merchants, if an agent undertakes an order to insure, he is bound to perform it at his peril (Livermore i. pp. 310–23, and cases). In Scotland no such distinction is taken, as a consideration is not necessary to support an obligation. As to the degree of responsibility incumbent on gratuitous agents in England for misperformance, see Livermore i. 337, 352. The civil law made no distinction between gratuitous and paid agents, the rule in both cases being, spondent diligentiam et industriam negotio gerendo parem, and there being a difference in this respect between gratuitous agents and other gratuitous obligors. (Poth. Mand. secs. 46–9.) The laws both of England and Scotland are less exigent. Stair i. 12. 10; Ersk. iii. 3. 36; Livermore i. 340. An ordinary (gratuitous) mandatory is not liable to an action if he act bona fide, and to the best of his ability. But by both laws, where a person professes himself to be of a certain business, trade, or profession, and undertakes, though gratuitously, to perform an act which relates to his particular employment, there competent skill will be imputed to him

2. Claims against the Estate of the Principal.

The estate of the principal is liable to claims by the factor, and to claims by third parties.

on the principle spondet peritiam artis, and any omission to use such skill will be imputed to him as a fraud on his employer. (Sheills v Blackburn, 1 H. Bl. 158; Hay v Simpson, 16 Dec. 1801, Hume.) When a gratuitous agent makes no profession as to the subject of the agency, the only way to render him responsible is to prove that he really did possess the requisite skill, yet failed to use it. (Brodie, note to Stair, p. 130.) The diligence prestable by a paid agent is by our law, as we have said, beyond that required from a gratuitous agent. Where a profession is made of special skill, the agent's liability in relation to such matters is properly construed with increased rigour. Imperitia culpæ annumeratur. Dig. l. 17. 132. Spondet peritiam artis. Spondet diligentiam gerendo negotio parem. But this is not to be taken absolutely, but relatively to the peritia belonging to others of common capacity in the trade or profession—the ordinary skill possessed by people in that trade or profession. (Story, Ag. secs. 183–4.) Where particular instructions are given as to the mode of action, the agent is bound to execute them in forma specifica; and where no particular instructions are given, the usage of trade will form an implied instruction, and so will the regular and settled mode of dealing between the two parties. It is the primary obligation of the agent, as a general rule, to adhere to these expressed or clearly implied instructions in all cases, except those in which extreme necessity and unforeseen emergencies compel him to depart from them. Any deviation not so justified will involve responsibility for all the loss resulting, and it will be no defence to the agent that he intended a benefit to the principal. The principal knows his own mind better than the agent. And if the agent, by such deviation, obtain an advantage or make a profit, he will not be allowed to retain it, but must account to the principal for the whole, though he bore the risk of failure. (Paley iv. 5. 199; Catlin v Bell, 4 Camp. 184; Russell v Palmer, 2 Wils. 325; Sheills v Blackburn, supra; Story, Ag. secs. 193–4; 1 Livermore 368 et seq.) But though every excess of authority is at the risk of the agent, the principal, by taking the benefit of the act, discharges the agent and embraces the risk himself. (Paley, ib.) The agent's responsibility is not confined to the loss of his commission, but extends to the damage suffered by the principal either by direct injury occasioned to his own property, or by his being rendered liable to others in reparation. The damage must be real, and not supposed or probable merely. Therefore, if an agent neglect his instructions, but can show that the act, if performed, would not have entitled his principal to any legal benefit, he will not be liable, though there was a probability that the benefit to arise from the act would, though not legally exigible, have been almost certainly conceded to the principal as matter of favour, or custom, or honour. (Webster v De Tastet, 7 T. R. 157. But see the American case of De Tastet v Crousillat (note to Condy's Marshall on Insur. p. 301; and Livermore i. p. 386), with Mr. Livermore's observations (ib.)). Nor is the agent chargeable with breach of instructions, if the compliance would have been a fraud upon others. (Paley 8–10.) That is a branch of a general law that no contract between A and B to work to the fraud of C is maintainable. The agent may, in answer to a claim of damages, set up and show any ground which would certainly have prevented the principal from receiving benefit, though the agent had performed his duty, i.e. which must have prevented him, and not merely might have done so. Thus, if a ship, of which the insurance has been neglected, has in the course of her voyage deviated so that an insurance, if effected, would have been void, or if the voyage to have been insured was illegal, or if the principal had no insurable interest, that will be a good defence to the agent. (Delaney v Stoddart, 1 T. R. 22; Fourin v Oswell, 3 Camp. 359, the authority of which on this point is not touched by Glaser v Cowie, 1 M. and S. 52; Bryan v Lewis, 1 Ry. and Mood. 386, overruled, but not on this point, by Hibblewhite v M'Morine, 6 M. and W. 202; Alsop v Coit, 12 Mass. Rpts. (Amer.) 40, cited 2 Duer Ins. 325, 2 Phillip's Ins. No. 1904; Miner v Taggart (Amer.), cited ib.; Story, Ag. 222.)

The general rule in regard to damage is causa proxima non remota spectatur: the damage must, in the ordinary case of contract, be the direct, immediate, and foreseen consequence of the act; but the damage chargeable against an agent for breach or neglect of duty or instructions is not measured by this rule. It forms an exception to the general rule. (Story, sec. 200, note.) Although the immediate loss be not occasioned by the agent's fault as its immediate cause, yet if the loss be such as would not have occurred but through the previous fault, the agent will be answerable for the loss. Whatever be the immediate cause of the loss, if it be shown that but for the agent's fault the principal's property would not have been in a situation where the loss which has befallen would have lighted upon it, the agent will be answerable. (Caffrey v Darby, 6 Vesey 496; Davis v Garrett, 6 Bingh. 716; Massey v Banner, 1 Jac. and W. 241, 4 Madd. 413; Paley, by Lloyd, 10, 17; Barker v James, 4 Camp. 112; Dale v Hill, 1 Wils. 281; May v Roberts, 12 East 89; Harle v Ogilvie, 1749, M. 10095; 3 Chitty, Comm. and Manuf. c. 3, p. 215; Wren v Kirlen, 11 Vesey 378; Knight v Lord Plymouth, 3 Atk. 480.) But there is no principle for extending the responsibility of an agent deviating from his orders, or committing a breach of duty, so far as to make him responsible thereafter for all hazards. Thus Lord Glenlee, in Johnston and Sharp v Baillie, 2 June 1815, F. C., says: 'I have great doubt whether, when a party has failed in an essential part of his duty, it is competent for him in any case to come forward and say that the same thing would have happened if he had done otherwise.' Certainly the agent failing to give notice to enable the principal to insure, is not entitled to say the principal would not have insured; for he cannot prove that: it is mere speculation. The receipt of the notice and the concurrence of other events might have suggested the propriety of insuring; but it is too broad to put it as a general rule, that he shall not be allowed to prove, if he can, that the same thing would have happened: that is to make him run all hazards, whether in any way connected with his fault or not. See Bankt. i. 18. 13; Hay v Gray, 1675, M. 10083; Young v Finlay, 1716, M. 10088. The supervening loss must in some way be connected with the fault, either as creating the loss as a cause, or determining the incidence of some other cause of loss. If a principal direct an agent to pack his goods in a particular kind of case for exportation, and the vessel is captured by pirates, the agent would not be responsible because he had not packed the goods in the kind of case ordered. The use of this, or want of the other case in no way contributes to the loss, or occasions the goods coming in the enemy's way. See also Poth. Vente, No. 58; Stair i. 17. 14; i. 13. 2. 2. But in regard to the agent's liability for damage through his fault, although in charging his fault as the cause or occasion of a loss which happens he may go beyond the causa proxima of that loss, yet it is the immediate loss itself he is liable for, not remote or consequential loss arising out of this. (Story, sec. 221, and cases.) Except in the way above mentioned, where his fault has been the occasion of a fortuitous event or accident, or vis major falling on the goods, an agent is never liable for such events or casualties (Poth. Mand. No. 50, l. 13, C. Mand.; Stair i. 13. 2), unless he has—as he may do—expressly charged himself with them. (Poth. ibid. l. 39, D. Mand.) But, on the other hand, he may stipulate that he undertakes no responsibility for fault or negligence in the discharge of his mandate; but even such a stipulation will not protect him if he fails in good faith, for no man can stipulate ne dolus præstetur (l. 27, sec. 3, D. de Pact.).

Another great head of the agent's duties is that of keeping an exact account of his doings, and particularly of all pecuniary transactions (Poth. supra; Parsons' El. M. L. 175; Story, Agency, sec. 203). The principles of an accounting between principal and agent are detailed at some length by Pothier (Mand. Nos. 51–57). The agent is bound to debit or charge himself in the account with all sums and other things which have come to his hands in his agency. If by his own fault he has let any of them be lost or perish, he must charge himself in place of these with the sum at which the damage resulting from their loss may be estimated. If by his fault they have become deteriorated to such an extent that they are no longer receivable by the principal, the agent must treat them as if entirely lost by his fault, and charge the damage accordingly, reserving the things to himself on his own account. He must place to his debit not only what he has received, but what ought to have come to his hands, but through his fault has not, and also the damage to the principal accruing from the fact that such things have not come to his hands. In charging the receipt of proceeds of goods sold, he is not merely bound to charge the price received, though it be that prescribed to him; but the higher price he might have sold for, if it can be shown he could have sold for more to a responsible party: for in every mandate to buy, though for a specified price, there must be understood 'or for less if possible,' and in every mandate to sell for a certain sum, 'or for more if possible,' unless, as sometimes happens, it be agreed that the agent is to keep the more or the less to himself in room of or addition to his commission. He must charge himself with the fruits and profits which he draws from the things which have come to his hands, and even with those which he ought by ordinary diligence and in the usual way of business to have drawn, but which he has by his fault not drawn. He is also chargeable with the value of fruits and profits which he ought to have drawn from sums and goods which by his fault have failed to come to his hands, at least in so far as the value of such fruits and profits is not comprised in the estimate of damage resulting from his fault through which these sums or things have not come to his hands. Finally, he is bound to charge himself the sum at which the deterioration, caused by faults of his own to his principal's goods, should be estimated. It has been questioned whether an agent can pretend that what he owes for loss or damage through his fault should be compensated by extraordinary advantages and profits which his care and ability have procured in other items within his agency. The Roman law decided not, in the case of socii (D. xvii. 2. 25 and 26), and the principle holds in agency.

Yet there may be many cases where something like an equalizing of excess and defect takes place. In Cornwall v Wilson, 1 Ves. jun. 509, where a factor exceeded his limited price in the purchase of hemp by a small difference, and at the same time made a greater saving in the freight by contracting at the time he did, instead of waiting for a fall in hemp, Lord Hardwicke thought that as the price of freight was rising more than the price of hemp was falling, the factor had a right to take advantage of the low freight. See, however, Livermore, i. p. 391, who refers to Poth. Mand. No. 52. There is a somewhat similar case in l. 11 D. de Usuris. On the credit or discharge side of the account the agent will be entitled to place all his disbursements in execution of the mandate, so far as they were proper and à propos of the mandate; so far as not so, they will be rejected or reduced. As to the liberality with which an agent is to be dealt with in regard to travelling and personal expenses in journeys connected with the agency, see Poth. No. 54. It is the difference between the two sides of the account, or rather the amount by which the charge exceeds the discharge, that forms the amount due to the principal. The balance only is the debt; and on the principal's bankruptcy, the balance only can be claimed by the assignees even in England: and it is held there, and à fortiori with us, that whatever an agent is entitled to deduct from the demand of his principal for advances or disbursements of any kind may be given in evidence in an action brought against the agent, without pleading it or giving notice of set-off. (Paley, by Lloyd, 124–6. Dale v Sollett, 4 Burr. 2133; Poth. Mand. Nos. 57–59.) The mandatory's gestio in execution of his mandate being performed for and in room and place of the mandant, all the proceeds arising in course of or from that gestio are received for and in room and place of the mandant; and therefore the agent is bound to render them all to the principal. Ex mandato apud eum qui mandatum suscepit nihil remanere oportet (L. 20 D. de Mand.). Nevertheless, since these are proceeds flowing from the agency, he is entitled to compensation and retention against these proceeds for all that he has disbursed for the agency, and he is only bound to restore the balance that remains after compensation is made. In fact, in regard to all that ought to appear on the different sides of an agent's accounts with his principal, there is an ipso jure compensation quoad concurrentiam (Poth. Mand. Nos. 57–8); and with regard to specific corpora which the agent has acquired in the course of his agency, he is bound to specific delivery of them to the principal (l. 8, sec. 10, D. Mand.), but only on the condition of the mandant reimbursing, before he parts with them, the expenditure and disbursements of the agency, or money in his hands, due to his principal, for his security or indemnification, is entitled till which the mandatory may retain veluti quodam jure pignoris.

All discounts, benefits, eases, etc. obtained by the agent in the course of the principal's business belong to the principal, and not to the agent; and where there was alleged a usage for agents to retain them, it was stigmatized as a usage of fraud and plunder. (Story, Agency, sec. 207; 3 Chitty, Comm. and Manuf. 216, 221; Diplock v Blackburn, 3 Camp. 43.) If a factor buy up goods for himself which he ought to buy as factor, and instead of charging commission take the profits on a resale by him to the principal, as if he were a merchant selling to his principal, it is a fraud, and he must account for the profits as belonging to the principal. Per Lord Thurlow in East India Co. v Henchman, 1 Ves. jun. 289. So Massey v Davis, 2 Vesey, p. 317, where an agent employed on a salary was held bound to account for the profit he had made by a clandestine sale of timber to his principal, on his (the agent's) own account, although a third person, who acted in the transaction and sold the timber in his own name, was copartner of the agent. It was held that even the copartner would have had to forfeit his profits if it could be shown that he knew the other to be acting in breach of his duty to his principal. An agent's failure to keep accounts is always suspicious; but irregularity in this respect is not a ground for saying that he shall make no demand against the principal. It will press him with difficulty in proving his claim; but if he can prove it by documents and proofs which the Court can receive, he must be paid. But his neglect to keep accounts will in equity affect his commission, according to the rule laid down by Lord Eldon, that a man standing in a relation imposing a duty to keep regular accounts cannot be permitted to make a demand for work and labour in that character, of which he has kept no account; and so a receiver who does not pass his accounts regularly is not allowed any poundage. (White v Lady Lincoln, 8 Ves. jun. 363; Middle-ditch v Sharland, 5 Ves. jun. 87; Livermore i. 434.)

As it is contrary to the duty of an agent not to keep the accounts of his principal's business clear and distinct; so, if he confound his principal's property with his own, the burthen of proof will be upon him to distinguish them; and he will be charged with the whole mixed mass as being the principal's, except what he can satisfactorily prove to be his own. (Livermore i. 443; L. Chedworth v Edwards, 8 Ves. jun. 46; Lupton v Whyte, 15 Ves. jun. 432; Panton v Panton, 15 Ves. jun. 440.) And on the same principle, he will be responsible for the payment of a bill or note which he takes payable to himself, unless this be authorized by the express allowance of the principal or the usage of trade (Parsons' El. M. L. p. 141). And if the agent deposit the principal's money in bank in his own name, and the banker fail, the agent stands the loss. (Caffrey v Darby, 6 Vesey 496; Story, Agency, sec. 208.) So it is the duty of the agent to keep the principal informed of his doings in the agency; and if by neglect of this the principal suffers loss through want of notice to protect himself, the agent is liable in indemnity. (Johnston & Sharp v Baillie, 2 June 1815, F. C.; Story, Agency, sec. 208; Paley, by Lloyd, 27.) In answer to a claim by the principal, the agent cannot as a general rule set up the adverse title of a third person to defeat the claim of the principal against himself, nor dispute the title of his principal. An insurance broker effected a policy on ship in name of a partnership, and on a loss received the money: held answerable for it to the surviving partner, although the partnership had no legal title to the vessel, and the broker himself was, as mortgagee, sole registered owner. Dixon v Hammond, 2 B. and A. 310. See Roberts v Ogilvy, 9 Price 269; Kieran v Sanders, 6 Ad. and El. 515; Nicholson v Knowles, 5 Mad. 47; Holl v Griffin, 10 Bing. 246; Harman v Anderson, 2 Camp. 243; Stonard v Donkin, 2 Camp. 344; Goslin v Birnie, 7 Bing. 339; White v Bartlett, 9 Bing. 378; Hawes v Watson, 2 B. and C. 540; Paley, by Lloyd, 53, 80; Story on Bailments, sec. 110; Agency, 217. An agreement by an agent by a receipt granted to a third person to hold for that third person property belonging to his principal, amounts to a conversion of the property. (Holbrook v Wight, 24 Wendell R. (Amer.) 169; cited by Story, Agency, 217.) But the agent may found a defence of this kind on the principal's fraud or tort in getting the goods from the third person whose better title is set up. Hardman v Wilcock, 9 Bing. 382, note; Taylor v Plumer, 3 M. and S. 562; 2 Story, Equity Jurisp. sec. 317; Sheridan v New Quay Co., 28 L. J. C. P. 58; Cheesman v Exall, 20 L. J. Ex. 209; Biddle v Bond, 34 L. J. Q. B. 137, where held that a bailee may set up the jus tertii as a defence against the bailor, where the bailment has been terminated by what is equivalent to eviction by a paramount title. Sometimes, where an agent has bought and received delivery of goods by mandate of his principal, a question may arise whether the dominium is thereby vested in the agent, with obligation to transmit it to the principal, or in the principal immediately. Stair (i. 12. 16) makes this question turn on whether the contract with the seller is in the agent's own name or the principal's. But see the civilians in Bachovius on Treutler, vol. ii. p. 145; de Acq. and Amitt. Possess.; and Savigny on Possession, b. ii. sec. 28; Perry's Tr. pp. 225-7.

The agent may attempt to plead against the principal's claim the illegality of the transactions in which he was engaged by mandate on behalf of the principal; but if he have actually got money for the principal, the illegality of the business of which it was the fruit does not in England affect the principal's right to recover it out of his hands. The law would not enable the principal to recover from the debtor under the illegal contract; but when that contract is at an end, the agent's liability to pay over what he has received under it is not considered as tainted with its illegality, so as to enable him to retain what he received for his principal's use. The original illegal transaction forms no part, it has been held, of the implied contract arising from the receipt of the money, which implied contract forms the ground of the principal's claim. (Farmer v Russell, 1 B. and P. 296, 7 Vesey 473; Tenant v Elliot, 1 B. and P. 3; Bousfield v Wilson, 16 M. and W. 185; Nicholson v Gooch, 5 E. and B. 999, 25 L. J. Q. B. 137, 147; Johnson v Lausley, 12 C. B. 468.) But if the principal's demand cannot be brought before the Court, in the simple shape of an action for money had and received to the principal's use, but must be made out through the medium of the illegal contract itself, he cannot enforce it. (Ex parte Bulmer, 13 Vesey 313; Buck v Buck, 1 Camp. 547; Paley, by Lloyd, 64.) As long as money deposited with an

to claim on his estate:¹ 1. For the balance in account between him and the principal; and, agent for an illegal purpose remains unemployed, or if the purpose be countermanded by the principal before application, it is a debt which he may recover out of the agent's hands. (Taylor v Lendie, 9 East 49; Parry v Roberts, 3 A. and E. 118; Fletcher v Marshall, 15 M. and W. 755.) But the principal cannot make the agent repay the money, if it has been applied on his order to the illegal purpose, though the contrary was once held. (Wilkinson v Kitchen, 1 Lord Raym. 89; Smith v Bromley, Dougl. 696, note; Tomkins v Barnet, 1 Salk. 22; Hastelow v Jackson, 8 B. and C. 222, and cases there.)]

¹ [Claims by the Agent.—The claims of the agent in the principal's bankruptcy will be, (1) for commission if it was not a gratuitous agency; (2) for reimbursement and for indemnification against obligations undertaken to third parties. The claim for reimbursement or indemnification must be on the ground of the disbursements having been made and the obligations incurred ex causa mandati and inculpabiliter. (Poth. Mand. sec. 68.) Even where the agent may have a right of action against the third party, there is a direct claim against the principal without discussing the third party, unless our law should make the exception of according to 'Mandatores Pecuniæ Credendæ,' the beneficium ordinis given to them by the Novell. (Poth. Mand. 70, l. 7, Cod. Mand.) Where the agent has expended not money, but goods, ex causa mandati, their value is to be taken in a claim against the principal as at the date when he employed them for the business of the agency. Quum mandati agetur, æstimatio ejus ad id tempus quo solutum sit, non quo agetur, referri debet. (L. 37, D. de Mand.) Interest will be chargeable where by the course of dealing or custom of business it may be fairly presumed due. (Story, sec. 338; 2 Livermore 17; Dig. xvii. 1. 12. 9; Bruce v Hunter, 3 Camp. 467.) Losses sustained by the agent, if the business forming the object of the mandate has been the proximate cause, are also chargeable as sustained ex causa mandati. (Poth. Mand. sec. 75; Story, sec. 339; Livermore ii. 18.) But it is necessary to discriminate between losses of which the agency has been the cause, and those of which it has only been the occasion. In the latter case no indemnification is due to the agent; nam hæc magis casui quam mandato imputari debent. (Dig. Mand. l. 26, sec. 6; Pothier, Mand. 76; Story, sec. 341; Livermore ii. 21; Ersk. iii. 3. 34, 38; Heineccius, El. Jur. Nat. and Gentium, i. 13, sec. 349, not.) The same principle applies to a partner who has sustained loss in the course of the business of the copartnership (Poth. ibid.), for he is as to his management an agent for the whole concerned. The Roman jurists give cases illustrative of the difference, divided by very subtle distinctions, if they do not in some instances really contradict each other. See, for example, the cases put by Paulus (D. xvii. 1. 26. 6), and compare Julian (xvii. 2. 52. 4); and see Pothier's explanation conformably to the leading distinction between the agency causing the loss (as if the risk of it was one necessary to be run for the sake of the agency or partnership business, and to which the agent would not have exposed himself but for that necessity), and the agency business being merely the occasion of his being exposed to the incidence of the misfortune, as he might have been independently of the agency. There are not many cases in the books turning on this distinction; but Mr. Livermore (ii. 27) has detailed a very interesting one, decided by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania (D'Arcy v Lyle, 5 Binney 441), where the Court, on the authority of Erskine and Heineccius, supra cit., found in favour of an agent for reimbursement of losses which befell him, and reparation of injuries done to him by Christophe, the tyrant of Hayti, on account of the enmity the latter bore to the principal. Another case in which the same distinction applies, is where the holder of a draft has falsified it so as to increase the amount of the sum which the drawer orders the drawee to pay. The contract between the drawer and drawee is a mandate pecuniæ credendæ or solvendæ; and the drawer's right to reimbursement against the funds of the principal in his hands, or against the principal personally, depends like that of any other mandatory on whether or not he has paid the money ex causa mandati. Pothier has applied the distinction between the case where loss is suffered by an agent ex causa, or ex occasione mandati, to the loss the drawee suffers by paying a falsified draft. (Pothier, Tr. du Contr. de Change, Nos. 99–104, q.v.) Again, the agent's disbursements must not only be made ex causa mandati, but inculpabiliter, i.e. that it has not been the agent's fault which has given occasion to the expenditure or loss. Pothier points out that the principles applicable are the same as those which regulate the case of a claim by the cautioner on the debtor for whom he has paid, as e.g. with regard to the omission to propound proper exceptions and defences that the principal might have opposed against the creditor,—the case of a cautioner's recourse on the debtor being, in fact, only a particular case of mandate. Omission by the agent to propound a defence not competent to the principal if he had been sued, but personal to the agent himself, will not bar recourse by the agent against the principal. (Poth. Mand. 78 et seq.; Scott, 9 July 1752, Elch. Caut. 24; Watson v Bruce, M. 5964; Huntley v Sanderson, 1 Cr. and Mees. 467.) Where an agent had endorsed a bill of which the principal was acceptor, and so primary debtor, and the agent paid it although he had no notice of the bill having been dishonoured, and which he was therefore under no legal obligation to pay, this was held no defence against the agent's action for relief, the principal debtor being bound at all events to the holder, and requiring no notice of his own dishonour of the bill, and the agent being, if not legally, morally bound to discharge his obligation. See, to same effect, Dig. xvii. 1. 29. 6; Simpson v Penton, 2 Cr. and M. 430; Alexander v Vane, 1 M. and W. 511, as explained by Pitman, Principal and Surety, p. 3, and p. 130, notes. Still it has been said, that if the principal had ordered the agent to state the personal defence, and the agent refused; or if, again, the agent knew that the principal refused to pay, and the agent still, though not personally liable by reason of the defence he had, should for the sake of his character, which would be affected by the discredit of the principal, choose to pay,—it has been said that in such a case the agent would not have recourse against the principal, though the principal himself might have been compelled to pay in the first instance. (Child v Morley, 8 T. R. 610. See Paley, by Lloyd, p. 110; but also Poth. Oblig. No. 434; Dig. Mand. l. 48 and l. 10.) So, where disbursements have been made without necessity, reimbursement will be due only ad concurrentiam of what it was necessary to disburse. (D. Mand. l. 52; Poth. M. 78; Paley, by Lloyd, 108–9; Story, sec. 336; Howard v Tucker,

2. For relief or indemnification from any liabilities which as factor he may have undertaken for the principal.¹

1 B. and Ad. 712; Wolfe v Horncastle, 1 B. and P. 323.) But the necessity is not to be judged of ex eventu (Poth. M. No. 79). The principal will be entitled to set off, against the agent's claims for reimbursement, all loss happening to him through the agent's fault. (Story, sec. 348; Paley, Lloyd, 116; Capp v Topham, 6 East 392.) Nor will the agent be entitled to recover from the principal advances made for an illegal purpose, or in prosecution of an illegal dealing, though sanctioned by or even undertaken at the request of the principal (Josephs v Pebrer, 3 B. and C. 639): at least this will be the case where the illegality must necessarily appear in prosecuting the claim; but the Court will not be astute to detect an illegality, or bring into notice illegality of which the ground of action is independent, to defeat an agent's claim for reimbursement by the principal (Lloyd's note to Paley, 102-3). See note, ante, p. 533. The moral reason of this is stated by Poth. Mand. No. 7. The courts need not be astute to find illegality in order to enable one rogue to defeat the better right of another. There are cases in which, without any fault on the part of the agent, or any illegality in the advances or in the business of the agency, the agent may be excluded from personal recourse upon the principal for advances on or disbursements about goods, though the goods do not sell for what will repay the agent; as where, either by express agreement, or usage of trade from which such agreement may be inferred, there is an exclusion of the personal responsibility of the principal, and an undertaking by the agent to rely merely on the goods, taking the risk of their yielding him what he may advance on and disburse about them. But where a factor receives goods to sell on del credere commission, and sells to buyers who fail, he cannot, of course, recover any advances within the amount of the price. A waiver of personal recourse by the factor may be presumed from his conduct; as, if he sell on credit, and then settle with the principal before the credit has expired, deducting his commission, and paying over the balance: for in such case, the paying over the balance may be fairly treated as an assumption of the outstanding debt by the factor. No English case seems to go this length, but there are several American cases cited by Story, Agency, secs. 343, 385.

Erskine (iii. 3. 32) lays down that in dubio it will be presumed that a mandatory is not intended to have a claim for compensation for his services; but wherever the services are of a kind which the agent holds himself out as making it his ordinary trade or profession to render, the presumption will be that he was meant to have the ordinary remuneration. In commercial agencies remuneration is always implied, the amount of which, in the absence of specific agreement, is regulated by the usage of trade in the business and place in which the agent is employed. (Story, sec. 326; Eicke v Meyer, 3 Camp. 412; Cohen v Paget, 4 Camp. 96; Roberts v Jackson, 2 Stark. 225; Chapman v De Tastet, 2 Stark. 294.) Where there is no usage of trade, a reasonable compensation will be modified by the Court. (Poth. Pand. 17. 1. 74; Dig. 50. 14. 3; 1 Domat. 1. 17. 2. 2; Story, ib.) Cases may exist where, though not intended to be gratuitous, the services are to be left to the goodwill, generosity, or sense of duty of the employer. Where an agent performed work for a committee, under a resolution that any services of his were to be taken into consideration, and such remuneration to be made as 'shall be deemed right,' the committee were held entitled to judge whether or not any compensation was due, and the agent to have no legal claim to anything, having thrown himself entirely on the generosity of his employers. But if it were plain that he was to receive some remuneration, and the mere fixing of the amount was left to the employer, he might sue if none were fixed, or none which in a just sense, and allowing the employer all fair latitude in valuing the services, could be considered reasonable. (Taylor v Brewer, 1 M. and S. 290; Story, Agency, sec. 325; Roberts v Smith, 4 H. and N. 315, 28 L. J. Ex. 164. See Bryant v Flight, 5 M. and W. 114; Parker v Ibbetson, 27 L. J. C. P. 236.) The right of an agent to his commission depends, as a general rule, on the complete performance of the whole duty or service, as a condition precedent of his right to demand it. (Story, Agency, sec. 329; Mestaer v Atkins, 1 Marsh. 76; Hammond v Holiday, 1 Car. and Payne 384; Reed v Rann, 10 B. and C. 438; Broad v Thomas, 7 Bingh. 99.) It does not matter whether the completion of the undertaking by the agent is prevented by accident or the neglect of the agent, or by the act of the owner in otherwise effecting the business. (Broad v Thomas; Dalton v Irwin, 4 C. and P. 289; Simpson v Lamb, 25 L. J. C. P. 113; Green v Mules, 30 L. J. C. P. 343; Moffat v Lawrie, 24 L. J. C. P. 56; Cutter v Powell, 6 T. R. 320, S. C.; Smith's L. C. ii. 1.) With regard to the rules which regulate the right to commission on the part of shipbrokers and other agents, whose business is to introduce parties to each other with a view to a contract, see Mestaer v Atkins, 1 Marsh. 76; Reed v Rann, 10 B. and C. 438; Broad v Thomas, 4 C. and P. 338; Dalton v Irwin, 4 C. and P. 289; Cohen v Paget, 4 Camp. 96; Brown v Nairne, 9 C. and P. 204; Winter v Mair, 3 Taunt. 531; Haines v Busk, 5 Taunt. 521; Roberts v Jackson, 2 Stark. 225; Eicke v Meyer, 3 Camp. 412; Wilkinson v Martin, 8 C. and P. 1; Alder v Boyle, 16 L. J. C. P. 232; Burnett v Bouch, 9 C. and P. 620; Smith v Boucher, 1 C. and K. 573; Hill v Ketching, 15 L. J. C. P. 251; Antrobus v Wickens, 4 F. and F. 291; Green v Bartlett, 32 L. J. C. P. 261; Cousins v Hutcheson, 3 F. and F. 236; Gibson v Crick, 2 F. and F. 766; Lockwood v Levick, 8 C. B. N. S. 603. If an agent bargains to give his whole time to the business of the principal, he will not be permitted to derive compensation for services rendered to other persons. (Thompson v Havelock, 1 Camp. 527; Gardner v M'Hutcheon, 4 Beav. 534.) These services will be dealt with as done for the principal's behoof (Paley, by Lloyd, 106). If an agent depart from his character of agent for his employer, and act adversely to him in any part of the transaction, his right to commission will be forfeited: as where, having bought for his principal at a month's credit, he was induced to delay the delivery of the goods till the expiration of the credit, and then to tender them on payment, he was considered not only to have forfeited his commission, but to have precluded himself from recovering the money he had paid for the price and duties (Hurst v Holding, 3 Taunt. 32).

II. CLAIMS BY THIRD PARTIES.—THIRD PARTIES, who have dealt with the factor, have a claim against the estate of the principal as if they had dealt with himself.

1. The agent's contract entered into as factor for a known principal, forms a good ground of action or claim against the principal, provided the power is proved and the limits duly observed.¹ And there will be no action against the factor unless the principal is abroad.² Such is the case of a rider to a manufacturing house. In taking an order in the name of the house, he binds the house to furnish the article.³

In such cases, 1. If the claim is against the principal, as the buyer of goods, for the price, it is merely for a dividend, even although the goods be still with the agent or factor distinguishable.⁴ 2. If the claim is against the principal, as seller of the goods, for delivery or for damages, it is also in this case merely personal. But if the agent act in a neutral capacity, as a general commission agent, uniting the business of a custodier with that of a [492] broker acting for both parties, the property may in such situations be held as transferred, to the effect of vesting a real right in the buyer.⁵

2. Where the contract is not in the principal's name, but generally as with a factor, the election will be with the third party, to hold to the credit of the factor, or to seek his remedy against the principal.⁶ And the remedy against the principal will not be hurt, either, first, By any private agreement between the principal and the factor, that the factor alone shall be responsible;⁷ or, secondly, Where the principal has paid the price to his agent, who has squandered it,⁸ unless the day of payment has been allowed to pass, and the principal has been led to believe that the agent alone was relied on;⁹ or, thirdly, By the circumstance of the factor failing with a large balance due to the principal.¹⁰

3. Where notice is given of the principal, and the third party chooses to rely on the factor, he will be entitled so to do, but will not also have his claim against the principal.¹¹

4. Even where the factor contracts in his own name, the principal is bound to the third

² Where the principal is abroad, the factor will be liable directly. De Gaillon v L'Aigle, 1 Bos. and Pull. 368; Pothier, Contr. de Mandat. No. 87, vol. ii. 188; Sm. Merc. L. 164. It is otherwise with a shipmaster. See Of Maritime Contracts, p. 545. [It has since been held that there is no absolute presumption that an agent, transacting factorio nomine for a [foreign house, is personally liable. Miller v Mitchell, 22 D. 833; Heald v Kenworthy, 24 L. J. Ex. 76. Infra, p. 543, note.]

⁶ Waring v Favenck, 1807, 1 Camp. 85, where coffee was sold to a broker, but the principal's name not mentioned. The broker failed, and an action was brought against the principal. Lord Ellenborough held, that as the purchase had been made for the defendants by their agent, it was the same as if made directly by the defendants themselves, and that this was therefore the common case of goods sold and delivered. [Ferrier v Dodds, 1865, 3 Macph. 561.]

⁷ Rich v Coe, Cowper 636. This rests on the principle of the actio utilis institoria. See Pauli Sentent. xi. 8. 2.

⁸ Kymer v Suwercrop, 1807, 1 Camp. 109, where coffee was sold by auction to a broker, the principal not disclosed. There was no delay in asking payment, so as to lead the principal to believe the broker had got credit, and so to induce him to pay the broker. The question was, Whether a payment by the principal to the broker in that case discharged the claim against the principal? Lord Ellenborough said: A person selling goods is not confined to the credit of a broker who buys them, but may resort to the principal, on whose account they are bought; and he is no more affected by the state of accounts between the two, than I should be were I to deliver goods to a man's servant, pursuant to his order, by the consideration of whether the servant was indebted to the master or the master to the servant. If he lets the day of payment go by, he may lead the principal into a supposition that he relies solely on the broker; and if, in that case, the price of the goods has been paid to the broker, on account of this deception, the principal shall be discharged. But here payment was demanded of the defender on the several days it became due, etc.

¹¹ Lord Mansfield says in Rich v Coe, Cowp. 639: 'If it appeared that a tradesman had notice of a contract, by which the shipmaster was to keep the ship in repair, and in consequence of it gave credit to the captain individually, as the responsible person; particular circumstances of this sort might afford a ground to say he meant to absolve the owners, and to look singly to the personal security of the master.'

party, on his name and interest being disclosed.¹ But this is to be taken under these limitations: 1. That if he knowingly have elected the agent as his debtor, he will not have his remedy against the principal;² and, 2. That where the principal is induced to settle with [493] the factor by means of documents, etc., furnished to the agent, the principal will be discharged.³ Where the principal is made liable, he and the factor will reciprocally have the benefit of their private stipulations as to responsibility, and of their correlative rights in respect to the state of the balance in account between them. The third party is entitled to hold the factor as the principal, so that a purchaser of goods from a factor may resist a demand for the price by the principal, on the ground of compensation or set-off.⁴ An exception is admitted to this rule in England in the case of a broker, who is so far different from a factor, that a factor is trusted with possession of the goods, and persons dealing with him cannot know whether he is proprietor or not; whereas a broker is not so trusted, and the employer is entitled to rely on his not selling in his own name, while third parties can be deceived only through their own neglect.⁵

² Paterson v Gandasequi, 1812, 15 East 62. Here Gandasequi, a Spanish merchant, being in London, employed Larrazabat & Co. to purchase for him goods for the foreign market. They bought from Paterson, Gandasequi being present and examining the goods. They were invoiced to Larrazabat & Co. as on their credit, and Larrazabat & Co. debited Gandasequi with the amount. Larrazabat & Co. failed before the credit expired, and the sellers brought an action against Gandasequi. Lord Ellenborough directed a nonsuit, and this was confirmed by the Court. Lord Ellenborough said: The Court have not the least doubt, that if it distinctly appeared the defendant was the person for whose use and on whose account the goods were bought, and that the plaintiff knew that fact at the time of the sale, there would not be the least pretence for charging the defendant in this action. And the Court being clear that the jury did right in finding the election to have been made in knowledge of that fact, the rule was made absolute.

See Addison v Gandasequi, 1812, 4 Taunt. 574. This was a case in Common Pleas, almost precisely like that in the King's Bench, and decided in the same way.

Hood v Sir A. J. Cochrane, 16 Jan. 1816, Fac. Coll. This Scottish case was very similar to the above English case. Here goods were furnished for Sir A. J. Cochrane's estates in Trinidad, on the order and credit of Scott Moncrieff & Robertson, his agents in Scotland. Scott Moncrieff & Robertson became bankrupt, and Sir A. Cochrane settled accounts with them. The furnisher of the goods made a demand for the price of the goods. But the Court held that he had elected the agents as his debtors, in the knowledge of the principal. The Court had the English case before them, and decided conformably. [But see note 5, infra.]

⁵ Baring v Corrie, 1818, 2 Barn. and Ald. 137.

[Where an agent is sought to be charged on a contract made as for him by a person professing to be his agent, the onus of proving that he was agent, and had authority to bind the principal by such terms, or otherwise of proving such conduct on the principal's part as shall estop him from denying the agency, lies with the creditor. (Pole v Leask, 33 L. J. Ch. 155.) Where the agent is the actual party to the contract, and primarily liable to be sued, the right of the creditor afterwards, on discovery of the principal, to charge him, is subject to the conditions stated in the text. See, besides the cases there referred to, Thomson v Davenport, 9 B. and C. 78, 86, 88; Smyth v Anderson, 7 C. B. 21, 36; Smethurst v Mitchell, 28 L. J. Q. B. 241, 246. But see Bottomley v Nuttall, 5 C. B. N. S. 122. It is sometimes laid down, that where a person purchases goods, through the medium of an agent, from a seller ignorant that he is dealing with an agent, the seller cannot recover against the principal if the principal has paid the agent, or if the state of accounts between them is so altered between the purchase and the claim that it would make it unjust that the principal should be called on to pay. That statement of the conditions limiting the creditor's right to claim against the principal is too loose and inexact. The principal will not be discharged from the seller's claim by a payment to his agent, or a set-off arising against him, unless the seller have, by his words, or writing, or conduct, authorized the principal to pay the money to the agent, or have thereby induced the principal to alter his condition or position as regards accounts towards the agent. The rule is, that if a man order an agent to buy goods, he is bound to see that the agent pays them; and the giving of money to his agent for that purpose does not amount to implement of that obligation towards the creditor, unless the money be actually so applied. If, however, the seller have by word or conduct authorized the principal to pay, or have induced him to pay the agent or accredit him further, on the supposition that the agent has settled with the seller, then the principal would be discharged, for the seller has induced him to alter his position. (See Parke, B., in Heald v Kenworthy, 10 Ex. 739, 24 L. J. Ex. 76, 77; Kymer v Suwercrop, supra; Campbell v Hicks; Macfarlane v Giannocopulo, 28 L. J. Ex. 72; Horsfall v Fauntleroy, 10 B. and C. 755.) In Smyth v Anderson it was held, that where goods are sold to an agent for the real buyer, and the seller takes the bills of the agent in payment, he thereby makes it the duty of, and so authorizes, the principal to remit funds to the agent to meet the bills; and he cannot, after giving such implied authority to remit to the

5. A del credere commission affects the settlement only between the principal and factor, relative to money to be recovered from third parties;¹ as a factor with a del credere is responsible that the buyer shall pay the price. But although the factor will, on the buyer's failure (himself being solvent), have right to claim on the buyer's estate in satisfaction of his obligation to guarantee, he is not so much a creditor as, on the one hand, to deprive the buyer of the benefit of retention or compensation against the principal; nor, on the other, to give to his own creditors the benefit of the claim against the buyer, while they pay only a dividend to the principal. In the former case, compensation or retention against the principal will discharge the guarantee, and so be a good answer to the factor's claim; in the latter, the principal will have his claim against the buyer in the bankruptcy, and also against the factor on his guarantee.

6. Claims may sometimes be available to third parties against the estate of the principal, in consequence of the acts of the agent, though unauthorized by the principal. Thus, 1. Representations by the agent, in the strict course of the contract, will be taken to form a part of the contract with the principal; and the concealment or misrepresentation of the agent will also affect the principal.² 2. On the same principle, notice to a factor or agent will be held as notice to the principal, provided such factor has power to treat and negotiate the contract.³ And, 3. The principal is liable civilly for the neglect or fraud of his agent, committed in execution of the authority given to him.

agent, turn round and seek to render the principal liable after he has remitted, even though the bills may be dishonoured. In Smethurst v Mitchell, where the seller, after discovery of the real principal, and after the day of payment had passed, delayed for a long time to make any claim against the principal, and thereby induced him to suppose that the agent only was treated as liable, and to give the agent bills for the amount of the debt which were negotiated, and where he subsequently dealt with the agent on the supposition that the latter only was liable, the seller was held to be precluded from charging the principal. But it is not enough that the creditor's conduct might have induced, it is necessary that it did induce, the principal to alter his position to his prejudice. The creditor's claim against the principal will not be barred if it appear that his dealing with the principal, however fitted to prejudice, has not in point of fact prejudiced the principal; as, e.g., if he had not placed funds in the hands of the agent, or the like. Tapley v Martens, 8 T. R. 451; Marsh v Pedder, 4 Camp. 257; Everett v Collins, 2 Camp. 515; Robinson v Read, 9 B. and C. 449. In the last case, although the creditor took the agent's bill, and renewed it twice afterwards, deducting discount for the first, which was the usual period of credit, and adding interest in the other two cases; and although during all that time the principal had a balance due to him in the agent's hands down to the date of the agent's failure, yet Lord Tenterden, and Parke, J., held the principal still liable, on the ground that the fact of the balance being due him by the agent was not known to him, he never having inspected the agent's accounts, and that he did not appear to have been induced to forbear to his own prejudice by the conduct of the creditor, as, from his neglect to inquire into the agent's accounts, or how the agent was using his funds, it seemed that the indulgence given by him to the agent was not the consequence of any supposition that the agent had used the funds in paying the creditor. And so a receipt given by the creditor to the agent for the debt, does not necessarily of itself discharge the principal; nor will it, unless it appear to have induced him to deal differently with the agent on the faith of the debt being paid, as by passing it in his accounts, and allowing him further credit thereafter. (Wyatt v M. of Hertford, 2 East 147.) If the creditor voluntarily and for his own convenience take the agent's bill, without insisting upon payment in cash when he might have had cash, this will operate as absolute payment in a question between creditor and principal, although the bill have been dishonoured; but not if the creditor took the bill because he could not get payment in cash, or if he take it as payment only conditionally on its being paid, and not as absolute payment. The acceptance of the bill, in satisfaction and discharge of the debt, so as to operate an absolute and not merely as a conditional payment, extinguishes the original debt at the time; and therefore it will, without any question as to whether the principal's position is afterwards prejudiced or not, discharge the principal; and the question whether the bill is so accepted of by the creditor depends on the intention shown by the parties in the transaction, and is one of fact. (Sard v Rhodes, 1 M. and W. 153; Lewis v Lyster, 2 C. M. and R. 704; Goldshede v Cottrel, 2 M. and W. 20; Maillard v D. of Argyle, 6 M. and G. 40; Kemp v Watt, 15 M. and W. 672; Anderson v Hillus, 12 C. B. 499; Marsh v Pedder; Smith v Ferrand, supra.) If the creditor take the agent's bill, and give him a receipt as for cash, that would be evidence of an intention to take the bill as absolute payment, and would extinguish the original debt, and leave the agent, as the only party liable upon the bill, the sole debtor, for the subsequent dishonour of the bill would not revive the original debt. In these cases the question is not whether the principal is prejudiced, but whether the debt due by him was innovated and discharged. In Priestley v Fernie, 3 H. and C. 977, it was held that if the creditor sue and attain judgment against the agent, he cannot afterwards bring a second action against the principal.]

II.—CLAIMS ON THE BANKRUPTCY OF THE FACTOR OR AGENT.

The claims which may thus arise are either, 1. By the estate of the factor against the principal or third party; or, 2. By the principal or third party against the estate of the factor.

1. Claims by the Factor or Agent.

The agent's estate may have a claim against third parties, or against the principal.

1. CLAIMS AGAINST THIRD PARTIES.—Against third parties the agent's estate has a right of action, to the effect of preserving any lien or other security for indemnity against [494] the principal.¹

2. CLAIMS AGAINST THE PRINCIPAL.—Where the factor has made special advances on goods consigned to him, his creditors will be entitled to have the goods sold for repayment of the advances; as the factor himself might have insisted on proceeding with the sales, unless indemnified.² There may, however, be a difference in this respect, that if the factor be solvent, he cannot be deprived of his commission, on the faith of which he may have made his advances; whereas his bankruptcy, putting an end to his character as a trader, may perhaps entitle the principal to withdraw his goods, on merely indemnifying the factor for his advances.

2. Claims against the Agent's Estate.

The claims against the bankrupt estate of the factor or agent may be by third parties, or by the principal.

1. CLAIMS BY THIRD PARTIES.—It is a general rule, that (unless in the case of ship-masters) agents properly authorized, contracting for a known principal, are not personally responsible on such contracts.³ Therefore, where both the principal and the agent have failed, there is a claim only against the estate of the principal, not against that of the agent, unless the credit of the agent has been specially relied on, or the name of the principal has been concealed,⁴ or the principal is abroad.⁵

bought them of that person through their broker. The defendants did not know that the goods belonged to the plaintiffs, but the broker did, from having been previously in the employment of the person employed to sell, but not from anything which was communicated to him while acting as the defendant's broker in the transaction. Held that the defendants were affected by such knowledge of their broker, and were therefore not entitled to set off a debt due to them from the person employed to sell against the plaintiff's claim for the price of the goods. Dresser v Norwood, 32 L. J. C. P. 201, 34 L. J. C. P. 48, Ex. Ch. See Brown v Savage, 4 Drew 635; ex parte Nutting, 2 M. D. and De G. 302; ex parte Bolton, 26 L. J. Bank. 450; Edwards v Martin, L. The question as to notice to an official of an incorporated company, is not, as the cases show, quite on all fours with notice to the agent of an individual or a private company. In Wyllie v Pollen (32 L. J. Ch. 782) it was laid down by the Lord Chancellor, that in order to affect a principal with constructive notice of facts within the knowledge of an agent, it is necessary not only that the knowledge should be derived from the same transaction; but it must be a knowledge of facts which are material to that transaction, and which it was the duty of the agent to communicate. The doctrine of constructive notice is very large; but see the cases collected in Kerr on Fraud and Mistake, pp. 172–204; and see Parsons' Contr. i. 74–77; Story, Agency, secs. 140, 451.

But where the agent specially engages his personal credit, or where he exceeds his instructions, or where he is guilty of any fraud, or misrepresentation, or negligence (whether the principal may be bound by such conduct or not), a claim will lie against his estate by the third party. [*Note on Personal Responsibility of Agents, infra.*¹]

¹ [An agent may contract in his own name, without disclosing to the third party the fact of his having any principal, as if he were himself the principal; or he may contract as agent of a principal whose name is disclosed; or he may contract in the character of agent for a principal whose name is not disclosed. Again, in contracting, even in the case where he avows his character of agent, and even where he discloses the name of his principal, he may, by the form or terms of the contract, either limit his responsibility to that of a mere instrument or minister for the principal, or he may incur a personal obligation which shall bind himself and his heirs and estate, though on account of the principal. Where an agent contracts in his own name without mentioning his character of agent at all, he makes himself personally responsible; for in such a case the other party necessarily relies on his credit as having no other person to look to. And although the unknown principal, on being discovered, shall also be held liable, still this will not relieve the agent of the personal responsibility incurred at the time of the contract: he will still continue liable, to the effect of the creditor's being entitled to sue him, if he please, in preference to the principal. (Per Lord Denman in Jones v Littledale, 6 Ad. and Ellis 490; Story, Agency, sec. 160 (a), 266.) Where, at the time of the contract, the agent acts for a principal whose name is disclosed, and in the character of agent, the general rule is, that no personal responsibility is incurred by the agent. In such a case, it is not the agent who is party to the contract, but the principal who contracts through his agency or ministry; and it is the principal, and not the agent, who is bound by the contract so made. (Owen v Gooch, supra; Pothier, Oblig. secs. 53 to 84, secs. 447-8; Mand. secs. 87, 88; Emerigon, Assur. c. 5, sec. 3; De Grosse, Avent. c. 4, sec. 2; Story, sec. 261; 2 Kent Lect. 41.) Still this general rule is to be guarded by several observations. It is perfectly competent for an agent avowing his principal, voluntarily to incur a personal responsibility in the contract made for the principal's behoof, and to pledge his personal faith and credit for its fulfilment. (Story, sec. 269; Paley, by Lloyd, 378-9.) The question whether the agent or the principal is the actual party to the contract, as direct personal obligant therein, is, in the case of written contracts, a question of construction; in the case of unwritten contracts, a matter of inference from the circumstances of the contract. See Williamson v Barten, 7 H. and N. 899, 31 L. J. Ex. 170. In the case of written contracts, the question who is the party to, or personal obligant directly bound by the contract, is determined by the writing, which cannot be contradicted or varied by extrinsic evidence. The general presumption is, that the party executing the contract intends a personal liability, unless it appear expressly on the face of the contract that he does not contract personally; and words of description merely, denoting his character of agent, and not exclusive of personal liability, are insufficient for this purpose. (Cooke v Wilson, Parker v Winlow, and cases infra.) Where an agent contracts in writing in such a way as by the form of the writing to make himself personally liable, he cannot relieve himself from liability by evidence that he contracted as agent for a principal, or even that the other party knew he was acting as agent at the time of contracting, for such evidence would tend to contradict the written agreement. (Jones v Littledale, supra; Magee v Atkinson, 2 M. and W. 440; Higgins v Senior, 8 M. and W. 834; Wake v Harrop, 30 L. J. Ex. 273, ibid. 31, 451; Read v Dreaper, 30 L. J. Ex. 268.) The unnamed principal's liability, under a contract made by his agent in the agent's own name, is not, according to the principles of civil law, an obligation upon the contract made by the agent: it is of the nature of an accessory obligation thereto; the principal, as Pothier expresses it (Oblig. sec. 447), being considered as having, by the commission which he has given the agent, consented in advance to all the engagements which the agent shall contract in all matters within the scope of the agency, and as having rendered himself responsible for them. In order that this accessory obligation of the principal shall take place, it is necessary that the agent contract in his own name, though on account of the principal's business; for when the agent contracts expressly in his quality of factor, and per procuration of his principal, it is not the agent who contracts: it is the principal alone who contracts by his ministry a principal and not an accessory obligation. (Poth. Oblig. secs. 447, 74.) This is a plain reason why it should be competent, notwithstanding the obligation of the agent as direct party to a written contract, to show by parole that there was another obligation accessory thereto, undertaken by some one else par advance as principal. It is not contradicting the agent's written obligation, nor taking from or adding to it, but establishing a separate obligation accessory thereto. We have not been able to discover what the precise theory of the unnamed principal's liability is according to the English law. No difficulty is felt regarding it in the light of the Statute of Frauds; yet in America the question has been raised: How, if the agent's obligation is his own, the unwritten obligation of the principal can escape the statute? (See Pars. El. M. L. h. t.) We do not know whether the English doctrine of election, afterwards discussed, turns on the possibility of regarding the agent's signature as either his principal's or his own, but not both. There appears to be in England this peculiarity in regard to bills and notes, and to contracts under seal, signed by an agent in such form as to bind himself personally thereby, that the obligation is exclusively the agent's. An agent signing a bill or promissory note will be personally liable, even though his representative capacity and his principal are known to the creditor, unless he sign per procurationem or on behalf of the principal. Beckham v Drake—per Parke, B.—9 M. and W. 79, 96; Siffkin v Walker, 2 Camp. 308; Emly v Lee, 15 East 7; Bottomley v Fisher, 31 L. J. Ex. 417; Leadbitter v Farrow, 5 M. and S. 345; Sowerby v Butcher, 2 C. and M. 368. See Webster v M'Calman, 10 D. 1133; Woodside v Cuthbertson, 10 D. 604; Thomson on Bills, pp. 218-9, ed. 1837, pp. 152, 181, ed. 1865. And where the agent renders himself personally liable by signing a bill or note otherwise than per procurationem, the principal will not be chargeable at the suit of the creditor (Beckham v Drake, and cases, supra). The same rule holds in England as to

2. CLAIMS BY THE PRINCIPAL.—1. The estate of the factor or agent will be responsible to the principal, wherever he has so conducted himself as to bind the principal to third parties beyond the limits of his instructions. Thus, on the one hand, if an agent sell goods on credit, where he was authorized only to sell them for ready money, or where, by the contracts under seal (Appleton v Burks, 5 East 148). In cases of ordinary written contracts (not bills or deeds), where the agent's representative capacity is clearly disclosed in the body of the writing, but where he has not signed distinctly per procuration only, the courts in England have gone to great niceties on the question of construction, whether he undertakes thereby a personal responsibility or not. See Deslandes v Gregory, 2 El. and El. 602, Ex. Ch.; Williamson v Barton, 31 L. J. Ex. 170; Read v Dreaper, 6 H. and N. 813, 30 L. J. Ex. 208; Fairlee v Fenton, 39 L. J. Ex. 107; Paice v Walker, ibid. 109. In the last case, where a sale-note ran, 'Sold A 200 quarters wheat (as agents for J. S. & Co. of Dantzic),' etc. (signed without any qualification), 'W. & A.,' the Court of Exchequer held the agents personally liable on the contract, on the ground that where a person signs a contract in his own name without qualification, he is prima facie to be deemed to be a person contracting personally; and in order to prevent this liability on the contract from attaching, it must be apparent from the other portions of the instrument that he did not intend to bind himself, and they held the words 'as agents for J. S. & Co.' not sufficient clearly to negative that intention. See also Lennard v Robinson, 24 L. J. Q. B. 275; Tanner v Christian, ibid. 91; Cooke v Wilson, 26 L. J. C. P. 15; Parker v Winlow, 27 L. J. Q. B. 49. In Fairlee v Fenton, supra, decided by the same judges who decided Paice v Walker, the sale-note ran, 'I have this day sold you on account of J. T., 100 bales cotton, (signed) E. F., broker,' it was held that the description of himself, not as agent, but as broker—as a mere middleman or negotiator—and the qualification of the signature, made it clear that no personal liability was intended. In Paice v Walker much importance was attached to the want of any qualification to the signature, though the capacity was stated in the body of the note. See Norton v Herring, 1 C. and P. 648; Wake v Harrop, 30 L. J. Ex. 273, 31 L. J. Ex. 451; Mahoney v Kekule, 23 L. J. C. P. 54; Bowen v Morris, 2 Taunt. 374. Compare Short v Spackman, 2 B. and Ad. 962, with Fawkes v Lamb, 31 L. J. Q. B. 98. As to insurance brokers, see Grove v Dubois, 1 T. R. 112; Koster v Easson, 2 M. and S. 112; Parker v Beasley, 2 M. and S. 423; Baker v Langhorn, 4 Camp. 396; Lee v Bullen, 27 L. J. Q. B. 161; compared with Baker v Langhorn, supra. As to solicitors, Burrell v Jones, 3 B. and Ald. 47; Hall v Ashurst, 1 C. and M. 714; Harper v Williams, 4 Q. B. 219; compared with Downman v Williams, 7 Q. B. 103, and Lewis v Nicholson, 21 L. J. Q. B. 311; and again, compare the latter with Paice v Walker, supra. So, although a person sell goods notoriously as the agent of a certain person, but make out the memorandum of sale and invoice of the goods as bought of himself, he will be personally liable for fulfilment of the contract. (Jones v Littledale, 6 Ad. and Ellis 486; Higgins v Senior, 8 M. and W. 834.) And evidence of a custom of a particular place to send in brokers' notes without disclosing the principal, was held inadmissible to relieve the broker from liability. (Magee v Atkinson, supra.) Where the contract is not written, the question of the agent's liability as the direct obligant depends on the facts and circumstances. In order that the agent be free from liability, and the principal alone chargeable, it must be shown that the principal was disclosed so as to make the contract effected through the ministry of the agent the direct obligation of the principal. (Poth. Oblig. sec. 448.) The creditor must have the name of the principal before he can have the opportunity of contracting with him directly instead of with the agent; otherwise the unavoidable presumption is, that he credits the agent primarily, and not the principal. (See Addison v Gandasequi, 2 Smith L. C. 5th ed. 302; Thomson v Davenport, supra.) But the same result may follow though the agent has disclosed his character as agent, and the name of his principal, at the time of the contract. The whole circumstances may evidence that credit has not been given to the principal alone, or to the principal at all, and may show either that the third party has contracted on the credit of the agent alone, or on the credit of the principal alone, or, as it should seem, on the joint credit of both agent and principal. The question is one for a jury: To whom was the credit given? The case of Paterson v Gandasequi, 15 East 62, was one in which the circumstances were held to indicate, that although the seller knew at the time that the buyer, while dealing with him in his own name, was in truth the agent of another, who was present and selected the goods and cheapened the prices, yet he had nevertheless relied on the agent's credit in selling; and the cases of Addison v Gandasequi in England (4 Taunt. 573), and perhaps that of Hood v Cochrane in Scotland (F. C., 16 Jan. 1816), were of the same kind. Where the principal is known at the time of the contract, and yet the agent is credited, it is held in England, that, having chosen to elect the agent as his debtor, the third party will have no claim against the principal. The presumption is, that the credit given to the agent under such circumstances is an exclusive credit. (Text, p. 537; Story, sec. 291; Paterson v Gandasequi, supra.) 'If,' says Lord Tenterden in Thomson v Davenport (9 B. and C. 78, 86, 2 Smith L. C. 309), 'if at the time of the sale the seller knows, not only that the person who is nominally dealing with him is not principal, but agent, and also knows who the principal really is, and, notwithstanding all that knowledge, chooses to make the agent his debtor, dealing with him, and him alone, then, according to the cases of Addison v Gandasequi and Paterson v Gandasequi, the seller cannot afterwards, on the failure of the agent, turn round and charge the principal, having once made his election at the time when he had the power of choosing between the one and the other.' And see Bayley, J., and Littledale, J. (ib.), and also Ellenborough, C. J., and Bayley, J., in Paterson v Gandasequi, all of whom lay down that the creditor who, knowing the principal, debits the agent, is to be considered as consenting to look to the agent only, and is precluded from looking to the principal. In reference to this doctrine, it is certainly intelligible that, if the facts go to disclose an election, or choice between the agent and principal, and a preference of the one and an abandonment of the other, this election should, if once made, be irrevocable. But it is difficult to understand why—apart from facts indicating a deliberate intention not merely to charge the agent, but to discharge the principal—the credicourse of trade, they ought to have been sold for money only, and the buyer fails, the principal will have a claim against the agent's estate; or, on the other hand, if the agent buy with such authority as will bind the principal to a third party, but beyond the limitation as between themselves, the principal paying the price will have a claim for indemnification.

tor should be put to an election at all, or why there should be a presumption from charging the agent that he exonerated the principal altogether. It is one thing to say, that where the principal is known, the presumption is that the agent does not mean to be bound personally; for that presumption is founded on reason, in so far as the agent is not the party interested. It is quite a different thing to say that, because the agent is bound, the party really interested is not bound, i.e. as neither having meant to be bound nor having been held bound by the creditor. Surely he may be bound as accessory, although the agent be bound as principal obligant. The fact of the principal being known or unknown at the time of the contract, may influence the question of construction of the facts as evidence of the agent's intention to be bound; but assuming that it is clear the agent has bound himself in his own name, why should the principal be released where the creditor knows him, and be bound where the creditor only discovers him afterwards, unless in cases where the creditor, knowing him to be liable, positively renounces his liability, and exonerates him? It appears to be very doubtful indeed, whether the doctrine of election as laid down by Lord Tenterden and others (supra), whatever authority it may have in England, is not altogether repugnant to the principles of the law of Scotland. The principal is, by the civil law, as it rather appears, always liable, either as the direct obligant or as the accessory obligant, according to Pothier's doctrine (supra). See St. i. 12. 18 and 19. There appears to be no doubt (though, from the mode in which the author has treated the subject of agency, both ante, sec. 3, sec. 1, art. 2, and in his Principles, sec. 231, he has rather avoided the point) that the law of Scotland has adopted not only the actio exercitoria and the actio institoria in the special cases of shipmasters and shopmen, etc., to which these particular actions applied, but also the actio utilis institoria, which generalized their application to contracts made by any one commissioned to act for another in any sort of business or affair whatever. (Poth. Oblig. sec. 82.) If so, can the doctrine of the creditor's election between the agent and the principal—as laid down in Thomson v Davenport—be law in Scotland at all, notwithstanding that the author has countenanced the notion (supra, p. 537)? Is there any authority (other than the ambiguous case of Hood v Cochrane) for saying that the English doctrine on this point is the doctrine of the law of Scotland? To return: We have spoken of agents' liability by the law of England in cases where the principal is unknown at the time of sale, and also in cases where his name is known; but there is still the intermediate case, where the agent is known to act for a principal, but the name of the principal is not given or known. In this case, of course, the agent must be primarily liable, for the same reasons as where he acts as if himself the principal; and there seems to be very much the same reason in this case as in that other for holding the liability an exclusive one: for though there is no election possible at first,—which implies a comparison and preference of one credit to the other that cannot take place where the person of the principal is unknown,—yet, as the creditor might know by simply asking the agent, the omission to make the inquiry might reasonably be held to be decisive evidence of a deliberate preference of the agent. But though this was argued in Thomson v Davenport—the case where the question first arose—it was decided that the agent's liability, though it alone exists at first, is not in this case an exclusive one. The principal will be liable when discovered, and the creditor will then have his election between him and the agent. The decision was not considered very satisfactory, and among the dissentients from it are Mr. Justice Parke and Mr. Lloyd (Paley, by Lloyd, p. 249); but it appears to be generally received as fixing the English law on the point. The doctrine of the continental jurisprudence, founded on the civil law, is different. 'It is,' says Emerigon (Ass. c. 5, sec. 3), 'the rule, that he who acts pour compte d'autrui; or for a person to be named, is not personally bound, and acquires nothing for himself, from the time he names the person for whom he has declared himself to act. This nomination has a retroactive effect back to the period of the contract, which is considered as if it had been passed by the person named.' (Casareg. Disc. 5, n. 5, 22 and 85; Disc. 31, n. 17; Disc. 139, n. 1 et seq. Mantica, de tacitis, lib. 14, tit. 28, n. 22.) According to these principles, it seems that he who insures, or causes himself to be insured, expressly pour compte d'autrui, is not obliged personally. (Guidon, de la Mer, ch. 2, art. 6.) Such, he says, is the theory of the civil law; but he observes that in certain cases the usage of commerce has introduced exceptions in maritime affairs; and he quotes two decisions by the Parliament of Aix, holding that an agent chartering a vessel pour compte et risque of a principal named—a foreign principal, however—was personally bound for implement of the contract. See also secs. 4 and 5, ibid. Whether in such a case the law of Scotland would hold the agent bound only conditionally in the event of his not naming his principal, or whether it would follow the English doctrine of an absolute liability on the part of the agent from the first, appears not to be certain, any more than the question whether, when the principal is named, the creditor has or has not the election between principal and agent then accorded to him by the English law. There are, however, even in England, particular cases where, from usage of trade, which has passed into intendment of law, a personal liability on the part of the agent is always presumed, even though the principal be known, unless such liability be very clearly excluded by the terms of the contract. Thus, it is an established rule of maritime law, that upon all contracts made by the master of a ship, for the employment, repairs, and supplies of the ship, the master is always personally bound, unless he takes care by express terms to confine the credit to the owners; but when it is made by the owners themselves, or under circumstances which show that the credit was given to them alone, there is no right of action upon it against the master. (Rich v Coe, 2 Cowp. 636; Hussey v Christie, 9 East 426, 432; Farmer v Davies, 1 T. R. 108; Hoskins v Glayton, Temp. Hardwicke 376.) In this case the remedy is twofold, against the master or the owner, though the latter is known at the time of contract, unless indeed there be special circumstances

It may be questioned whether the claim of the principal may not in some cases stand excluded by the ranking of another creditor. Thus, 1. Where the agent discounts bills of his principal in his hands, a claim will be entered by the endorsee on the factor's estate in consequence of his endorsation: Can the principal also enter a claim in consequence of the

to show an intention to absolve either. (Story, Ag. sec. 294, and cases there; Paley, by Lloyd, 245, 388.) But if either be sued, and judgment obtained against him, the other cannot be sued, though nothing be recovered under the judgment (Priestley v Fernie, 34 L. J. Ex. 173.) Story (sec. 295) lays down the English law differently; and he also holds that the Roman law was the same as that which he says is not English law, but which the decision just mentioned establishes to be so. Emerigon (Ass. c. 4, sec. 10) understands the civil law differently; but Vinnius (Not. ad Peck. Comm. de Re Naut. p. 149, ed. 1647) takes Story's view. The case where an agent avowedly acts for a foreign principal, whether individually known or not, is one with respect to which it has been repeatedly laid down, that the presumption of the law is, that the agent undertakes a personal liability, and is not only liable, but exclusively liable, to the exoneration of the principal, unless from the terms of the contract it is clear that the agent meant to contract upon the credit of the principal exclusively. (Story, sec. 268; Paley, by Lloyd, p. 248; Livermore ii. 249.) But although this may be the understanding of merchants, it is not a rule of law, but merely a presumption of fact, arising from the improbability that credit should be given to the foreigner. (Mahoney v Kekule, 14 C. B. 390; Green v Kopke, 25 L. J. C. P. 297; Wilson v Zulueta, 19 L. J. Q. B. 49; Risbourg v Bruckner, 27 L. J. C. P. 90; Thomson v Davenport, supra, per Parke, B.; Heald v Kenworthy, 10 Ex. 739, 743; per Maule, J., in Smyth v Anderson, 7 C. B. 21, 33; Millar v Mitchell, 1860, 22 D. 833.)

Where a person professes to contract as an agent for another, without being so, or having authority so to contract, he may become liable upon various media for fulfilment of the contract. If he contract expressly as agent for another, without naming any principal, and is in fact himself the real and only principal, he may in general be charged with the liability as a direct party to the contract, just as if he had a real but unnamed principal behind him. (Carr v Jackson, 7 Ex. 382; Schmalz v Avery, 20 L. J. Q. B. 228, 35 L. J. Ex. 211.) And even where the contract contains limitations of the agent's responsibility, he will in such a case still be responsible to the full extent of the stipulations intended to bind the supposed principal (Schmalz v Avery, supra). Where a person makes a contract in writing expressly as agent for another person named as principal, but is himself the real principal, since, by the form of the contract, he is set forth as neither acquiring right nor undertaking obligation, and as being no party to the contract personally, he cannot be allowed to contradict the writing, by showing that he is the real principal, for the purpose of suing in his own name on it. (Bickerton v Burrell, 5 M. and S. 383; Rayner v Grote, 15 M. and W. 359; Boulton v Jones, 27 L. J. Ex. 117.) Where a person contracts as agent for a named principal, without authority to do so, but does not intend to be himself the real principal, it is now settled that he cannot be charged upon the contract, either as a party to it or as real principal. The cases on the different grounds of the agent's liability in cases of this complexion furnish an interesting illustration of the development of a legal principle.

In Smout v Ilbery (10 M. and W. 1), where a husband went abroad leaving his wife with authority to order goods on his credit for the use of herself and her family, and died during his absence, whereby the authority ceased, and the wife, until she received notice of his death, continued to order goods as before, it was held that she was not liable for the goods supplied after her husband's death, but before notice of it, because she never meant to pledge her own credit; nor (Blades v Free, 9 B. and C. 167) could the executor of the husband be charged for the goods, because the authority to order them was revoked by his death. The latter portion of the doctrine may well be doubted upon the principles of our law. But in this case there was clearly no ground of liability on the part of the wife. There was no fraud, for she had got the authority, and did not know of its revocation. In supposing it to continue, she and the creditor were in pari casu, the creditor as well as she virtually contracting upon the condition that she had received authority, and that, so far as she knew, it was not withdrawn. She could not be understood to warrant or affirm more than that; and so there appears to be no possible ground of liability on her part, either on fraud or on implied warranty of her authority continuing. This, however, is quite a different case from even a bona fide mistake, on the part of a person representing himself to be an agent, as to the genuineness of his mandate, as if he has been deceived by a forged mandate. There the third party, dealing with him on the faith of its being genuine, is not in the same position as he is; nor can he know the grounds on which the agent asserts his authority to be sufficient. The agent might have avoided the mistake by greater care: he is bound to know whether his authority is genuine. The other party is obliged to rely merely on the agent's correctness, without having means of judging equally with him. And such a case as Smout v Ilbery is still more clearly distinguishable from the case where, without any morally fraudulent intent, an agent assumes and holds himself out as having authority which he has not, however he hopes to have his assumption of it confirmed. In Pechell v Walter (3 B. and Ad. 114), where the defendant had accepted a bill of exchange in name of the drawee, purporting to do so per procuracionem, knowing that in fact he had no such authority, but fully believing that the acceptance would be sanctioned and the bill paid by the drawee, and the drawee repudiated the acceptance, the jury negatived any fraudulent intention in fact; but the Court held that the defendant had committed a fraud in law, by making a representation which he knew to be untrue, and which he intended others to act upon (see per Parke, B., Murray v Mann, 2 Ex. 538, 541); and they held him liable, not upon the contract, but to an action of damages for false and fraudulent representation. In Jenkins v Hutchinson, 13 Q. B. 744, where the defendant made a charter-party in the name of another, without authority to do so, and knowing that he had no authority, and the supposed principal repudiated the contract, it was held that the defendant could not be charged personally, in an action on the contract, as a party to it or as principal; and so also in Lewis v Nicholson, 18 Q. B. 503, 21 L. J. Q. B. 311. But in Randell v Trimen, 18 C. B. 786, 25 L. J. C. P. 307; Simons v Patchett, 7 E. and B. 586, 26 L. J. Q. B. 195; Collen v Wright, 7 E. and B. 301, 27 L. J. Q. B. 215, 8 E. and B. 647, Cam. Scacc.; Pow v Davis, 1 E. B. and S. 220, 30 L. J. Q. B. 257; Hughes v Graeme, 33 L. J. Q. B. 335, it was held that even where there is no fraud, but where the party making the contract bona fide believes through some misapprehension that he has authority, still, by assuming to contract for another as his agent, he impliedly warrants to the other contracting party that he in fact possesses the authority which he assumes to exercise; and if he does not possess the authority assumed, is liable to an action, not for fraudulent misrepresentation, unless there be legal fraud, but for the breach of such implied warranty. See Warlow v Harrison, 29 L. J. Q. B. 14; and Cherry v Colonial Bank, 38 L. J. C. P. 49. If the want of authority is known to the other party, the agent's assertion of authority without having it will not render him liable (Jones v Downman, 4 Q. B. 235, note (a)); and probably the same thing would be held in cases where the agent discloses all his grounds of belief as to his authority, and leaves the other party to judge whether he have authority sufficient or not. Smout v Ilbery, supra; Jones v Downman, Story, Agency, sec. 265. An agent may have authority to bind the principal by a contract to a certain amount; and yet by binding him to a greater amount than the authority warranted, he may become liable not only for the excess, but for the whole amount of the contract. Thus, in Baines v Euing (35 L. J. Ex. 194), where an insurance broker, with authority to underwrite policies on his principal's account to a certain fixed limit, underwrote a policy on a ship to a greater amount, it was held that the whole obligation to insure, being indivisible, was void as between the underwriter and the shipowner; and that the owner could not recover even to the extent of the agent's limit of authority. In this case the agent would be liable for the whole amount. See American case of Fleeter v Heath, 11 Wendell 485, cited in Parsons' El. M. L. p. 148, note, for the general proposition, that if the agent exceeds his authority, he is liable on the whole contract, although a part of it is within his authority. See, on the subject of separable and inseparable excesses of authority, Livermore i. 98 et seq.; Story, Agency, sec. 166 et seq.; Bostock v Jardine, 34 L. J. Ex. 142. An agent contracting in his own name, but avowedly as agent for a disclosed principal who is not capable of binding himself, will ordinarily be taken to bind himself by a personal responsibility, since in no other way could the contract possess any validity, and it is not to be supposed that parties meant a nugatory transaction. Story, Agency, sec. 280; and see Harris v Huntbach, 1 Burr. 373, and cases ante, p. 510, note 5; Dig. 14. 1. 15. 1. Lastly, although an agent may not be originally liable in his own person as a party to the contract, he may by his subsequent acts in relation to that contract undertake personal liability for its fulfilment, though he acts in the character of agent. Thus, under a bill of lading which makes goods deliverable to 'A B, the shipper, or his assignees, he or they paying freight against delivery,' the person to whom A B assigns the bill of lading is liable for the freight, as the condition on which he takes the goods from the master. But a bill of lading is often assigned to an agent of the shipper to enable him to receive the goods. If such an agent, endorsee of a bill of lading, is not known to be an agent, he is undoubtedly responsible to the master for the freight of goods delivered to him. (Wilson v Kymer, 1 M. and S. 157; Bell v Kymer, 5 Taunt. 477; Douglas v Kemble, 1 Bingham 383.) But there seems to be some doubt whether an agent who is made endorsee for the mere purpose of receiving cargo, and is known to the master as such, is personally liable for the freight by acceptance of the goods. Mr. Mac-lachlan (Shipping, p. 427) and Story (Agency, sec. 274) interpret the cases differently. (Amos v Temperley, 8 M. and W. 798; Ward v Felton, 1 East 507; see Tobin v Crawford, 5 M. and W. 235, 9 M. and W. 716.) The better opinion seems to be, that the agent is not liable. See Parsons' Maritime Law, vol. i. p. 200, and cases. It is not the mere endorsement, but the receipt of the goods, which creates liability for the freight and raises a new contract to pay it (Smurthwaite v Wilkins, 31 L. J. C. P. 214; per Parke, B., in Moller v Young, 25 L. J. Q. B. 94, 96). There is therefore no difficulty about contradicting any written obligation of the endorsee, even where his character as agent does not appear in the endorsement; and it is competent to show by parole what the circumstances and terms of the new contract were. Where the captain knows the receiver of the goods to be a mere agent for a known principal, the ordinary rule as to any promise implied in the transaction being a promise meant to bind his principal, and not himself, should prima facie apply (per Parke, B., in Amos v Temperley, supra). But if he obtain the goods under bill of lading, so as to be personally liable for the freight, he will continue liable although he have delivered over the goods or their proceeds to his principal, without deducting the freight (Bell v Kymer, 5 Taunt. 477, 3 Camp. 545). So personal liability may afterwards emerge, where he has as agent received money under his principal's contract for his principal's behoof, and for the purpose of being paid over to him, but under circumstances where the third party paying is entitled to countermand the payment over to the principal. There will be personal liability on the agent to repeat, if the countermand be received by the agent before payment over (Story, sec. 300). But where he has paid over the money before the countermand, or has incurred fresh liability for his principal on the faith of having it, the agent will have a defence. See Paley, by Lloyd, 386-95; and see Holland v Russel, 30 L. J. Q. B. 30.]

[495] loss suffered by the fraud of the agent, without being exposed to the objection of double ranking?

2. The estate of a factor acting under a del credere commission is liable to the principal, where the buyer or debtor has failed without paying the price.¹

3. To ground a claim against the factor's estate for negligence, there must be either a breach of orders, gross negligence, or fraud.

First, Not only where the agent commits a direct breach of his orders, in exceeding his limits, etc., but where he does not act as directed, he may be liable to an action; and so his bankrupt estate to a claim for the consequences of the neglect. The most frequent example of this is on occasion of orders to insure. The late Mr. Justice Buller has well distinguished these cases:¹ 'It is now settled as clear law, that there are three instances in which such an order to insure must be obeyed. First, Where a merchant abroad has effects in the hands of his correspondent here, he has a right to expect that he will obey an order to insure, because he is entitled to call his money out of the other's hands, when and in what manner he pleases. The second class of cases is where the merchant has no effects in the hands of his correspondent; yet if the course of dealing between them be such, that the one has been used to send orders for insurance, and the other to comply with them, the former has a right to expect that his orders for insurance will still be obeyed, unless the latter give him notice to discontinue that course of dealing. Thirdly, If the merchant abroad send bills of lading to his correspondent here, he may engraft on them an order to insure, as the implied condition on which the bills of lading shall be accepted, which the other must obey if he accept them, for it is one entire transaction. It is true, as it has been observed, that unless something has been held out by the person here to induce the other to think that he will procure insurance, he shall not be compelled to insure. But if the commission from the merchant abroad consist of two parts, the one to accept the bill of lading, the other to cause an insurance to be made, the correspondent here cannot accept it in part, and reject it as to the rest.' If in such cases he entirely neglect to insure, he becomes responsible. If he endeavour to procure insurance, but limit the broker to a premium so small that the insurance cannot be effected, he will be liable.² But it is sufficient if he do what is usual in order to get the insurance made.³

Secondly, Gross negligence will ground a claim against the agent; as, where one undertakes to get a policy of fire insurance renewed in name of the purchaser of his premises, and applies for the renewal, but neglects to have the policy transferred from himself by the proper endorsement at the office, it is held that he is responsible.⁴ So concealment by one broker, who employed another to get the insurance done, of material information for [496] procuring the insurance, will be a ground of responsibility against the first broker.⁵

Thirdly, Such fraud in the agent for the consignor, as will subject the principal for its consequences, will ground a claim against the agent's estate.

The consequence of the agent making himself responsible for the risk is, that he becomes the insurer himself, and he may avail himself of every defence which the underwriter would have had if the insurance had been effected.⁶

² Wallace v Telfair, cor. Buller, J., 2 Term. Rep. 188, in note.

³ Mr. Justice Buller, in Smith v Cologan, told the jury, that 'if a person to whom such orders are sent do what is usual to get the insurance made, that is sufficient; because he is no insurer, and is not obliged to get insurance at all events.' It must always be a question for the jury, whether what is usual has been done. In the case in which the above direction was given to the jury, the agent sent his broker to Lloyd's to get the insurance effected; but he could not get it done at any premium, on account of the ship's not being registered in Lloyd's. And the inclination of the judge's opinion seems to have been, that if the agent had gone no further, this would have been enough. 2 Term. Rep. 188, note.

⁴ So held in Wilkinson v Coverdale, 1 Espinasse's Cases 74. In that case, the proof of an undertaking to have the policy renewed failed; and so the action was unsuccessful. [Add. on Cont. 6th ed. 414.]

CHAPTER IV.

OF MARITIME CONTRACTS.

INTRODUCTORY VIEW OF MARITIME LAW.

IN the great department of national jurisprudence relative to maritime affairs, there is a great deficiency in the works of the institutional writers of Scotland.

One treatise exists in manuscript, professedly written on this subject, about the close of the sixteenth century, but of no very signal merit;¹ and amidst those preparations which appear to have been made, under the direction of Sir James Balfour, for completing a digest of the law of Scotland, in consequence of the legislative appointment of a commission for that purpose in the sixteenth century, there were collected some notes of sea laws, which are published in the book entitled BALFOUR'S PRACTICES.² But besides these we have nothing but occasional passages in our institutional writers, and the determinations of the Admiralty and of the Supreme Court, to compose our national digest of maritime law.

The little which is to be found in Lord STAIR'S Institutions³ leaves room for sincere regret that this important subject had not received more attention from one so eminently qualified to illustrate it.

Lord BANKTON, with less pretension to respect as an authority in Scottish jurisprudence, has more fully entered on some of the points of maritime law, as they stood connected with the subjects which, in the course of his work, he had occasion to consider.⁴

ERSKINE, our latest institutional writer, has with his usual clearness and conciseness touched the points of maritime law which came in his way; but so slightly, that the important subjects of affreightment, bottomry, and insurance are all discussed in a single paragraph; and this, with other two paragraphs on the subject of exercitors, is the whole of maritime jurisprudence that is to be found in that standard work on Scottish law.⁵

The Scottish Court of Admiralty is so far different from that of England,⁶ that to this tribunal belongs the decision of 'all maritime and seafaring causes,' relative to charter-parties, freights, salvages, wrecks, collision of ships, bottomry, and policies of sea insurance, without any regard to the place of the contract, as executed on sea or at land; while in all mercantile questions also this Court has jurisdiction, subject in the common way to an easy appeal to the Court of Session.⁷ It had also, till lately, a jurisdiction in prize causes to

Mr. Alexander King appears to have been admitted of the Faculty of Advocates, 20th December 1580; and Francis Stewart, Earl of Bothwell, to whom, as Admiral of Scotland, his work is inscribed, held that office from 1587 to 1592.

² 'The Sea-Lawis collectit furth of the Actis of Parliament, the Practiques and the Lawis of Oleron, and the Lawis of Wisbieg, and the Constitutionis of Francois king of France, anno 1543-1557.' There is no good authority for ascribing this book to Sir James Balfour, or for holding that it received his sanction, or was anything more than the preparatory collections made for the use of him and the other commissioners for revising the laws.

prudence. Thus, in treating of mandate, he bestows a single paragraph on exercitors (i. 12. 18).

⁷ Formerly the Admiral's jurisdiction in MARITIME causes was cumulative with that of the Court of Session. By 1681, c. 16, the jurisdiction is enlarged, and vested solely in the Court of Admiralty, with power to the Court of Session to review the sentences of this Court only by suspension and reduction; that is to say, only to suspend execution on cause shown, and to try the cause again as by a writ of error in England, not by the ordinary writ of appeal by which causes are advocated to the Court of Session from the ordinary civil courts. The Court retains a jurisdiction (though not exclusive nor supreme) in all MERCANTILE causes.

This tribunal, having thus a jurisdiction in maritime and mercantile causes, may properly be called the MARITIME and MERCANTILE COURT OF SCOTLAND, and seems capable of pro-adjudge captures from the enemy; wherein it remarkably differs from the Admiralty of England.¹ The judgments of this Court have never been reported.² But the most important of the cases which have there been decided have been brought before the Court of Session, and some of them appear in the printed reports.

Lord Stair's reports of the decisions in prize questions in his time have been deservedly eulogized by those who know their value. But it is much to be regretted that so little attention has been paid to decisions of this description in Scotland; many very valuable determinations in maritime law not having been published in the collections.

The maritime law, however, partakes more of the character of international law than any other branch of jurisprudence; and in all the discussions on this subject in our courts, the Continental collections and treatises on this subject, and the English books of reports, have been received as authority by our judges, where not unfitted for our adoption by [498] any peculiarity which our practice does not recognise. Of these authorities it may not be entirely useless to make a slight enumeration.

I. The first authorities in order and in weight are the ORDONNANCES and CUSTOMS of MARITIME STATES, wherever they have been admitted to rank as part of the maritime law of Europe.

1. The RHODIAN LAWS are confessedly the most ancient maritime laws in Europe. They are supposed to be nearly of the age of Solomon, and were held as the law of nations among the islanders of the Ægean Sea. They were adopted by the Romans in the time, it is said, of the first Punic War. The high authority of those laws appears from the celebrated answer of Antoninus, as recorded by Volusius Mæcianus, 'Ego quidem mundi dominus, LEX autem maris.'³ The essence of those laws has been embodied in several titles of the Corpus Juris, on which a very learned professor of law in the University of Louvain has published a commentary. This work has been republished by the acute and learned Vinnius, with notes, which (like everything that Vinnius has done) combine with the greatest conciseness the most admirable perspicuity and comprehension of the subject.⁴

2. The navigation of the Mediterranean by the ships of Venice, Genoa, and the other small commercial republics which rose after the fall of the empire, led to a digest or com-ducing the most beneficial effects in maturing this important branch of the law of the country. It is much to be wished that due attention were paid to this object; that so valuable an opportunity should not be lost while the maritime and mercantile law of Scotland is still in its progress; and that it should be recollected how much may be done by a consistent and uniform course of determinations, grounded on comprehensive views of the whole system of mercantile jurisprudence: what actually was accomplished by Lord Mansfield in systematizing the mercantile law of England, and what is now accomplishing in the department of international law by the determinations of that eminent person who presides in the High Court of Admiralty of England.

² The late Judge-Admiral Cay devoted his particular attention to the reformation of this Court during the few years in which he sat there, and, had he survived, would have succeeded in greatly augmenting its importance and usefulness. He bestowed exemplary care in deliberating on the cases which came before him, and, above all, seems ever to have had in his mind that most salutary of all judicial maxims, to preserve, as far as just principle would permit, uniform consistency, not only with former determinations in his own Court and in the Court of Session, but with those of England and of other European states. He has left many volumes of notes on cases discussed before him, which show at once the importance of the tribunal, and the knowledge and care with which he administered his office. [The Scottish Admiralty Court was abolished by 1 W. iv. c. 69.]

Republished, cum notis, Arnold. Vinnii, J. C., Lugd. Batav. 1647. In this last edition the pretended Greek text of the Rhodian Laws is published with a Latin translation, but it is held to be spurious. The titles commented on are these: Nautæ, Caupones, etc.; De Exercitoria Actione; Ad legem Rhodiam; De Incendio, Ruina, etc. Rate, Nave, expugnata; De naviculariis sive naucleriis publicas species transportantibus; De navibus non excusandis; De naufragiis. Republished, with notes, by J. Laurentius, J. C., Amstel. 1668.

pilation of rules for regulating that navigation; and which appears to have been universally adopted on the Continent, as the Code of Maritime Law, in the course of the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth centuries.¹ This digest is called IL CONSOLATO DEL MARE. It was compiled by order of the ancient kings of Arragon, and was originally published in the dialect of Catalonia. It comprised the ancient ordonnances of the Greek and Roman emperors, and of the kings of France and Spain, and the laws of the Mediterranean islands, and of Venice and Genoa. It has been translated into every language of Europe. VALIN announces (what, I fear, never was completed) a translation of it with notes by the celebrated EMERIGON. We have, however, the benefit of M. Valin's perusal of that work in his commentary on the French marine ordonnance of 1681.² BOUCHER has lately published a translation from the Catalan.³ When CASAREGIS⁴ was about to give to the world his admirable Discourses on Mercantile Law, he was induced to publish along with them a clear and concise explanation of the Consolato, and to accompany this with an unadulterated copy of the Italian text then extant. An edition has recently been published in Spain by ANTONIO DE CAPMANY.⁵

3. Next in the order of time stand the laws of OLERON, and those of WISBUY, the capital of the isle of Gothland.⁶ I shall not enter into the controversy in which the publisher, CLEIRAC, the English SELDEN, and VALIN, have engaged, relative to the origin and date of the respective LAWS of OLERON and of WISBUY. In general, they may be taken to be of the thirteenth century, and to have been adopted as authority in the Baltic as well as in the Mediterranean.⁷ We have seen that they were used as materials by BALFOUR in making his collection of Sea Laws observed in Scotland.

4. The ORDONNANCES OF THE HANSEATIC TOWNS were first published in German at Lubec in 1597. They were afterwards, on 23d May 1614, in an assembly of deputies from the several towns held at Lubec, revised and enlarged. The text of this digest, and a Latin translation, are published with a commentary by KURICKE;⁸ and a French translation is given by CLEIRAC in his publication above referred to.

¹ See in Casaregis a chronological list of the adoptions of this code, vol. iii. p. 99.

² It is delightful to see the warmth of Valin's acknowledgments to Emerigon. After telling us that he had long resisted Emerigon's offer of a communication of his collection (which occupation at the bar prevented Emerigon from finishing), lest he should anticipate so excellent a work, he says; 'Il m'en a donc fait passer une copie, dont j'ai fait un tel usage que presque tout ce que l'on trouvera de bon dans ce commentaire, quant à la partie de la jurisprudence, est en quelque sorte autant son ouvrage que le mien.'

³ Consulat de la Mer, etc., par P. B. Boucher, Professeur de Droit Commercial, etc. Paris, 1808, 2 vols. 8vo.

Joseph Laurentius Maria de Casaregis was born in Genoa in 1670. He studied law at Pisa, and, after his return to Genoa, was the first professor of civil law after the institution of that university. He practised at the bar with great reputation, and afterwards went to Florence at the desire of Cosmo III., where for twenty years he performed the functions of a judge with universal approbation. During this time he published his Discursus Legales de Commercio, and other works, which were held as standard authorities in mercantile law, and which still enjoy the highest reputation in Europe. About the age of 63, a life of severe and unrelenting study terminated in settled melancholy, which after four years put an end to his life in the year 1737.

His work De Commercio was first published at Florence in 1719, and afterwards his whole works, in three volumes folio, at Venice, 1740.

⁶ Us et Coutumes de la Mer, par Cleirac, 1661; Jugem. d'Oleron, pp. 1-174; Ord. de Wisbuy, 165-185.

⁸ Jus Maritimum Hanseaticum, olim Germanico tantum idiomate editum, nunc vero etiam in Latinam translatum, et ad singulos titulos, etc., commentariis et dissertationibus juridicis politicis historicisque illustratum; studio Reinoldi Kuricke. Hamb. 1667, 4to.

This work is also published along with the works of Styppannus and Loccenius, by Heineccius. Scriptorum de jure nautico et maritimo fasciculus. Halæ Magdeburgicæ, 1740.

5. LE GUIDON DE LA MER was originally composed at Rouen in Normandy, and in 1671 included by M. CLEIRAC in his collection. He could not discover the name of the author, nor is the date of the work ascertained; but though a private treatise, it is composed from the several ordonnances and codes in observance at that time in Europe, including those of Amsterdam in 1598, and Antwerp in 1593, and has been received as almost equal in authority to one of the ancient codes of maritime law.

6. Later in the order of time, but above all the others in comprehensiveness and in authority, comes the celebrated ORDONNANCE DE LA MARINE OF LOUIS XIV. This was the accomplishment of what had been projected by Henry iv., and partly carried into execution under the administration of Cardinal Richelieu, but which was brought to maturity only in the ministry of M. Colbert; when, after the peace of Nimeguen in 1678, a great combination was formed of juridical and mercantile talents for the noble purpose of forming a systematic code of maritime law. The project was happily accomplished by a patient and careful digest of all that was fixed in the usage and customs of maritime nations, or expressed in the ancient codes of this department of jurisprudence; and by settling with a wise and comprehensive spirit of legislation, looking to the general jurisprudence of Europe, those ambiguous points of maritime law, in which either the customs of nations were at variance, or on which no prevailing usage or certain rule was to be found.¹ The [500] ordonnance was published 1st August 1681; but the only commentary previous to VALIN's appeared in the shape of Notes in 1714, the author of which seems to have been utterly incapable of the task; and it is to the disgust which his ignorance occasioned to Valin that we owe the valuable commentary of that author. VALIN's work is undoubtedly one of the best books on maritime jurisprudence of which modern Europe has to boast.²

7. The last code which deserves notice is the CODE DE COMMERCE; of which the second book corresponds with the Marine Ordonnance of 1681. This modern code is valuable, as a careful and concise digest of the edicts of 1675 and 1681, and of the jurisprudence of Pothier, Valin, and Emerigon.³

II. Next in authority are the DETERMINATIONS of maritime and mercantile courts. Of these there are many valuable collections in the several countries of modern Europe. I shall mention only a few of those which are most relied on in our courts.

1. The decisions of the mercantile court of GENOA are of high authority. The collection contains 215 decisions, on a great variety of questions in mercantile affairs.⁴

2. The decisions of the supreme civil courts of FRIESLAND, as published by one of the judges of the court, are also of great authority, and are frequently quoted in mercantile causes in Scotland.⁵

3. The only other collection of foreign decisions which I recollect, as an authority to

¹ M. Valin, in studying the subject of this ordonnance, in the course of composing his Commentary, found, in the library of the Duke of Penthièvre, 'une savante, curieuse, et vaste compilation des loix anciennes maritimes; c'est à dire, des loix Rhodiennes et Romaines, du consulat, et des us et coutumes de la mer, des ordonnances de Charles v. et de Philippe II. Roy d'Espagne, des jugemens d'Oleron, des ordonnances de Wisbuy et de la Hanse Teutonique, des assurances d'Anvers et d'Amsterdam, du Guidon de la mer, des projets d'edits et reglements dressés par ordre de Cardinal de Richelieu, enfin de nos ordonnances jusqu'à 1660; le tout conferé ensemble avec l'avis de plusieurs auteurs, et distribué en differens titres' (Pref. p. 5).

Valin was an advocate of France, and procureur du Roi in the Court of Admiralty of Rochelle. He published (besides his great work) a Commentary on the Customs of Rochelle, in three volumes 4to, and a Treatise on the Law of Prize, in two volumes 8vo. He died in 1765, about five years after the publication of his Commentary on the Marine Ordonnance.

which reference is made in our courts, is that of NEOSTADIUS, of the decisions of the courts of Holland; in which there is much valuable matter relative to mercantile jurisprudence.¹

4. But the decisions of greatest authority are those of the High Court of Admiralty of England. The jurisdiction of this court does not comprehend every question on maritime law, and it includes not mercantile contracts. It is confined to contracts made at sea, and so does not even extend to charter-party or insurance. But it is the great tribunal of maritime and international law, and as such a court of the law of nations; and most happily for the credit of Great Britain, the functions of this high court have, during the whole of an unexampled period of difficulty since the commencement of the revolutionary war with France, been performed by a person the most eminently qualified to sustain the character of an international judge. Lord Stowell's determinations, both in this department and in the more strictly municipal questions which come under his consideration, furnish models of correct and powerful reasoning, expressed in the most perspicuous and elegant language, adorned with various learning, and, above all, distinguished by the soundest and most [501] comprehensive judicial wisdom.² Wherever those decisions touch any question discussed in our courts, their authority is received with profound respect.

III. To enumerate those works of foreign authors in maritime law which are relied on in our courts, would require more time, and occupy more space, than can well be spared on the present occasion. But I may mention that, after the works of the older lawyers, CUJACIUS, MOLINÆUS, PECKIUS, VINNIUS, and VOET; and those of STYPMANNUS,³ of LOCCENIUS,⁴ and of VAN LEEWIN;⁵ the works the most esteemed, and which will grow in reputation and authority in proportion as they are known, are the Notabilia of ROCCUS;⁶ the Discursus de Commercio already referred to, and Il Cambisto Istruito of CASAREGIS; the Discourses of ANSALDUS, De Commercio;⁷ the Commentary of VALIN; the Treatises on Contracts of the admirable POTHIER;⁸ the work of EMERIGON on Insurance and Bottomry;⁹ and TARGA'S Considerations on Maritime Contracts.¹⁰

Of the works of English lawyers on maritime law, there are, besides Maline,¹¹

Besides these tracts, he published a collection of consultations, Responsarum Legalium centurii duo; and of these there has been published along with the above tracts, a selection of such as relate to the same subjects.

The first edition of the Notabilia was in 1655. The edition which I use is that of Amsterdam, 1708.

⁷ Ansaldi de Ansaldi, J. U. C. Patricii Florentini et Sacre Rotæ Romanæ Auditoris, Discursus Legales de Commercio et Mercatura, 1752.

I may remark of this work, and of that of Casaregi, that each discursus contains the discussion and determination of a case occurring in actual practice, not, as we should imagine from the title, a discourse or disquisition on an abstract subject or question in law. The case is related, the arguments detailed, and the prevailing rationes decidendi delivered at great length, with all the authorities fully quoted, and the subject often treated very satisfactorily in a learned and careful discussion.

Ansaldus seems, like Casaregi, to have been under the patronage of Cosmo III. Duke of Etruria.

The first is the Treatise on the Law relative to Merchant Ships and Seamen, by Lord Chief Justice Abbot, while at the bar.³ The other two are confined to the contract of insurance: one of them published by Mr. Justice Park while at the bar, in 1786, and of which he has recently [502] given to the public a seventh edition;⁴ the other by Mr. Serjeant Marshall, published in 1802, a second edition in 1808, and a third edition by the author's son, Charles Marshall, Esq.⁵

The work on maritime jurisprudence by Mr. Holt, which was expected when the preceding edition of this work was published, has since appeared, and has not disappointed the hopes of the profession.⁶

In arranging the subjects which require to be considered under the title of Maritime Contracts, I shall follow the course of the ship's employment from the first fitting out to the termination of the voyage.

SECTION I.

OF CONTRACTS RELATIVE TO THE EQUIPMENT OF THE VESSEL.

Referring for what relates to the PROPERTY of the ship itself to a former part of this volume, this section will comprehend: 1. The employment of the ship. 2. The appointment of a shipshusband. 3. Contracts between the owners and the master. 4. Contracts with seamen. 5. Contracts with strangers for stores, furniture, and repairs, for the use of the ship.

SUBSECTION I.—EMPLOYMENT OF THE SHIP.

There has been occasion already to state the rules of the statute relative to shares of ships; and under Partnership will be considered some of the effects of joint-ownership. Here it is proper to consider what is to be the result of dissension among the owners relative to the employment of the ship; for where she does enter on the expedition, there must be unanimity and effect given to all the acts of those who have the care of it.

The rights of the several part-owners are of the nature of pro indiviso rights, for the subject is indivisible. The difficulty in the joint management arising from this circumstance, appears capable of being resolved only by the exercise of a power to compel a sale, or at least by requiring reasonable security to be given to the party dissatisfied. In England the former of these methods is rejected, the latter followed. The majority in value rules the employment; but the minority may arrest the ship till security be given, or, if they are satisfied with the credit of the owners, they may protest against them that they shall be responsible for every loss. In either of these cases the minority will be entitled to recover the value of their shares if the ship be lost; and while they reap none of the benefit, will be liable to no part of the expense.⁷

⁶ A System of the Shipping and Navigation Laws of Great Britain, and of the Laws relative to Merchant Ships and Seamen. By F. L. Holt, of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law.

⁷ Ouston v Hebden, 1 Wilson 101, in which Chief Justice

[503] If no arrest be used or protest taken, the minority will be held to assent; or at least they will not be entitled to damage for such use, by a pro indiviso owner, in the fair course of the employment of the subject, as they might by the legal method have prevented; and they will also be entitled to part of the profit, and suffer in the loss.¹

If the majority destroy the ship, they are liable to the others.²

In Scotland the remedy has been by sale. Not only in the case of equality, but even where the minority opposed the employment, the dissentient owners, minority or equal, have in Admiralty been entitled to insist either for a sale, or that, at a price put on the shares, the other owners shall purchase their share, or be obliged to part with their own.³ This doctrine was grounded on the consideration that part-owners, though not properly copartners, frequently suffer by the contracts or delinquencies of shipmasters, perhaps not of their own choosing; for which they are answerable, at least to the value of their own share.⁴ And the same doctrine, though not supported by such considerations of hazard, was in modern times applied to the case of a brewery held in common.⁵

Which of these rules ought now to prevail in this united country, it might be presumptuous to say. But it may be necessary to reconcile them in some future case, in which the property comes to be mixed, and persons of both countries concerned in the same vessel. Perhaps the course followed in England may be followed on the same principles of equity which have recommended it to adoption by the Court of Chancery in England, as a measure of less harshness, and less attended with peril, than the remedy which we have long used.

SUBSECTION II.—OF THE APPOINTMENT OF A SHIPSHUSBAND.

The difficulty of administering with unanimity the affairs of a ship belonging to many owners, leads to the appointment of some person, in whom they all have confidence, as SHIPSHUSBAND. Sometimes the shipshusband is merely an agent for conducting the necessary measures on the return of the ship to port: as making the proper entries at the custom-house from the master's manifest; superintending the landing of the goods; checking the measurements; procuring the proper surveys of damages, to avoid disputes; seeing the freight settled before the lien is quitted, and so forth. But there is an appointment of more importance, extending to a more general agency, for conducting the affairs of the vessel in place of the owners. The person so appointed is empowered to enter into contracts for furnishings; to appoint the master and seamen; to enter into charter-parties; and, generally, to act as the sole representative of the owners.

The shipshusband may either be a part-owner or a stranger; and the authority may be conferred either by express deed or commission; or, even without a written commission, by verbal appointment, or by permitting him to exercise the function of shipshusband, so as to give him the character of accredited agent of the owners.

1. Where he is appointed by written commission, that commission must be executed by [504] all the joint-owners. It may refer generally to the customary powers and duties of the shipshusband, and, where special, should empower the agent to regulate the appointment of the master and the hire of seamen; to make contracts of furnishing and affreightment;

Lee said: 'I have no doubt but the Admiralty has a power in this case to compel a security; and this jurisdiction has been allowed to this court for the public good.' See Abbot 74. The Court of Chancery exercises this sort of equitable jurisdiction in cases where the Admiralty cannot; as, where the shares are not ascertained, the Court of Chancery will issue an injunction, and refer to the Master to inquire into the value and settle the security. Haly v Goodson, 2 Merivale 77.

and he was found liable, as he had not expressly dissented, and notified that dissent. This is sanctioned by the high authority of Lord Chief Justice Abbot, 71.

to levy freights; pay wages; make the necessary disbursements on account of the ship; and, generally, to act discretionally for all the owners.

2. It is chiefly in the case of one of the joint-owners taking the management, that the powers of shipshusband are constituted without written authority. But both in that case, and even where a stranger acts in the capacity of shipshusband, the owners will be bound to reimburse and to recompense him; and his contracts in the proper line of a shipshusband's duty will bind them, provided the nomination or the accrediting of the shipshusband be clearly proved.¹

The DUTIES of the shipshusband are: 1. To see to the proper outfit of the vessel, the repairs adequate to the voyage, and the tackle and furniture necessary for a seaworthy ship. 2. To have a proper master, mate, and crew for the ship, so that in this respect it shall be seaworthy. 3. To see to the due furnishing of provisions and stores according to the necessities of the voyage. 4. To see to the regularity of all the clearances from the custom-house, and the regularity of the registry. 5. To settle the contracts, and provide for the payment of the furnishings which are requisite in the performance of those duties. 6. To enter into proper charter-parties, or to engage the vessel for general freight, under the usual conditions; and to settle for freight and adjust averages with the merchant. And, 7. To preserve the proper certificates, surveys, and documents, in case of future disputes with insurers or freighters; and to keep regular books of the ship.

His POWERS, where not expressly limited, may be described generally as those requisite to the performance of the duties now enumerated. It may be observed, however,—

1. That without special powers he cannot borrow money generally for the use of the ship, though he may settle the accounts of creditors for furnishings, or grant bills for them, which will form debts against the concern, whether he has funds in his hands or not, with which he might have paid them.

2. That although he may, in the general case, levy the freight, which is by the bill of lading payable on the delivery of the goods, it would seem that he will not have, and is not to be relied on as possessing, power to take bills for the freight, and give up the possession and lien over the cargo, unless it has been so settled by charter-party, or unless he has special authority to give such indulgence.

3. That, under general authority as shipshusband, he has no power to insure, or to bind the owners for premiums; this requiring a special authority.²

4. That as the power of the master to enter into contracts of affreightment is superseded in the port of the owners, so is it by the presence of the shipshusband, or the knowledge of the contracting parties that a shipshusband has been appointed.

5. That he has not, as managing owner or shipshusband, authority to pledge his owners to the expense of a lawsuit.³

6. That the common rule of mandate applies,—namely, the shipshusband cannot [505] delegate his powers.⁴

CLAIMS ON BANKRUPTCY OF THE OWNERS.

1. The shipshusband will be entitled on the failure of the owners to demand the balance of his advances and commission, to claim relief from bills and engagements in his own name

The Court of King's Bench held, 'That a shipshusband has no right to insure for any part-owner without his particular direction, nor for all the owners in general without their general direction, or something equivalent to it.'

for the price of repairs, furnishings, etc., and to hold a lien for his security and indemnification over the documents and warrants of the ship, and over the freight recovered, or which he has been empowered to recover.

2. Those who have entered into contracts with the shipshusband, or who have made furnishings to the ship of repairs, ropes, sails, etc., or who have supplied provisions for the voyage, although the shipshusband shall have been furnished with money which he has applied to his own purposes, will have their claims against the owners.

CLAIMS ON THE SHIPSHUSBAND'S BANKRUPTCY.

The owners will have their claim on the estate of the shipshusband for whatever balance he is due to them.

They will be entitled to vindicate against the general creditors of the shipshusband, whatever can be identified as the property of the owners; ex. gr. bills granted for freights or for average.

They will have their claim as creditors for indemnification and reimbursement of whatever the shipshusband may in their name have engaged for, or done improperly, or beyond the limits of his powers, for which they have been made, or may be made responsible, in so far as not lucrati by such act.

SUBSECTION III.—OF THE SHIPMASTER OR CAPTAIN.

The MASTER, as he is universally called in this country, or the Captain or Patron of the ship, as he is sometimes denominated in foreign ordinances and books, is the person to whose care the navigation and management of the ship is entrusted by the owners or employers.¹

1. The master must be a British subject.²

2. It appears that of old the master was in almost every instance a part-owner of the ship. He frequently, or perhaps generally, is not so now; and he may or may not be a part-owner.

3. There seems to be no restriction (except that above stated) on the discretionary power of the owners in appointing a master, as to the description of persons, or the skill, [506] honesty, or qualifications required. Their own interest and their responsibility for damage will in general secure a fair appointment, as a ship with an unskilful master is not seaworthy.³

Appointment of the Master.—The contract with the master is properly locatio conductio operarum. But the power which in his representative capacity he possesses is so great, that everything relative to his appointment and dismissal is important.

1. If the ship belong to a single owner, he has the sole power of naming the master; and having named him, he may instantly dismiss him from his employment without control, leaving him to his remedy at law if unjustly dismissed.⁴

2. If the ship belong to several owners, the majority will be entitled to appoint a master;

¹ The owner, or dominus navis, may either be, strictly speaking, the owner and proprietor, or only the freighter, of the ship: 'Exercitorem autem eum dicimus, ad quem obventiones et reditus omnes perveniunt; sive is dominus sit, sive a domino navem per aversionem conduxit, vel ad tempus, vel in perpetuum.' Dig. lib. 14, tit. 1; De Exercit. Actione, l. 1, sec. 15.

² 6 Geo. iv. c. 109, secs. 12 and 16. [Formerly the master behaved to be a British subject. See 3 and 4 Will. iv. c. 54, sec. 16; and 8 and 9 Vict. c. 88, sec. 13. But there is no longer any such restriction, and the provisions of the above-mentioned statutes are repealed by 16 and 17 Vict. c. 129, sec. 31. It is, however, required, in order to be qualified to act as such, that the master must have obtained from a local marine board either a certificate of service, if he has served as master of a British ship prior to Jan. 1, 1851; or if not, a certificate of competency. See sec. 131, and secs. 240–2 et seq., as to removal.]

³ Questions have arisen in England, under the 49 Geo. III. c. 126, secs. 1, 3, 4, as to the purchase of an appointment as captain of our India ships. See Blackford v Preston, 8 Term. Rep. 89; Card v Hope, 2 Barn. and Cress. 661; Richardson v Mellish, 2 Bingham 229.

and there seems to be no other redress to the minority not satisfied with the safety of the appointment, than either a sale of their shares, or the adoption of that remedy which the law gives in the case of a voyage of which some of the owners disapprove.¹

3. The appointment of master requires no written warrant of authority or peculiar solemnity. It is a contract with the owners, or with the shipshusband for them, and may be entered into by verbal agreement. The mere employment of master, with possession, is sufficient to impose on him all the duties, and to vest him with all the legitimate and customary powers, of master.

4. A master appointed by consignees abroad as a measure of necessity (on the desertion of the master, for example), may be entitled to the privileges, and competent to discharge the functions, of a master appointed in the most regular manner, especially if ratified by any confirmation or recognition on the part of the owners.²

5. The master may delegate his power during the voyage, by naming another master; and in questions with third parties, the master so named will, even where the exercitors have prohibited the master from delegating, be vested by the possession of the ship, and exercise of the office, with all the powers of master.³

Power and Authority of Master.—The master has the sole direction of the course and conduct of the ship, and all the powers which are necessary for accomplishing the voyage in which the ship is engaged.

1. In employing the ship the master's powers vary. In a home port, his authority to freight the ship by charter-party is held to be superseded by that of the owners themselves, so as to require either an express or a tacit authority to entitle him to make contracts.⁴ In a foreign port, the master has full authority to make a charter-party, binding the ship and owners.⁵

2. The master has full authority to bind the owners by receiving goods where the [507] ship is on general freight; on the principle that this is within his powers as regulating the ship in its usual employment.⁶ And on the same principle, it has even been held that where the master was authorized to advertise for general freight, the owners were bound by conditions inserted without their authority.⁷

3. In fitting out the vessel, these points are settled: 1. That the master is the pre-

² Such an appointment by consignees was held good to sustain a bottomry bond for money advanced by them for repairs and outfit, the necessity and honesty of the transactions being fully made out, and a recognition of the appointment by an order for part of the freight, describing this man as master. Observe that the law of the Pandects, generally quoted to prove the binding effect of such contracts, 'omnia facta magistri debet præstare qui eum præposuit' (Dig. lib. 14, tit. 1; De Exercit. Act. l. 1, sec. 5), speaks merely by reference to the extent of the præpositura. In England, the doctrine of the text is law. Abbot 91 et seq. The master himself is bound.

⁵ Every authority in maritime law will furnish a text for this, from Cleirac to Abbot.

⁶ Ellis v Turner, 8 Term. Rep. 531. The English cases are thus summed up in Abbot: 'It may be observed, that in each of the above cases the contract upon which the action was brought was made by the master without the particular knowledge of the owners. In the first, it was made in the course of the usual employment of the vessel; and therefore the Court held the owners to be bound to the performance as a general rule, although they thought the particular suit improperly brought. In the second, the contract was not made, or at least did not appear to have been made, in the course of the usual employment of the ship; and therefore the owner was not bound by it. In the last, the contract was made in the course of the usual employment of the ship, and therefore it was considered to be a contract made in substance by the owners.' Abbot 97.

⁷ Rinquist v Ditchel, Abbot, 11th ed. 105. Here a broker in London had been employed by the master to advertise the ship as a general ship bound to Hamburg; and in the papers the broker had inserted a clause purporting that the ship was to sail with convoy from the place of rendezvous. This had not been complied with, and the action was upon the warranty. Lord Kenyon directed the jury, that as the broker was authorized to advertise the ship, the owners were answerable to strangers for his acts, although he had exceeded his sumed and accredited agent in fitting out, victualling, and manning the ship abroad; and that for his engagements in those respects, or even for money borrowed for the purpose of furnishing necessaries for the ship, the owners will be bound, provided the loan appears to be fairly supported by evidence of existing necessities. 2. That even in a home port the master's presumed power as agent for the owners will bind them; unless it shall be shown that the owners themselves, or a shipshusband, managed the concern, and that the party contracting with the master was aware of this. 3. That his authority will be effectual to bind the owners for necessities, although they have furnished the master with money sufficient for all his occasions; since of this the public cannot be aware, while the office and trust in the master raises a general credit.¹ 4. That the master has authority to hypothecate the ship for necessaries in a foreign port; but no such authority to hypothecate the ship in a home port.² 5. That the master's negligence or fault will bind the owners; but with this limitation, that their responsibility shall extend no further than to the value of the ship.³ The master himself will be liable to the full extent.⁴

[508] The master is personally answerable for furnishings and repairs received for the ship under a contract with him, unless care is taken in the bargain to stipulate otherwise. This is contrary to the ordinary rule, by which one appearing as an agent binds only his principal;⁵ but it is a very just and expedient exception, considering the extent of discretionary power vested in the master. The master is not liable, however, where the contract for furnishings is with the owners themselves before the master's appointment.⁶

The master is liable for damage done by himself, or by his orders, or by the crew under his command. And it will not discharge him of this responsibility, that the act has been done under the direction of a pilot, who by statute supersedes him for the time in the government of the ship.⁷

authority, and must seek their remedy against him; and verdict went accordingly.

¹ See Cary v White, 1 Brown's Parl. Cases. Here the owner of a ship lying at Bristol, being resident at Dublin, authorized his master to take a freight for the West Indies, and to take up money on bottomry for fitting out the ship. The master entered into a charter-party with Cary, the owner agreeing to pay wages and provide all necessities. For this the master borrowed £200 on bottomry of Cary, and had a letter of credit on Jamaica for what he might want abroad. At Jamaica, the master, by Cary's letter of credit, took up £789, and on the return the ship was lost. In the Court of Chancery of Ireland it was held that Cary was not entitled to relief. On appeal to the British House of Lords, the owner was held responsible, if Cary's allegations as to the necessity of the expenditure were true; and the Lords directed a trial in Common Pleas to ascertain what had been laid out on Cary's order for the necessary repairs and use of the ship during the voyage, and decreed such sums to be paid to Cary. In two several trials (one at bar), verdicts were given that nothing was necessarily laid out. And so Cary's suit was dismissed. Another appeal was taken, but not prosecuted.

See Abbot's report of the case, 11th ed. 111.

² See below, Of Hypothec for Repairs of Ship.

³ It was otherwise in the civil law, the owner being liable to the full extent of the loss. Dig. lib. 14, tit. 1, l. 1, sec. 5; De Exercit. Act. But that has been altered in all the modern codes. See the French Ord. de la Marine, liv. ii. tit. 8, art. 2; 1 Valin 535. A determination according to the old rule produced a great sensation among shipowners in England, and led to petitions to Parliament, and to the statutes 7 Geo. II. c. 15, and 26 Geo. III. c. 86. See below, Of Charter-party.

An important distinction is to be marked in the case of a king's ship. Nicholson v Mounsey and Simes, 1812, 15 East 384. Here a collision happened while a sloop of war, commanded by Captain Mounsey, was under the orders of the lieutenant, Captain Mounsey being asleep in bed. The captain was held not answerable.

[There seems also to be room for a distinction as to liability to third parties and to owners. In Petrie's Exrs. v Aitchison & Co., 6 Feb. 1841, 16 F. C. 492, the master was held not to be liable for damage to cargo arising from the negligence of the mate. The subject has recently attracted the attention of the mercantile profession, from the hardship and apparent

The master must carefully keep the certificate of registry, and produce it when required.¹ It may be renewed if lost, under certain precautions. If the master refuse to deliver it, he might, even at common law, have been compelled by the Court of Admiralty to deliver it.² But this power is superseded by statute, which more effectually, rapidly, and cheaply accomplishes the purpose, in authorizing a complaint to a justice of peace to have the master brought before him for examination; and giving power, if it shall appear that the certificate is not mislaid, but withheld wilfully, to convict the master, fine him in £100, and commit him to prison till it be paid.³ Under the former Act to the same effect, an application on the common law to Admiralty was refused, reserving to follow out the directions of the Act.⁴

Dismissal.—In all situations of exuberant trust, there seems to exist a necessity for a power of instantly breaking up the connection, lest the ruin of the party desiring to resile may be the consequence.⁵ Accordingly, it is held in our Court of Admiralty, that ship-owners may dismiss the master without cause assigned; and that the majority may even dismiss a joint-owner who is employed as master, without giving their reasons. I do not know that this has been decided or questioned in the Supreme Court.

OF CLAIMS ON THE BANKRUPTCY OF THE OWNERS.

1. The master has a claim on the estate of the owner for his wages, with a lien or [509] set-off upon the freight which he has levied, but no hypothec on the ship.⁶
2. He has a claim for reimbursement of what he has advanced, and for indemnification of any engagements which he may have undertaken for the owners, with a similar lien or set-off.

CLAIMS ON THE MASTER'S BANKRUPTCY.

1. The owners have a claim for the balance of freights levied by the master, deducting his salary and the amount of his disbursements and engagements.
2. Although the master, acting in the ordinary line of the employment and outfitting of the ship, may bind the owners, they will be entitled out of his estate to relief of obligations in which he has exceeded his power, or to which he has bound them, although furnished with the necessary provision of money to save the necessity of such obligations.
3. The owners are liable for damages for breach of contract, and for the consequences of the neglect, fault, or fraud of the master, to the extent of the value of the ship, but they will be entitled to claim indemnification against the master's estate.

SUBSECTION IV.—OF THE HIRING OF MATE AND SEAMEN.

Within the term MARINERS or SEAMEN, the mate and every other officer under the master is comprehended. In England this is of importance in giving the mate and other officers admission to a suit in Admiralty.⁷ In Scotland it is of importance, in so

⁵ I find it laid down in the French Code de Commerce that the owner may so dismiss the shipmaster. Code de Commerce, liv. ii. tit. 3, sec. 218. And a recent commentator on that

Code has delivered the doctrine, that although strictly the contract can be discharged only for such causes as may justify a breach of any other contract of service for a time certain, 'the master may be superseded before the ship's departure, or during the voyage, without notice assigned, or any necessity of previously justifying the dismissal judicially.' Pardessus, Cours de Droit Commercial, vol. ii. p. 35.

⁷ In the case of the Favourite, 2 Rob. Adm. Rep. 232, the far as it gives them the remedy against the ship and the master, as well as against the owners.

The contract for the hiring of mariners is an instrument, expressing the engagement of the parties, with respect to the description of the voyage on the one hand, and to the rate of wages on the other, for which the seaman has engaged his services; the particulars falling under these reciprocal obligations being settled by the general law. The Legislature, for the protection of a set of men proverbially reckless and improvident, and requiring protection, interfered about a century ago to require shipowners on all occasions to give to their seamen the benefit of a distinct written contract. At first it was not carried further than to settle thus, by undeniable evidence, the two great points of the contract mentioned above (2 Geo. II. c. 36). But to these by subsequent Acts many particulars have been added, and many penalties.¹ By these Acts, 1. There must be a special agreement with the seamen or mariners before proceeding on any voyage, both in the foreign and coasting trade, under a penalty for the benefit of Greenwich Hospital. 2. Such agreement must be in writing, declaring what wages each is to receive during the whole voyage, or for the time they ship themselves for, and what is the voyage. 3. This agreement is to be signed by each mariner, within three days after entering himself; and when signed, is 'conclusive and binding on all parties.' 4. The master is bound to produce the articles, and want of them is no bar to [510] the seaman's action. 5. The agreement need not be stamped where it relates to a coasting vessel. 6. No seaman is to be hired who shall, to the master's knowledge, have deserted from any other ship, under a penalty of £100.² 7. No seaman is to be hired in the West India colonies or plantations, at a greater hire than double the monthly wages contracted with other persons engaged at the ship's departure from Great Britain in the same capacity, unless by special authority of the governor, collector, or comptroller of the port, in writing under his hand. 8. These rules are not to extend to contracts entered into with seamen in the West Indies, who shall produce a regular discharge under the hand of the master or commander under whom they last served, signed in presence of witnesses; nor are they to hold with regard to contracts with seamen to serve on board any ship which, on account of very hazardous service or extraordinary duty, required such contract and hire, provided the necessity be proved on oath before the chief magistrate or principal officer of the port, and provided that the seaman shall de facto not have deserted; the wages being restricted to double the monthly wages.³ 9. By the articles of agreement annexed to the Act of 37 Geo. III. in order to prevent desertion in the West India voyages, the seamen are not to have their wages till the arrival of the ship at the port of delivery, which is to be understood of the final port at the close of the voyage; and it is a point of reasonable policy for all parties, and so authorized in almost all maritime codes, and adopted in the articles of agreement used by most nations, that a certain restraint should be laid on the right to demand wages, while the ship is abroad on her voyage.⁴ 10. Wages finally earned are to be paid, in the case of a foreign voyage, within thirty days after the ship's arrival in Great Britain, and entry in the custom-house, or at the time of discharge, which mate succeeding to the office of master, by capture of the former master, was allowed to sue in Admiralty.

² This, though contained in the statute of 37 Geo. III., relating to West India voyages, may, it is thought, have an universal operation. Abbot 436.

³ It is very justly remarked, that there is extreme obscurity in this regulation, and that if it was intended to allow more than double wages without a magistrate's authority, where a discharge was produced, or where, in cases of extreme necessity, the seaman had not deserted, the latter part of the clause restricting the wages is ineffectual; and if, on the other hand, it was intended to allow the power only in cases of necessity, and to mariners who have not deserted, then the first part of the regulation as to a discharge is ineffectual. ¹ 2 Geo. II. c. 36, sec. 7, and 31 Geo. III. c. 39, sec. 6.

[By the Merchant Shipping Act, 17 and 18 Vict. c. 104, sec. 149, it is enacted that the master of every ship shall enter into an agreement with every seaman whom he carries to sea from any port in the United Kingdom as one of his crew, which shall be in a form sanctioned by the Board of Trade, be dated at the first signature thereof, be signed by the master before any seaman signs the same, and specify the nature, and, as far as practicable, the duration of the voyage or engagement, the number and description of the crew, and how many are engaged as sailors, the time at which each seaman is to be on board or to begin work, the capacity in which each is to serve, the amount of wages which each is to receive, a scale of the provisions which are to be furnished to each seaman; any regulations as to conduct on board, and as to fines, short allowance of provisions, or other lawful punishments for misconduct which have been sanctioned by the Board of Trade as regulations proper to be adopted, and which the parties agree to adopt: And it shall be so framed as to admit of stipulations, to be adopted at the will of the master and seaman in each case, as to advance and allotment of wages, and may contain any other stipulations which are not contrary to law.

Foreign Ships.—In the case of foreign-going ships (sec. 150), every agreement made in the United Kingdom shall be signed by each seaman in the presence of a shipping-master, who shall cause the agreement to be read over and explained to him, or otherwise ascertain that he understands it before he signs it, and shall attest each signature; and when the crew is first engaged, it shall be signed in duplicate, of which one part shall be retained by the shipping-master, and the other part (which shall contain a place for the descriptions and signatures of substitutes or persons engaged subsequently to the first departure of the ship) shall be delivered to the master. Where foreign-going ships make voyages averaging less than six months, running agreements may be made to extend over two or more voyages, provided that the agreement shall not extend beyond the next following 30th of June or 31st of December, or the first arrival of the ship at her port of destination in the United Kingdom after such date, or the discharge of cargo consequent upon such arrival (sec. 151): Further, the master of every foreign-going ship (sec. 161) must, on signing the agreement, produce to the shipping-master the certificates of competency or service of himself and his mates, and thereupon the shipping-master shall sign and give to the master a certificate to that effect, which the master must, before proceeding to sea, produce to the collector or comptroller of customs, without which the ship shall not be allowed to go to sea; and within forty-eight hours after the ship's arrival at her final port of destination in the United Kingdom, or upon the discharge of the crew, whichever first happens, the master must deliver the agreement to a shipping-master at the place, who shall thereupon give to the master a certificate of such delivery, and no officer of customs shall clear any foreign-going ship inwards without the production of such certificate.

Home-trade Ships.—Single seamen or crews may also

(sec. 155), in the case of home-trade ships, if the master thinks fit, be engaged before a shipping-master; and where the engagement is not so made, the master shall, before the ship puts to sea, if practicable, and if not, as soon afterwards as possible, cause the agreement to be read over and explained to each seaman, and the seaman shall thereupon sign the same in the presence of a witness, who shall attest his signature.

But it is provided (sec. 162), that where home-trade ships are of more than eighty tons burden, no agreement shall extend beyond the next following 30th of June or 31st of December, or the first arrival of the ship at her final port of destination in the United Kingdom after such date, or the discharge of cargo consequent upon such arrival; that the master or owner shall, within twenty-one days after the 30th of June and the 31st of December in every year, transmit or deliver to some shipping-master every agreement made within the six calendar months next preceding, and shall, in the case of home-trade passenger ships, produce to the shipping-master the certificates of competency or service which he and his mate are required to possess, whereupon the shipping-master shall give to the master or owner a certificate thereof, and no officer of customs shall grant a clearance or transire without the production of such certificate, and allow the ship to ply or go to sea.

Right to Wages.—A seaman's right to his wages and provisions shall commence either at the time at which he commences work, or at the time specified in the agreement for his commencement of work or presence on board, whichever first happens (sec. 181).

No seaman shall by any agreement forfeit his lien upon the ship, or be deprived of any remedy for the recovery of his wages, to which he would otherwise have been entitled; and every stipulation by which any seaman consents to abandon his right to wages in the case of the loss of the ship, or to abandon any right which he may have or obtain in the nature of salvage, shall be inoperative (sec. 182).

The right to wages shall not be dependent on the earning of freight, and every seaman and apprentice who would be entitled to recover wages if the ship had earned freight shall, subject to all other rules of law and conditions applicable to the case, be entitled to recover the same, notwithstanding that freight has not been earned; but in all cases of wreck or loss of the ship, proof that he has not exerted himself to the utmost to save the ship, cargo, and stores, shall bar his claim (sec. 183).

And where his service terminates before the period contemplated in the agreement, by wreck or loss of the ship, and also where it terminates before such period, by his being left on shore at any place abroad under a certificate of his unfitness or inability to proceed on the voyage, he shall be entitled to wages for the time of service prior to such termination, but not for any further period (sec. 185).

But no seaman shall be entitled to wages for any period during which he unlawfully refuses or neglects to work when required, whether before or after the time fixed by the agreement for his beginning work, nor (unless the Court hearing the case otherwise directs) for any period during which he is lawfully imprisoned for any offence committed by him (sec. 186).]

It is the object of these Acts to render the agreement with seamen as distinct and definite as possible; to prevent any part of it from resting on parole testimony or vague conversation, which is at all times so difficult to be ascertained in a court of justice, and in no cases more so than in such as relate to this class of persons; to avoid, in such instruments, expressions so vague and arbitrary as to place the seamen at the discretion of their employers respecting the extent and direction of the voyage; and to exclude a variety and complication of minute stipulations, unfit for the comprehension of this improvident set of men, ready at all times to sign anything.

On these principles, it seems, 1. That there can be no demand, as under a custom, for additional wages or rights which are not mentioned in the articles, or made matter of special agreement.¹ 2. That no parole agreement can effectually be made for any additional wages, where there are articles signed.² 3. That the description of the voyage, one main object of [511] the contract, shall be as precise as it is possible in the circumstances to make it. This particularly applies to an expression which, on a pretended commercial necessity, has been introduced into such contracts after the description of the leading object of the voyage, by the words 'or elsewhere.' The introduction of such words, which contain no description of a voyage, but have well been called 'an unlimited description of the navigable globe, an universal alibi for the whole world, including the most remote and even pestilential shores,' is quite inconsistent with the spirit of the Act. That Act directed those contracts to be reduced to a distinct and intelligible statement of the reciprocal engagements of the parties, with a view chiefly to the interest of the seamen, whose ignorance makes them objects of protection for the law. When words so vague are used, they are at least subject to great limitation. The construction must vary with the situation of the primary port of destination: larger, where it is remote from neighbouring settlements; narrower, if surrounded by many adjacent ports fit for the purposes of the voyage. And it must at least present a fair indication of some particular destination, conformable to the general routine of the commerce, and presumed to be commonly known.³ And, 4. That in the construction of these contracts, an indulgent spirit of equity is applied to protect seamen against the consequence of their imbecility and improvidence.⁴

An agreement to give an extra sum to a mariner as an inducement to extraordinary exertion while the ship is in distress, is null, on the principle that he is already engaged to exert himself to the utmost.⁵ But this would not seem to apply where the inducement were to incur extraordinary danger to life.

The duty of producing the articles is laid entirely on the master or owners; and the statute declares, that the want of the articles shall be no bar to the action of the seamen.⁶ This seems to apply to the case where articles have been made, but are withheld; but it appears to be held as law in England,⁷ and has been adjudged in Admiralty here,⁸ that

The voyage was to Riga, with liberty, if frozen in, to leave the ship and return. There was no writing; and as Burnet did not choose to leave the matter to the master's oath, he made his demand for the common rate of wages of a seaman. The Judge-Admiral considering the 8th section of the Act, and that no man can take advantage of his own unlawful act, held, that as the master had not produced articles, which he is by law required to possess, the pursuer was entitled to the usual rate of wages from the Thames to the Baltic in September 1798.

Afterwards, the number of cases was found so great, that the judge says: 'Every week's experience convinces me of the necessity of enforcing, to the utmost of my power, the salutary though the only agreement for wages has been verbal, action will lie for the wages agreed for, or for the usual rate of wages.

The seaman's demand for wages is a personal claim against the master, in the first place, or against the owners; with a preference by lien or privilege against the ship itself. The difficulties relating to the form of the demand, which seem to arise in England [512] from the peculiar jurisdiction of Admiralty, are unknown to the practice of Scotland. The Admiralty in Scotland having a jurisdiction in 'all maritime and seafaring causes,' and there being depute-admirals at every principal port, the seamen have all the remedies that can judicially be given against the owners, the master, and the ship, in the ordinary course of Admiralty proceedings.

This difference in the facilities afforded in England and in Scotland has led to the adoption of a new and more easy course of proceeding in England, by a recent statute¹ empowering seamen to apply to justices of the peace, while it seemed unnecessary to extend any such remedy to Scotland; and the Act is expressly restricted accordingly (sec. 5).²

CLAIMS ON THE BANKRUPTCY OF THE OWNERS.

The agreement for wages is for the voyage, or on time, or for a share of the profit, as in fishing voyages. They are exigible only on the successful termination of the voyage, entitling the owners to freight, inasmuch that it is commonly said that 'freight is the mother of wages.' This is a quaint way of expressing a general rule, grounded on wise views of public policy (in which the laws of Britain coincide with those of other commercial states), by which the successful issue of the voyage is made the great object of all employed, and the zeal and attention of mariners stimulated, by the direct prospect of their own immediate interest, to the due performance of very perilous and laborious service. But metaphorical expressions in law are dangerous, and apt to mislead. The true parents of the wages are the contract, and the services performed; while the maxim does not hold true in all cases, that where freight is lost there are no wages. Where the ship, for example, is disappointed of her cargo, where the voyage is lost by the fault of the owners or master, where the ship is detained for debt, or seized for having on board contraband goods, the mariners are still entitled to their wages.³

I. WHERE THE VOYAGE HAS BEEN COMPLETED.—The seaman's claim, where the voyage has been completed, and the ship has earned her freight, is for the whole wages; and for this he has a threefold remedy: a preference over the ship and freight; a demand against the master; and a demand against the owners.

Seaman's Preference.—By the oldest maritime laws of Europe, seamen have preference on the ship for the wages of the last voyage,⁴ and it is a preference which has been continued to them almost universally.⁵

statutes which provide that ship's articles shall be signed and executed previous to the commencement of every foreign voyage, and of every coasting voyage in a vessel of above 100 tons burden.' Herd v Beveridge, 21 Dec. 1804, vol. D, p. 328.

N.B.—I find a practice in the ports of Fife to sign no articles for ships bound to the Baltic. This ought to be corrected, and shipmasters are clearly liable to the penalties.

² By the late Judicature Act of 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, sec. 28, actions for the wages of masters and mariners of ships and vessels are declared to be appropriated to the Jury Court. It may be doubted whether this ought not to be changed, or greatly qualified. It is against the policy which has dictated the Act of 59 Geo. III. and 7 Geo. IV. respecting actions for seamen's wages in England.

[By the Merchant Shipping Act, 17 and 18 Vict. c. 104, sec. 183, it is provided that the right to wages shall not be dependent on the earning of freight, and that every seaman and apprentice who would be entitled to recover wages if the ship had earned freight, shall, subject to all other rules of law and conditions applicable to the case, be entitled to recover the same, notwithstanding that freight has not been earned; but in all cases of wreck or loss of the ship, proof that he has not exerted himself to the utmost to save the ship, cargo, and stores, shall bar his claim.]

⁴ Consolato del Mare, c. 33, 105, 135, 136. Nay, it is laid down: 'Se non si restasse se non un solo chiodo debbe essere per pagar li salari alli marinari.' The same rule is laid down in the laws of Oleron, and in those of the Hanseatic Code.

In England the remedy is in Admiralty, by attaching the ship, and applying to have [513] it sold, and the proceeds applied in the first place to payment of wages; and to this privilege the seaman is held entitled above all other charges, on the same principle upon which the last bottomry bond is preferred to those of earlier date.¹

In Scotland the remedy is against the freight by hypothec, and against the ship itself by lien or jus retinendi et insistendi. There is a case in the seventeenth century which denies to the seamen 'a hypothecation upon the ship for their wages of the last voyage;' but finds them entitled to a right of retention of the ship, of which even a purchaser cannot deprive them.² Where the freight has been paid, and the ship is brought to sale by the creditors of the owner on the termination of the voyage, it would seem that a preference will be given on the price of the ship for the seamen's wages; or the seamen will be entitled to arrest the ship, and apply to Admiralty for a sale. Such preference being sanctioned by the universal practice and laws of other maritime states, and especially by those of England, the high expediency of a uniform rule throughout Great Britain would undoubtedly, in the event of such a trial, establish a lien on the vessel for the wages of the last voyage. In this question, too, it deserves particular attention that, as already stated, the payment of seamen's wages is made to depend partly on the successful termination of the voyage; while on similar grounds of policy they are not permitted to insure wages to be earned.

Claim for Wages.—The personal demand for wages may, in Scotland, be made either by a claim in bankruptcy or by an action in the Court of Admiralty.

In England the claim for seamen's wages is limited to six years, by a provision in the Act of Queen Anne for the 'amendment of the law and the better advancement of justice.'³ This Act preceded the Union, and does not apply to Scotland. This would appear to be a sort of debt which should fall under the triennial prescription of the Scottish law; the obvious inconvenience of a claim which may possibly affect a ship after transference to a third party,⁴ naturally pointing to the adoption of that prescription as peculiarly fit for this particular case. But perhaps the consideration that no rule has been specifically laid down in Scotland, and that seamen will naturally conclude the same rule to apply universally, may lead to a doubt whether action for seamen's wages in Scotland would be held to fall by the elapse of three years, or whether the English limitation of six years would not be allowed.

When freight has been earned, but the individual mariner has not contributed to that result, distinctions must be made. And,

1. If the seaman be hired by the voyage, he is entitled to his full wages, although by sickness in the course of the voyage, or by disability from hurts received in the course of his duty, he has been prevented from completing his engagement. This is established in all [514] the maritime codes,⁵ and is laid down as law, and has been proceeded on as a ground employés au dernier voyage seront payés par preference à tous creanciers.' De la Saise de Vaisseaux, art. 16. And Valin, in commenting on this article, lays it down that they have a right of preference over the freight as well as over the cargo, though this right is restricted to a year after the wages are earned (t. i. pp. 362, 363, and p. 313). ² Seamen of the Golden Star v Miln, 4 Jan. 1682, M. 6259; Sir P. Home, ms. No. 246. The judgment was, 'that the seamen had jus retinendi of the ship for their wages; and that being violently put out, they were in the case as if they had been in full possession of the ship;' and therefore the purchaser was ordered to pay their wages.

The only other reported case touching this question is in 1708, in which 'the Lords were clear that the seamen's wages were no debt of bottomry, affecting either the keel of the ship or the cargo, but found the freight liable for the said wages.' Sands, etc. v Scott, 1708, M. 6261. It may be observed, that the negative part of this latter judgment can be considered only as opinion; for the action before the Court was by mariners against the owners of the cargo, who had not yet paid the freight; and the only point which the Court was called upon to decide was, Whether there was a hypothec on the freight? Accordingly, Mr. Erskine lays it down as the doctrine of this case, that mariners have 'a tacit hypothec for security of their wages upon the freight which is due by the merchant.' Ersk. iii. 2. 34.

of judgment in England.¹ If he die during the voyage, his wages are due to his heirs. Probably this would be regulated by the maritime law, as appearing in the standard books of that law, which seem to give the outward wages if he die during the outward voyage; the whole, if he die during the homeward voyage. Balfour has the rule in general terms.² Where the hire is by the month, it rather seems that wages will be due only to the time of death. A special contract is not unusual in the hiring of seamen, by means of a note signed by the master, for a certain amount of wages on the ship's arrival, provided the seaman continues and does his duty in the ship till her arrival. And it has been found in England: 1. That there is no certain usage regulating the obligation under such a note; and, 2. That at law, where such a note has passed, no wages can be claimed either on the note or on a quantum meruit, unless the condition be fulfilled.³

2. Where the seaman is, during a voyage, discharged in violation of the contract with the master or owners, he will be entitled to his wages up to the prosperous termination of the voyage.⁴ But in equity there must be a deduction of such sum as he has earned in another vessel during the voyage.⁵

Where the ship does not proceed on her voyage, wages may be claimed for the time the seamen have been employed on board; and for damage on account of the breach of contract.⁶

3. A seaman quitting the ship before the termination of the agreement, forfeits all his wages.⁷ The termination of the engagement is the delivery of the cargo. The voyage is not completed by the mere fact of arrival. The act of mooring is to be done by the crew, and their duty extends to the time of unlivery of the cargo; and indeed there is no period at which the cargo is more exposed to hazard than in the act of being transferred from the ship to the shore.⁸ But, 1. It is not desertion if a seaman enter into His Majesty's service, either voluntarily or by impress. He is in either case entitled to his wages up to the period of his entry to the king's service, provided the ship which he has left has arrived at her port in safety.⁹ 2. Neither is it desertion if the master, by inhuman treatment, compel a seaman to quit the ship.¹⁰

¹⁰ Limland v Stephens, 3 Espinasse Rep. 269, where Lord Kenyon said: 'Desertion is a forfeiture of wages; but if the captain conduct himself in such a way as puts the sailor into a situation that he cannot, without danger to his personal safety, continue in his service, human nature speaks the language: A servant is justified in providing for that safety.' 'In this case, the act of the captain has made the dissolution of the contract necessary, and in my opinion justifiable on the part of the sailor; and I think that he is entitled to a verdict.' So it was accordingly found.

It may be doubted whether the doctrine would be restricted to the case of damage to 'personal safety.' Cruel, inhuman usage, though it do not actually endanger life, seems to be a justification of desertion. At the same time, there is much

[515] II. WHERE THE VOYAGE HAS NOT BEEN COMPLETED.—The general rule as already stated is, that no wages are due where no freight is earned. But,

1. The arrival and delivery of a cargo outward entitles the seamen in the common case to their wages of that voyage, freight being earned, although they will not be entitled to wages for the outward voyage if in ballast.

2. The outward and homeward voyages may be so consolidated in the agreement with the mariners, that they shall have no right to wages till the arrival at the final port of delivery; and, in general, such a stipulation is made a part of the agreement, in order to prevent the desertion of the seamen in foreign ports.¹

3. So it is if the ship be captured, it being fully settled that capture defeats all rights and interests.² Wages may revive, however, on recapture. See below, p. 565 (5).

4. If the voyage be not a single run, which by the wreck or capture is utterly defeated, but of the nature of a trading voyage, the seamen will have right to wages pro rata itineris.³ But this may be altered by special contract, and the seamen's right to wages may be made to depend entirely on the arrival of the ship at her ultimate port. This, however, is commonly in the case of an agreement to pay a general sum for the voyage; and it would require a very strong stipulation to produce this effect in the ordinary case of wages on time. It is not deemed sufficient to stipulate that no wages shall be demanded, or that the crew shall not be entitled to wages till the arrival of the ship. This is held only as a suspension of the demand, not a limitation of the right.⁴

danger in departing from lines so obvious as to relax the discipline of this peculiar service. The admirable balancing of distress and necessity in such cases, in the judgments of Lord Stowell, are full of instruction, and deserve to be continually kept in view. See, for example, such cases as the Favourite, 2 Rob. 232, quoted p. 562, note 1.

² Nothing can be better settled, says Lord Stowell, than that 'capture defeats all rights and interests.' The Friends, Bell, 4 Rob. Adm. Rep. 144.

³ Ross v Glassford, 1771, M. 9177, 1 Hailes 406. Ross and others sailed with the Ingram from Clyde on a voyage to Newfoundland, and thence to Spain or Portugal, and then home. At Newfoundland she discharged three hhds. of tobacco, and took in a cargo of fish. These she sold at Lisbon, took in a cargo for Clyde, and was captured by a French privateer, who landed the crew in Ireland. The seamen brought their action in Admiralty for wages due at Lisbon, and they prevailed. The case was then brought under review of the Court of Session. Lord Kames first held 'the mariners entitled in equity to their wages pro rata itineris during the time the owners received the freight and profits of the vessel.' He afterwards held, 'That there being but one agreement and one voyage, the seamen who did not accomplish the voyage had no claim at common law for wages, though the failure was not occasioned by their fault, but by the fate of war; and that they had no claim in equity pro rata itineris, seeing the owners were not locupletiores, but lost considerably by the voyage.' After a learned argument at the bar, the Lords were of opinion that the first judgment of Lord Kames was right.

Morrison v Hamilton, 1778, M. 3004. A similar decision was pronounced in the case of shipwreck. The voyage was from Greenock to the Lewes; thence to Philadelphia; thence to the Bay of Honduras; and so back to Greenock. It was stipulated that no wages should be demanded 'until the discharge at Greenock.' The ship took in her fourth cargo at Honduras, after which she was totally wrecked. On their return the seamen demanded wages till the time of the wreck. The Admiral awarded them wages till their finally unloading in the Bay of Honduras. And this was affirmed in the Court of Session.

See the English cases. Anonymous, 1 Lord Raymond 639; Edwards v Child, 2 Vernon 727; Abbot 448.

The same rule was followed in England by Holt, Ch. J., in Edwards v Child; and also in Admiralty, Buck v Rawlinson, 1 Brown's Cases 102. But this is said to have been disapproved of in the House of Lords; and Lord Chief Justice Abbot has said that he is at a loss to find any principle to justify it. [Abbot, 11th ed. 485.] In Appleby v Dods, 1807, the Court of King's Bench held, that though the ship earned freight on the delivery of an outward-bound cargo at Madeira, and another delivered in the West Indies, yet, being lost in her passage home by a storm, the seamen could not recover wages pro rata, by reason of the express terms of the stipulation respecting their wages. This, however, was only the usual stipulation. 8 East 300.

In Scotland, the decision proceeds on the construction of the agreement. If a case were to occur on an agreement so clearly expressed as that alluded to in the above work as beginning to prevail of late years (viz. that the seamen

5. The claim for wages which is lost by capture (p. 564 (3)) will revive on recapture [516] and the ship earning her freight, if the seamen have not been separated from the ship on the capture; the seamen's interest and right to wages being subject, however, to salvage.¹ But if he be separated from the ship, and have not rejoined during the voyage, however unfortunate to him the accident, it is an evil of war, to which, as a British subject employed in navigation, he is subject; and he has no right to revival of his wages.² The principle on which this matter has been grounded, viz. that the contract is defeated, subject to revival, seems to deprive a seaman of all claim to intermediate wages previous to his resuming his functions. A difference of principle gives a different result in the case of embargo. See below (7).

6. If part of the cargo be saved from shipwreck, and freight earned by it, the seaman is held by foreign laws entitled to a proportional part of his wages.³ Lord Chief Justice Abbot, in his former edition, while he approved of this rule, knew of no English authority for holding it as law.⁴ There has been no case of the sort decided in Scotland of which I am aware. But recently a case was tried before Lord Stowell, in which that eminent judge gave effect to the rule to a still greater extent; having decided that where part of a vessel had been saved by the exertions of the crew, they were entitled to the payment of their wages, as far as the fragments of the materials would form a fund, although there [517] was no freight earned by the owners.⁵ And he has accompanied the decision with some very important observations on the principles on which the decision in such cases ought to rest. He is of opinion, 1. That seamen are fairly entitled to a reward for their meritorious exertions in this difficult and dangerous part of their duty. 2. That they cannot be considered as salvors, and so rewarded; nor is it expedient that they should. 3. That to reward them according to the quantum meruit, would be equally dangerous and inexpedient. And, finally, That the only safe rule is, to give those wages which are the reward of faithful service, and beyond which they should not be tempted to form an expectation, as the best and safest inducement to a seaman to cling to the last plank of his ship for satisfaction of his wages, or part of them.

7. An embargo laid on in the course of the voyage is different from capture. It is not a conversion of the property, but a mere restraint imposed by authority for legitimate political purposes. It has been stated as analogous to detention by calms in a southern or should have nothing but the share of impress money, unless the ship returned to and arrived at the port), I have no doubt that it would in Scotland be held effectual.

A custom to the above effect was founded on in Ross v Glassford (see preceding note); but the Court, while they found no evidence of it, said, 'that if such practice did exist, it was highly to be disapproved of, as fraught with inhumanity, and destructive to trade, and that it was high time it should be corrected.'

² The Friends, Bell, 1801, 4 Rob. Adm. Rep. 143, where a seaman had sailed from Newcastle, the ship was captured, and he was sent to France as a prisoner. The ship was afterwards recaptured, and carried on to her port of destination. The seaman, after his liberation, came against the owners for his wages. Lord Stowell held him not entitled: 'Unfortunately there is a circumstance in this case which makes a material distinction, viz. that the claimant was not on board at the recapture, but had been sent a prisoner to France, while the owner was obliged to hire another in his place to work the vessel on the return voyage. I am of opinion that this interest (two days' wages before capture)—too small, perhaps, to be the object of a litigation—is not legally revived in favour of this individual by a recapture, which in no degree restored him to his connection with the vessel, although the misfortune of the captivity will entitle him to the kind consideration of his owner.'

by frosts in a northern climate: as the inactivity of a moral, as the other is that of a physical detention. It has no effect in putting an end to contracts of affreightment;¹ and as to wages, the master and crew being during its continuance in possession, and the owners having all the benefit of their service, which in the circumstances may be necessary, wages are demandable during the detention.²

A case occurred which gave rise to great doubts, being neither an embargo nor a capture, but a hostile seizure and detention of British ships in the Russian ports by the Emperor Paul in 1800. On 5th November of that year, while many ships, both from England and Scotland, were in Russia, the Emperor commanded an embargo to be laid on all British ships in his ports, till a supposed convention should be fulfilled. At first guards were stationed along the shore to prevent the crews from quitting their ships: then they were taken from their ships, and marched into the interior of the country, and treated as prisoners of war. The embargo was removed 22d May 1801, but the crews had rejoined their ships in April on the death of the Emperor Paul. On arrival in Britain, claims were made by the seamen for wages during the whole time of detention.

The first of these cases which appears to have been tried occurred in Scotland, and the Judge-Admiral held the detention to have no effect in discharging the contract. He therefore decided, 1. That the owners were liable for subsistence given to the crew during the embargo;³ and, 2. That they were bound to pay wages.⁴ The same question afterwards [518] came to be tried in England, first in the Court of Common Pleas, then in King's Bench; and the judgment finally was, that the contract of service was to be considered as having continued in force from the time of executing the articles up to and at the period of the ship's arrival at her port of discharge, and the final termination of her voyage there; and that the seamen were to be considered as entitled to their wages during the same time.⁵

Another case having afterwards occurred in Scotland, the Judge-Admiral decided conformably to his first decision.⁶

⁴ Stewart v Weatherly. Stewart entered as mate of the Ranger, Weatherly master, on 12th September 1800, arrived off Cronstadt 23d October. The embargo was laid on 5th November, but Stewart continued to be employed till 12th November, the ship having grounded. He was then sent up the country. He returned on board 7th April 1801. The action was for wages during the embargo. The defence was, that this embargo was similar to capture, and that no such wages had been paid by other masters or owners. The Judge-Admiral held: 'That an embargo is not similar to capture, but a mere temporary restraint, which does not dissolve the contract between freighter and owner, as capture does; and whatever does not, in its own nature, dissolve the contract of affreightment, must leave the obligation to pay wages, which accompanies freight, in full force.' 15 Aug. 1801, 15 April 1803, Judge Cay's ms. vol. B, p. 270; vol. C, p. 201.

⁵ Beale v Thomson and Johnston v Broderick. These were two cases tried in the Court of Common Pleas, the plaintiff in the one being a British, in the other a foreign seaman. The cases came on a special verdict found before Lord Alvanley. The wages were all paid, except for the time of detention, and that made the point of the case. The judges were equally divided in opinion, and their sentiments are fully reported. 3 Bos. and Pull. 405-434.

Judgment having gone against the seamen (by assent of one of the judges to the opposite opinion, in order to give an opportunity for a writ of error), the cases came in that way before the King's Bench, when Lord Ellenborough delivered the judgment of the Court in favour of the seamen. 1804, 4 East 546-566. ⁶ Thomson v Reddie and others, 8 June 1804, Judge Cay's ms. vol. C, p. 169. This case was afterwards brought under review of the Court of Session, when 'the Court considered, that although the proceedings of the Russian Court were attended with greater acts of hostility than usual, yet, upon the whole, they bore more the appearance of an embargo than a capture, and consequently that they did not void the contract by which the sailors were entitled to receive their

8. If an embargo be laid on, or a prohibition of that trade proclaimed, before the commencement of the voyage, to the effect of losing the voyage, it is held by the foreign authorities that the seamen will have a claim only for wages while employed.

9. Where the ship is not seaworthy, and so unable to perform the voyage or earn freight, the seamen are entitled to damages from the owners for the breach of contract.¹

10. It is a good answer to the claim of wages, that the seaman refused his aid in defending the ship,² or was guilty of disobedience of orders, or habitual drunkenness, or was absent without leave;³ and loss occasioned by the negligence or fraud of the seamen forms a fit article of deduction from the wages, for relief of the owners.⁴

11. A claim for mariner's work done by a female is not absolutely illegal, although not entitled to much encouragement. Lord Stowell has supported such a claim.⁵

12. Seamen engaged to receive part of the gain (as in Greenland ships) are by foreign authors said to be a sort of partners in the voyage.⁶ But it is not so held in the law of this country, where this forms rather an exception from what is certainly the rule of common law. So it was found in England.⁷

SUBSECTION V.—CONTRACTS FOR REPAIRS AND FURNISHINGS TO SHIPS.

GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF THESE CONTRACTS.

Contracts and obligations for equipment may relate to naval stores, anchors, [519] cables, sails, masts, etc.; repairs of ship and rigging; sea-stores or provisions; subsistence to the crew, either abroad or on shore; necessary accommodation for passengers, etc., according to the object of the voyage; money for defraying the requisite expenses, either in paying for any of those furnishings, or duties, customs, etc.

Such contracts may be entered into, either with the owners or shipshusband, or with the master.

I.—CONTRACTS WITH THE OWNERS FOR REPAIRS, AND WHO IS LIABLE AS SUCH.

Where the owners themselves enter into a contract for repairs or furnishings, it has been contended that the master is liable on two grounds: that he receives the goods into his possession; and that he receives the freight. But it is settled that a master can be held liable only in respect of his own contract. 'Where a captain contracts for the use of the ship,' says Lord Mansfield, 'the credit is given to him in respect of his contract: it is given to the owners, because the contract is on their account; and the tradesman has likewise a specific lien on the ship itself. Therefore, in general, the tradesman who gives that credit debits both the captain and the owners. But where the captain makes no contract wages during the period of the voyage.' The judgment of the Court of Admiralty was therefore affirmed. Thomson v Millie, 28 May 1806, M. App. Mut. Cont. No. 4.

¹ Eaken v Thom, 1803, before Lord Ellenborough, 5 Esp. Cases 6, where a seaman having brought an action of assumpsit for wages, the owner had a verdict, on the ground that the action should have been for damage, no freight being earned, and no wages due.

We should not in Scotland oppose such a difficulty to a seaman's demand. His action would be laid in Admiralty alternatively for wages or damage.

personally, but the owners contract for their ship, the credit is given to them only, and there is not a shadow of colour to charge the captain.¹

Where there are several acknowledged owners, and an order is given by those in the apparent management of the ship, or by the shipshusband, all will be bound, though one of them should have given directions to the others not to act as managers, nor to pledge his credit.²

Where owners take upon themselves the management of the ship, and the repairs or furnishings are made on the credit of a contract directly with them, they are liable only pro rata, each for his own share.³ In England, if a part-owner be called upon alone, or if all are not sued to answer for the debt, a plea in abatement may be entered, which has the effect of preventing judgment against the defender in that action, leaving it to the plaintiff to bring a new action against the whole. But this limited responsibility cannot be pleaded where the defendant has ordered the articles on his own credit, without disclosing that he [520] has copart-owners. The tradesman, ignorant of the other part-owners, is in such a case entitled to action against the owner who gives the order.⁴

Where the furnishings are on the order of the shipshusband or of the master, under his exercitorial power, all the owners are in Scotland liable singuli in solidum, as they are all bound by his act.

As to the persons who, either on special contract or on the implied responsibility, are to be held liable for repairs and furnishings, it may be observed,—

1. That in the ordinary case, where the owners are in possession, and their titles on the statutes clear, the owners (and also the vessel itself in a foreign port) are liable for furnishings and repairs made on the order either of themselves or any of them, or of the shipshusband, or of the master acting within the limits already laid down;⁵ and the master's responsibility is added where the order is given by him.⁶

2. The mere legal title of the ship will not attach to the person holding it the responsibility for repairs or furnishings made on the special employment of other persons acting as owners of the ship. It may raise a presumption, or furnish evidence of the repairs having been made on the order or credit of the apparent owner; but if in truth they were made on other credit, or the order of another, the legal owner will not be answerable.⁷ And so, 1. Where a purchaser orders the ship to be taken to a shipwright for repair, the seller will not be liable, although he continues on the registry to appear as the owner.⁸ And 2. On

On 11th June the captain of the Rebecca, by order of Brander, took the ship to Young, a shipbuilder, to be repaired for her outward voyage. The repairs were finished by 19th June, during which time Dunbar's name remained on the register at the custom-house. A verdict for plaintiffs, subject to the opinion of the Court. Lord Ellenborough said, that to hold Dunbar liable would be contrary to the credit actually given.

the other hand, the purchaser of a ship is not to be made responsible, in respect of his legal title as owner, for stores ordered previously to the sale, but only for such articles as were ordered by the master after the purchase.¹

3. Where the furnishings are made on the order of the master (the workman, or ship-chandler, or lender of money, ignorant of, or taking his chance of the ownership), those who remain truly part-owners, or who, being once vested as owners, have not legally transferred their right, but still appear on the registry as owners at the time the furnishings are made, will be liable; it being left to them by means of their undivested right to effect their relief.²

4. The shipbuilder or furnisher will not, however, be construed to limit his [521] demand for repairs or supplies on the master's employment, to those who appear on the registry as owners; for if the ship has been hired to another for a certain period, or even for a voyage, but not merely on the contract of locatio operis mercium vehendarum, the hirer is strictly and properly the exercitor of the master,³ and as such will be responsible.

5. It was once held, that if the lease of the vessel be unknown, the furnisher was entitled to sue the owners appearing on the register.⁴ But more recently it has been determined, that the Registry Acts are not in all cases to be relied on so implicitly. And,

² Gleason v Tinkler; see above, p. 568, note 2. [Abbot 109.] 1. Where the defender still continues a part-owner, though he has expressly forbidden the other owners to act as managing owners, he is liable on the master's contract.

2. Where the right of ownership has been transferred, but not by a valid conveyance, the owner continues liable on the master's contract. So decided in the following English cases:—

Westerdell v Dale. Dale and Wharton were joint-owners of the St. Vincent, and were so registered. Dale sold his share to Wharton; but the certificate was ill-recited in the vendition, so as under the statute to make it void. Wharton mortgaged the ship to Dale, but the recital was also bad in the deed. No endorsement was made on the registry on either of these occasions. While matters stood thus, Wharton, who then acted as sole owner, employed Westerdell to repair her, and the account was thus entered: 'Ship St. Vincent, Captain J. Lethrington, J. Wharton debtor to T. Westerdell.' Wharton then sold the ship to Dale and to Tod, but no possession was taken. Westerdell brought his action against Dale for these repairs. The question on which the case was determined was: Whether, by the exceptionable vendition, and the state of the register, Dale did not still remain owner on his original right, and so responsible? The Court held that it was not a legal transfer, but a mere attempt to transfer, and that Dale still remained owner, and responsible: that as between Wharton and Dale, the latter might have called on the former for the account of the profits of the ship; and if he had filed a bill in equity for that purpose, it would have been no answer to have set up this bill of sale, which is void by Act of Parliament: and that Dale was therefore liable on this ground, that if one part-owner suffers the other part-owners to employ a person to repair their ship, he is bound by these acts. 7 Term. Rep. 306.

N.B.—Dale might have pleaded, in abatement, that Wharton ought also to have been sued, but he did not.

3. When the vendition is correct, but the transfer on the registry has been neglected, the same rule is followed. So it has been decided in Scotland.

Menzies & Goalen v Kerr. The Judge-Admiral held the tradesmen in a home-port entitled to bestow necessary repairs on any ship, upon the faith of their knowledge of the personal responsibility either of him who orders and authorizes the repairs, or of that of the owners of the ship. The defenders in the case were admitted to stand as owners in the subsisting registry, without any transfer made in terms of 26 Geo. III. c. 60, and 34 Geo. III. c. 68; but it was said they had, by vendition two years before, sold it, although by fault of the purchaser the transfer was not duly endorsed. Then, on an elaborate consideration of the statutes, the judge held it clear that the defenders, in the character of owners undivested, were responsible, and accordingly he pronounced judgment against them jointly and severally. The case was then brought into the Court of Session by advocacy, and Lord Meadowbank refused the bill, and adhered to the Judge-Admiral's sentence; and a petition against this judgment was refused, 22d February 1805.

'If a ship be let out generally to freight,' said Lord Mansfield, 'the freighter is owner for that voyage; but if there be only a covenant to carry goods, the owner of the vessel would have the direction of her, and the hiring of the master and mariners.' This was said relative to a case of barratry. Vallejo v Wheeler, Cowp. 144.

first, An entry in the registry can have no effect, if truly there be no bill of sale, or if the right be put in the defendant's name, without his consent;¹ secondly, where there is a lease [522] of the ship, the master is agent for the lessee, not for the owner; and the reputation of ownership from the Registry Acts is, as a ground of action in such cases, qualified by the lease.²

6. Mortgagees in possession, whose names were in the register, were formerly held responsible for repairs and furnishings.³ But by the recent statutes this matter is placed on a new footing. Where a transfer is made only for security by way of mortgage, or of assignment to trustees for sale, on a statement to that effect in the book of registry and on plied the ship Henry and Thomas with cables to the value of £5, by order of the captain, Harwood, and made the captain and the owner of the ship debtors in the usual way, without naming the owners, or knowing particularly who they were. The ship belonged to Coe and others, who had let it to Harwood, the captain, who was to have the sole management and benefit for eleven years, at a rent of £36, and at his own cost to keep the vessel in repair. The action was against the owners for the debt. Lord Mansfield said the case was reserved for the opinion of the Court, 'in consequence of a general anxiety in the owners of ships to know how far they are by law liable for the acts of their respective lessees.' The Court held the owners liable, on the ground that the credit was specifically to the ship, and generally to the owners, and that the private agreement between the owners and the master could not affect the creditors, who were entire strangers to the transaction.

Tinkler v Walpole, 14 East 226, where gunpowder having been furnished for the use of an East Indiaman by order of Clarke, shipshusband and managing owner, action for the price was brought against Walpole; and the plaintiff relied, first, on two bills of sale to Walpole of $\frac{1}{4}$ ths of the ship, but there was no proof of Walpole's assent or acceptance. He next relied on two registers made on the oath of Clarke and two others, swearing that they and Walpole and others were owners. Lord Ellenborough nonsuited the plaintiff, on the authority of Frazer's case, and the Court was moved for a new trial to have that case reconsidered. It was fully confirmed. Lord Ellenborough, Ch. J., said: 'Notwithstanding the practice may have prevailed for a long time to receive ships' registers as evidence, without more, of the property being in the persons therein named, yet when we are brought to consider the admissibility of such evidence against the defendant, in a case where he has done no act to adopt the register as having been made by his authority, we cannot give effect to it without saying that a party may have a burdensome charge thrown upon him by the act of a third person, without his own assent or privity. If it had appeared that the defendant had by any act of his own recognised the register, he would have been liable to all the consequences as a part-owner, which it describes him to be, but here he has done no act to adopt it. His partner Clarke has indeed dealt with the property as if the defendant were a part-owner, by registering the ship in his name; but the act of a third person, without some act of the defendant to recognise it, cannot throw upon him a burden, without violating the plain rule of law.' The other judges concurred.

² Frazer v Marsh, 13 East 238. Marsh, the owner of a ship, let the ship by charter-party for a number of voyages, at a certain rent to Walker, then master of her. On Walker's subsequent order, stores were furnished by Frazer, who brought his action against Marsh. Lord Ellenborough tried the case at Guildhall, and the plaintiff was nonsuited, on the 'ground that, during the existence of the lease, the relation of master and owner ceased to subsist between Walker and Marsh, and that the stores must be taken to be ordered on Walker's own account.' On a rule to set aside the nonsuit, Lord Ellenborough said: 'To say that the registered owner, who divests himself by the charter-party of all control and possession of the vessel for the time being, in favour of another who has all the use and benefit of it, is still liable for stores furnished to the vessel by the order of the captain during the time, would be pushing the effect of those Acts much too far.' The question is: 'Whether the captain, in this instance, who ordered the stores, were or were not the servant of the defendant who is sued as owner? And as they did not stand at the time in the relation of owner and master to each other, the captain was not the defendant's servant, and therefore the latter is not liable for his act. There is a late case in the Court of Common Pleas (Frazer v Hopkins and another, note 1), where the mere entry of the defendants' names as owners in the register-book was held not to be even prima facie evidence to charge them, as such, with stores delivered for the use of the vessel by order of another.'

He never took possession; but the master having ordered necessities, the action was brought against Hart. Lord Ellenborough said: 'Since the repairs were done by order of the captain, and the plaintiff knew no owner except Howard (whom the captain had given up as owner at making the order), and the defendant was never in possession of the ship, the plaintiff must be nonsuited.'

the certificate, the person to whom the transfer is made is not to be deemed as the owner, nor the person making the transfer to be held as having ceased to be owner.¹

II.—CONTRACTS WITH THE MASTER FOR REPAIRS, ETC., TO SHIP.

Not only are contracts by the owners themselves, or by their shipshusband, effectual for repairs or furnishings made to the ship; but the master also has, by his office, full [523] authority to enter into such contracts.² By the maritime practice of nations, this authority is more clearly defined, or more strictly regulated, than in the text of the Roman law.³ The rule of that law was, 'Omnia facta magistri debet præstare qui eum præposuit;' and there was no express qualification of the power in respect of the owner's residence. According to the early maritime usage, the master's ordinary resource in difficulty was to sell part of the cargo.⁴ But more enlarged provisions were necessary for an extended trade; and it is now established, that greater power is given to the master in a foreign port, on this principle, that for extraordinary supplies at home the authority of the owners is easily obtained; while abroad the voyage may be lost, and the interests of all may suffer, if it be necessary, even for extraordinary supplies, to wait for authority from a distance. This is indeed the great principle of distinction between the actio exercitoria and the actio institoria even of the Roman law.⁵

Referring to what has already been said of the general limits of the master's power, it will be necessary here to treat more fully of the authority which he has to bind his owners.

The general ground of the master's authority is the presumed mandate which he holds from the several exercitors for conducting the navigation of the ship, as a joint adventure or partnership. These exercitors are not owners solely, but may be lessees of the ship; and the principle of their joint responsibility is, that a contract entered into with a single person shall not be disturbed, by forcing the tradesman to search out and prosecute all the owners before he can recover payment; while it cannot be shown that the tradesman did not place the whole credit of the furnishing upon one particular exercitor.⁶ The same rule has [524]

So also does Erskine (iii. 3. 43).

sarios (ut Caius ait) dstringatur qui cum uno contraxit.' Peckius, Com. in. Tit. de Exerc. Act. 155. Vinnius gives the doctrine thus: 'Si plures sint, qui navem exerceant, placet singulos ex contractu magistri in solidum teneri: idque hac ratione, ne in plures adversarios dstringatur, qui cum uno contraxit, l. 1, par. ult. et l. 2, hoc tit. fac. l. et ancillarum, 27, § ult. inf. de pecul. quippe actio exercitoria, qua tenentur exercitores, ex solius magistri persona et facto nascitur; utpote cum quo solo, non cum ipsis exercitoribus, contractum est. Neque enim ut singuli in solidum teneantur, visum est aut naturali æquitate convenire, quæ satis habet, si pro suis singuli portionibus conveniantur; neque publice utile esse, propterea quod deterrentur homines ab exercendis navibus, si metuant, ne ex facto magistri quasi in infinitum teneantur. Quin et hoc constitutum, ne exercitoria etiam universi amplius teneantur, quam ad æstimationem navis et eorum, quæ in navi sunt, teste Grotio, lib. 3, intro-been followed in modern times,¹ and is laid down by our own authorities.² The practice of our Court of Admiralty has been to hold owners jointly and severally liable for furnishings to the ship on the order of the master or shipshusband.³

In commenting further on this subject, it may be proper to distinguish between the case of furnishing in a home and in a foreign port. In a home port the demand is direct against the persons of those concerned; but although there may be a lien, there is no hypothec.⁴ In a foreign port, supplies may be furnished to the effect of giving both a direct and an indirect remedy: direct, against the owners of the ship or lessees; indirect, by the operation of a suit against the ship itself.

I. REPAIRS AND FURNISHINGS AT HOME.—The common and necessary repairs and furnishings of naval stores, and daily subsistence for a ship, may even in a home port be made on the master's authority alone, so as to bind both him and the owners. Nay, in the very residence of the owners his presumed authority extends thus far. To support a demand against the owners, it will be sufficient to show: 1. That the articles were sent to the ship, or the repairs made on her; and, 2. That those furnishings and repairs were not beyond the natural and common necessities of such a vessel;⁵ and the criterion of what is to be held as necessary is, to ask what a prudent owner would himself have done had he been present.⁶

It will be no defence against this claim, that the owners themselves took the active superintendence of the outfit, and that they gave no authority for the repairs; or that there was a shipshusband appointed, and no order or authority for repairs by him: and this because they should have been more vigilant; and because the master is at any rate to be considered as acting under their sanction and approbation, or as their servant. Neither [525] will it be a good answer, that the master received money to pay for furnishings and repairs; for the public are not presumed to know this.⁷

³ Kinnear v Craig, 13 July 1804, where, in an action for furnishings to the sloop Alexander of Saltcoats, the account was attested by the master. Defence by Craig, that he had no concern in the sailing of the ship, and never got profit. The Judge-Admiral, in respect it was not denied that the defender was a joint-owner at the time when the furnishings were made, and that the articles were furnished and not paid for, gave decree for the amount. Judge Cay's ms. vol. D, p. 184. Same principle recognised, Menzies & Goalen v Kerr, 2 March 1804; Judge Cay's ms. vol. D, p. 106. See above, p. 569, note 2 (3).

In the case, Ogilvy v Brown, 25 May 1804, a similar decision by the Judge-Admiral was brought under review of the Court of Session, on the ground that as Brown was proprietor of only a fourth of the ship, he should be liable only for one-fourth of the furnishings. Lord Meadowbank affirmed the judgment of the Judge-Admiral, subjoining this note: 'The Lord Ordinary conceives the rule of common law to be, to subject proprietors pro indiviso universally for a debt contracted by their præpositus negotiis; and that in this case the employer of the charger had, by his possession of the ship by prescription of law, a title to bind the complainer (the owner) for the expense of repairing her.' Judge Cay's ms. vol. D, p. 162, and App. No. 62.

The French Ord. de la Marine was more strict; liv. 2, tit. 1, vol. 17, prohibiting repairs, or furnishings of sails, ropes, etc. for the ship, in the port of the owner's residence, without his consent. Valin's modification of this article, in so far as to give action for what was manifestly necessary, seems well-grounded on the principle in equity, Nemo debet locupletari cum alterius jactura. Vol. i. p. 414.

⁶ Webster v Seekamp, 4 Barn. and Ald. 352; an action for coppering a vessel at Liverpool whose owners resided at Ipswich. She was bound for the Mediterranean, and to copper her was said not to be necessary, though admitted to be extremely useful. It was left to the jury to say whether the furnishing was such as a prudent owner, if present, would have ordered. This the Court confirmed. [Abbot, 11th ed. 110.]

But at the owner's residence the master's authority does not extend to extraordinary repairs, or to the victualling of the ship for a voyage, or to the borrowing of money.¹

II. REPAIRS AND MONEY IN A FOREIGN PORT.—Abroad the master has greater power. His office holds him out as the accredited agent of the owners; on whose authority all repairs, furnishings of naval stores, subsistence, or money necessary for the prosecution of the voyage, may be contracted for or advanced on the credit of the owners.² The only restraint is the necessity on the part of the furnisher or advancer of money to see that the supply which the master requires is justified by apparent necessity at least; the general maxim being, that it is only as to necessities that the master is præpositus.

1. NAVAL STORES, PROVISIONS, OR REPAIRS.—The demand is generally made on an attested account; or on the draft of the master on his owners; or on acceptances by the master as representing them for the amount. In support of these, if questioned, it will be sufficient to show that the repairs were actually made on the ship, or that furnishings, in the nature of necessary stores, or victualling for the voyage, were actually put on board.³

Whether the repairs were necessary in the strict sense of that word, seems to be fairly referable in this case, as well as in the case of furnishings at home, to the criterion already stated.⁴ The proper case requiring a proof of necessity is that of money borrowed; of which below, p. 576.

It is not a good answer to such a demand, that the owners have paid the master, or supplied him with money for the supply of the necessary repairs or furnishings. With this the public, trusting to the accredited servant of the owners, have nothing to do.

Neither is it a good defence that the employment has been directly by the consignee of the ship, and that the owners have paid him; unless the credit has been limited to the consignees, or they have been furnished with accredited documents or vouchers misleading the owners into a belief that the credit was so limited to the consignees.⁵

HYPOTHEC ON THE SHIP FOR FOREIGN REPAIRS.—But the remedy provided by law for enforcing the payment of repairs and furnishings abroad, is not confined to the personal action. A right is also given without any express contract of bottomry, respondentia, [526] or hypothecation, by means of tacit hypothec, to foreign repairers and furnishers of neces-

[See observations on this case in Wm. Rob. 361. In subsequent cases it has been held that action against the owners for furnishings at a foreign port must be supported by proof that they were necessary, and that the objection of want of authority is pleadable against endorsees of bills granted for furnishings. London Joint-stock Bank v Stewart, 1859, 21 D. 1827; Drain & Co. v Scott, 1864, 3 Macph. 114.]

saries. In the Roman law, all those who had contributed to the fitting out or repairing of a ship, whether at home or abroad, were entitled to a preference by privilege in security of their advances;¹ and this rule still prevails in most of the nations of Europe. In Holland,² in Hamburg and all the other Hanseatic towns, in France,³ in Spain,⁴ and in Italy,⁵ this prevails.

In England, in consequence of two opinions delivered by Lord Mansfield (though only collaterally), it became a question for some time whether the same rule did not prevail.⁶ But it is now settled in England that there is neither hypothec nor privilege for repairs in a home port; and that this security is allowed, in the case of foreign repairs, only from the consideration that without it ships might often be interrupted in their course, at a distance from the residence of the owners.⁷ It may be imagined that furnishings for the [527] victualling of a ship are as necessary to the voyage, and as much entitled to the security of a lien, as repairs. But the Lord Chancellor has doubted whether the same rule would be followed in regard to them.⁸

In Scotland, the course of practice seems at one time to have run strongly in favour of the continental rule, viz. that the builders, or furnishers for building, or the repairers of ⁷ The law to this effect was laid down in very plain terms, so early as the year 1726, by Sir J. Jekyl, Master of the Rolls, and assented to by the counsel on both sides: 'That if a ship be in the river Thames, and money be laid out there, either in repairing, fitting out, new rigging, or apparel of the ship, this is no charge upon the ship; but the person thus employed, or who finds these necessities, must resort to the owner thereof for payment. And in such a case, in a suit in the Court of Admiralty, to condemn the ship for non-payment of the money, the courts of law will grant a prohibition; and therefore, if the owner, after money thus laid out, mortgages the ship, though it be to one who has notice that the money was so laid out, and not paid, yet such mortgagee is well entitled, without being liable for any of the money thus laid out for the benefit of the ship as aforesaid. And the ship is no more liable for this money than a carpenter laying out money in the building of a house has a lien upon the house in respect thereof, though by the law of Holland he has; but this not being the law of England, such carpenter must resort to those who employed him, or to the owner of the house, for his money.' He adds: 'But it is true that if at sea, where no treaty or contract can be made with the owner, the master employs any person to do work on the ship, or to new rig or repair the same, this, for necessity and encouragement of trade, is a lien upon the ship; and in such case the master, by the maritime law, is allowed to hypothecate the ship.' 2 P. Wms. 367. This last part of his judgment was overruled in Hussey v Christie, 13 Ves. jun. 594. See also 9 East 426.

In the case of Buxton v Snee, in 1748, where the question of hypothec occurred in dividing the price of a ship, Lord Hardwicke seems to refer it entirely to the principle, that a ship in England is under the common law, not under the maritime, which, prevailing abroad, gives hypothec for foreign repairs. 'Certainly, by the maritime law, the master has power to hypothecate both ship and cargo for repairs, etc. during the voyage, which arises from his authority as master, and the necessity thereof during the voyage, without which both ship and cargo would perish: therefore both that and the law of this country admit such a power. But it is different where the ship is in port, infra portus comitatus, and the contract for repairs, etc. made on land in England: then the rule of law must prevail. I know no case where the repairs, etc., whether it was by part-owners or sole owner, master or husbands, have been held a charge or lien on the body of the ship,—Watkinson v Barnardiston, 2 P. Wms. 367, being a direct authority to the contrary; and if the ship in the river, infra corpus comitatus, should be proceeded against and stopped for such debt, the courts of law would issue a prohibition, the contract being on land, and not arising from necessity.' 1 Ves. 154. See also ex parte Shank, 1 Atk. 234, where a repairer having got possession of the price of the ship, was ordered to account to the assignees of the owner, a bankrupt, and come in under the commission for his repairs. Lord Mansfield himself laid down the doctrine as it is now settled in Wilkins v Carmichael, in 1779, and on the broad principle: 'Work done for a ship in England is supposed to be on the credit of the employers; in foreign ports the master may hypothecate the ship.' Doug. 101. In a case in Scotland, in 1788, the opinion of Dr. Wynne was taken on this question; and he gave a very clear answer, that 'by the law of England, a tradesman who repairs or furnishes materials for a ship, the owner of which resides in England, does not acquire any lien upon the ship, but is considered in the same light as any other personal creditor of the owner or person who employs him.' He cites and relies on the authorities quoted in this note, without taking any notice of the two reports of Lord Mansfield's opinion in 1777 and 1786. [Abbot, 11th ed. 119.]

ships, were entitled to hypothec.¹ But now the rule has been settled in perfect conformity with the English law, by a decision affirmed in the House of Lords, and confirmed in the Court of Session.²

The law may now therefore be considered as fixed, that there is no hypothec on a ship for repairs in a home port; although there is reason to believe that the deviation from that maritime rule which prevails in other nations has originally proceeded in England from the peculiar notions of jurisdiction established there, rather than from any general principle of law or of expediency, and that it has been established in Scotland by mere adoption. By the law, as now settled, builders and repairers, and furnishers to ships in a home port, though they may have a lien, provided the ship is in their entire possession, or a real security by bond of bottomry, have no hypothec under which, after the ship has quitted their possession, they can be entitled to a preference over other creditors.

Between that case, however, and the case of repairs in a foreign port, there is this ground for distinction in reason and equity, that wherever a workman is deprived of the power of treating with the owners themselves, he ought to be secured by a hypothec or preference: where he may so treat with the owners, his situation is not different from that of other dealers. And on this ground, a ship repaired in a foreign port is under hypothec for the amount, and may be proceeded against in Admiralty, or a preference claimed in any competition which may arise.

But is a foreign ship, repaired here, subject to hypothec for those repairs? If the principle be admitted, that where the repairer cannot treat personally with the owners, and have execution against them within his own territory, there ought to be a preference, it should be so. There seems reason to hold, that should the creditors of the foreign owners attach her before she left the country, and have her brought to sale, the repairers here would be entitled to a preference. This opinion prevails universally at the bar in Scotland, though it has not yet been precisely determined. In England, some countenance is given to the distinction by Lord Stowell, who, in a question whether persons furnishing stores to an American ship were not entitled to payment out of the proceeds of the [528] ship brought to sale by the seamen for their wages, admitted a distinction between the case of foreign and British ships.³

It has not been determined what shall be deemed a home port in a question of repairs. In a case already cited⁴ Hull was held a foreign port, in a question as to repairs on a Greenock ship. But this decision was cancelled in the House of Lords, as determining a point unnecessary to the decision of the case; and although this may be regarded as an opinion of the Court of Session, proceeding on very ample discussion, the question must be held as still open. The natural course is to adopt the rule of the Navigation Laws, and to hold all British ports as home ports—those Acts regarding all British ports as on the same footing; the repairers having immediate access to the registers to ascertain who is proprietor; and ² Hamilton v Wood and others, M. 6269. Here Wood and others had repaired a Scottish ship in a home port, and claimed a hypothec for the amount. Lord Justice-Clerk M'Queen sustained the claim. The Court ordered a case to be sent for the opinion of English counsel; and the opinion of Dr. Wynne, mentioned supra, p. 574, note 7, was returned, on which the Court found that Wood and the other furnishers had no hypothec or right of bottomry on the ship in question. This judgment was affirmed in the House of Lords, 15 June 1789, 3 Pat. 148.

In another case, Wood & Co. v Crs. of Weir, wherein the same company was concerned, an attempt was made to re-establish the right of preference, on the ground of an extension of the lien which the repairer of a ship has while she remains in his possession, as if that possession could be retained animo. But this was, in other words, precisely the plea of hypothec, and was unanimously rejected by the Second Division of the Court, 31st January 1810.

the communication by post giving to the owners full opportunity to take charge of the ship, and provide security for relieving her from the lien of the repairers.¹

2. MONEY may be raised abroad by the master for supplying the necessities of the ship. This is the most dangerous form in which the master's authority can be exerted; the facility of misapplication, and the temptation to it, being so great, and the owners being exposed to an unlimited personal obligation beyond even the value of the ship. If in all cases a written authority to the master were requisite, the exercitors might limit the master's power in such a way as to lessen this danger, by requiring particular conditions to each loan; as the consent of the mate or some other confidential person; or certain proceedings, judicial or otherwise, in the foreign port, grounded on satisfactory evidence of the purpose and application of the loan. But even these limitations would manifestly form only an approximation to a safeguard; and as, by the maritime law, the master, by virtue of his place and possession, holds a general authority which requires no written title, the rule of adhering strictly to the terms of the mandate, which are so anxiously dictated by foreign jurists, seems to be vain and nugatory.² The power is given to the shipmaster to provide against necessities, which may come in such a variety of forms, or be feigned in so many plausible shapes, that there is no effectual safeguard but a wise selection of a shipmaster, backed perhaps by security at home, that the owners shall be indemnified against his transactions. The checks which seem practicable are these:—1. That the lenders should make every inquiry which time and circumstances permit into the nature and extent of the commission held by the master; by requiring production of his authority, if any have been granted, in writing; or by inquiring at others on board; or by requiring to see letters from the owners. 2. That where a special commission is known to exist, or where its existence or any limitation of power must be supposed in the circumstances, the limits of the power must be observed.³ 3. That the lender shall in all cases be held bound to see that a necessity exists for the loan required by the master; and, as a part of the same rule, that the loan does not exceed the limits of that necessity. 4. That the loan shall be made [529] in a place and in circumstances to afford relief.⁴

Such are the precautions laid down in foreign authorities. They are so manifestly consistent with equity and good sense, that they have been universally adopted.

In England they are followed as law.⁵

⁵ Cary v White, in 1710, as reported by Abbot, 11th ed. 111. In a case tried at Guildhall, Rocher v Busher, 1815, 1 Starkie 27, objection was taken to items for money advanced to the master. Lord Ellenborough (after holding the master a good witness to prove the necessity; see below, p. 577, note 4) said: 'In strictness, a claim of this kind is limited to

In Scotland also they are laid down by our authors, and followed judicially. Although, according to Lord Stair, 'he who contracts with the master needs not instruct that the money borrowed was actually employed for the use of the ship's company or voyage,' yet 'this much he must make appear, that when he lent the money there was such need of it; albeit he be not obliged to take notice whether the master misemployed it or not, because the exercitor should have looked who he trusted.'¹ With this the doctrine of Erskine precisely accords.² He adds, that 'the bond must, for the exercitor's greater security, express the cause of borrowing.'

In Admiralty, several cases have been tried in which these rules have been applied, with the modifications which circumstances naturally dictated; as, for example, the general rule, that the lender is not bound to see to the application, was qualified in one case, where an enormous expenditure had taken place, and the master was admitted to be a weak man.³

The evidence of the master to the necessity of the furnishings has been held good in England.⁴ But although the import of the document, bearing value in necessaries, [530] may be prima facie proof to support the claim, it will not be held sufficient, without production of all the evidence, and the examination of the master on oath.

The master may sign a bond, or accept a bill, or draw upon the owners; taking care to express in the obligation the cause of borrowing. The checks on the exercise of this power are those already set down. The master himself is bound by all such obligations, unless he stipulate that the owners shall alone be responsible.

The modes in which pecuniary supplies may thus be raised by the master, besides the loan or mere personal engagement, are: 1. By bottomry or respondentia; and, 2. By sale of the ship or cargo.

articles supplied through necessity. But where the same necessity exists, money may be supplied as well as goods, and the amount recovered. This, however, must not be understood of an indefinite supply of cash, which the master may dissipate, but only such as is warranted by the exigency of the case, as for the payment of duties or other necessary purposes. I once held that proof of the strict application of the money to the purposes of the ship was necessary; and Mr. J. Heath, sitting for the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, did the same. We are in this case left much in the dark, and I cannot advise you to find more than you may deem to have been absolutely necessary for the use of the vessel.'

Here the Concordia having sailed to Jamaica, under Simson as master, she struck on a rock at Jamaica, became leaky, and required repair. Money paid for and advanced to Simson at Jamaica, £3175, on bills drawn by him, and a bond of hypothecation. In support of the action there were produced: 1. An account attested by the captain; 2. The captain's bill, bearing to be for repairs; 3. Hypothecation bond; 4. A survey, report, and attestation at Kingston. It was objected that in the pursuer's correspondence the master was stated to be little better than an idiot, and that £800 were stated in the account as paid at once, unchecked, to the master. The Judge-Admiral held the account to divide into four branches: 1. Sums paid to the master for the use of the ship; 2. Sums paid to tradesmen for repairs; 3. Sums paid to retire the master's drafts; 4. Sums for premium of insurance. The accounts being attested by the master, the first point was, Whether that was sufficient evidence? He required the discharged accounts and retired bills as vouchers of the articles paid towards those purposes, to prevent a second claim, as well as to verify the debt. He held the sum of advance to be so great, where the repairs were not paid direct by the merchant, and where the master was weak in mind, that the merchant was to be held responsible for a degree of care beyond the ordinary rule, and to see to the application of the money.

⁴ In Rocher v Busher (supra, p. 576, note 5), Lord Ellenborough held the master to be a good witness to prove the necessity.

It had formerly been so held in Evans v Williams by Lord Kenyon, 7 Term. Rep. 481, note. Here the captain of an Indiaman borrowed money of Evans for the use of the ship. Williams, the owner, objected that the money was for the use of the captain himself. The captain was called to prove the use, and was objected to, as 'being interested to discharge himself by throwing the onus upon his owners.' It was answered, 'that the owners had a remedy over against him if the money came to his hands, and that he was liable on his own bill of exchange to the plaintiffs on the one hand, and to the owners on the other. Lord Kenyon thought the objection had been well answered; but to what extent the witness should be received is another question. This does not go on the ground of Maxwell being a witness of necessity, for courts have very seldom decided on such a ground. I think the plea of necessity was only admitted in cases upon the statute of hue and cry. I decide this case upon the ground that the witness stands indifferent between the parties, for whichever way the question goes here he is equally answerable.'

III.—CONTRACTS OF BOTTOMRY AND RESPONDENTIA.

These are contracts which may either be considered as personal obligations for the loan of money, or as securities entitling the lender to a preference. In this last respect they might properly find a place among Securities over the moveable property; but it is more convenient to bring all the branches of maritime law into one place.

By the contract of BOTTOMRY, or RESPONDENTIA, money is, in contemplation of a particular voyage, lent to the master of a ship in a foreign country, or to the owner of the ship or cargo¹ in a home port; on this condition, that if the subject on which the money is taken be lost by sea-risk, or superior force of the enemy, the lender shall lose his money; and that if the voyage shall be successful, the sum shall be repaid, with a certain profit, or consideration for interest and risk, as agreed upon. And for the payment both the person of the borrower is bound; and the ship in bottomry, or the goods in respondentia, are in certain cases hypothecated to the lender.² In respondentia, however, the chief security is personal. See below, p. 583.

These contracts were formerly more in use, and of more importance than at present. They are now chiefly used for the securing of loans to foreign shipmasters. Abroad, they are still spoken of as among the most frequent and important of maritime contracts;³ while in Britain the increase of trading capital has taken away a great part of their consequence, and made them comparatively of less use.

These contracts are entered into either by the owners of the vessel themselves, or by the merchant who is fitting out the expedition, or by the master of the ship at a distance from his owner.

[531] 1. Those only who have a vested assignable interest in the ship or freight may enter into a bond of bottomry to the effect of constituting a hypothec over the ship or freight, as the owners whose names are on the register, or mortgagees. The whole owners may join in bottomry, or any one owner may hypothecate his own share. Where there is disension among the owners respecting the voyage, the majority carries; and in case of refusal by the minority, the master may borrow money on bottomry for the outfit proportioned to their share.⁴

2. In the same way as in regard to those having right to the ship or freight in bottomry, those who have a vested assignable property in the goods may borrow money on respondentia. This may vest a person who has a mere temporary possession as factor with the power of taking money on the credit of his owner's property, but it is limited by the nature of the contract to the occasions of the voyage.

¹ [The master's right to hypothecate the cargo as well as the ship for necessaries is the subject of Lord Stowell's decision in the leading case of the Gratitudine, infra. See Anderston Foundry Co. v Law, 1869, 7 Macph. 836. More recently, it has been held by a court of error in England, that where the owner of cargo has been made to contribute under a bottomry bond, in consequence of the insufficiency of the ship and freight, he has a right of relief against the shipowners. Ben-son v Duncan, 3 Exch. 644, 2 H. ³ Baldasseroni speaks of bottomry as one 'che oggidì è il più frequente che si pratiche nelle città et paesi di mare' (vol. ii. 383).

The recusant owner must, according to the Hanseatic Code, be cited to contribute his share; and at least a protest would be required with us.

3. The master's power to borrow money on these contracts has already been considered; and for anything further that may be necessary on the point, I refer to the case below.¹

As bottomry deprives the owners of a great part of the profit of a successful voyage, the master of the ship is not permitted, at the place of the owner's residence, to enter into such a contract. This rule seems to exclude such transactions anywhere within the British empire;² at least it has been doubted by Lord Stowell whether the union with Ireland has or has not altered the rule formerly adopted, holding an Irish to be a foreign port as to hypothecation for repairs.³

In a foreign country the master is allowed to enter into bottomry, if he can no otherwise procure a supply. But where he has already received the money on the footing of personal credit, he is not held to have power to convert the personal contract into a bottomry transaction.⁴

FORM OF THE CONTRACT.—The contract is in the form either of a bond, or of a bill, of bottomry. And, first, The sum must be expressed, with the marine interest payable for the loan; secondly, The subject must be specified upon which the money is taken; thirdly, The nature of the risk must be stated, and its termination as well as its commencement.

1. The SUM ADVANCED forms the distinguishing feature between this contract and insurance; and it is essential to the contract that the sum lent, or a subject of security equivalent to it, shall be exposed to the perils of the voyage.⁵ The consequence of loss under a policy of insurance is to render the underwriter debtor for the value insured; the effect of it in bottomry is to extinguish the lender's claim for repayment.⁶ The lender in the one case, the insurer in the other, is liable to the same perils.

Where the money is taken up by the master in a foreign port, the bond must bear that the money was borrowed for the use of the ship, as the master has no power to hypothecate but for necessary supplies. And this prima facie evidence, supported by proof that the money was fairly and regularly lent for the ship's use, will be sufficient to sustain the contract, and give effect to the hypothec, although, in fact, the master has abused the confidence reposed in him, and misapplied the money.⁷ If there be any fraud in which the lender is participant, the contract is of course impeachable on that ground.

But it is not necessary that money should have been lent: the bottomry creditor [532] may be a carpenter or ship-chandler, who has repaired or supplied the vessel, and who rather chooses to put the amount into the form of a bond of bottomry or respondentia, than to leave it open as an account, though secured by tacit hypothec.⁸

The money lent, or the amount of the furnishing, with the maritime interest, constitutes the sum for which, on the successful issue of the voyage, the creditor has his claim. The maritime interest is in no sense usury. It is analogous to the profit in partnership, or the premium in insurance, and cannot (as it appears to have been under Justinian) be fixed like

Rob. 298); because it is the master's duty if possible to obtain an advance on the personal credit of the owner. By an extension of this principle, it is now ruled that in a foreign port having telegraphic communication with the owner's place of residence, the master cannot pledge the ship without first communicating by electric telegraph with the owners. See Sir J. Jervis' judgment in the leading case of Wallace v Fielden, 7 Moo. P. C. Ca. 398, and cases cited by Tudor, 2d ed. p. 60.]

common interest to a peculiar rate.¹ It is not, like the Fœnus Nauticum of the Roman law, a current interest of so much per cent. per month, but a certain sum fixed to be paid as the maritime interest on the whole voyage. Sometimes, however, where a certain time is appointed for the duration of the voyage, a stipulation is made of a proportional addition, per month or week, after the elapse of that time.

The moment the risk is at an end, the marine interest ceases, and the debt becomes absolute, bearing thenceforward simple interest.² This interest has been held, by some lawyers of great authority, to run only on the principal sum, not on the interest.³ But there seems to be some ground for regarding the sum in the bond as a principal and absolute debt on the successful termination of the voyage. And accordingly, by other authors of great authority, the interest is made to run on the whole sum.⁴ In England the law is laid down consistently with the former opinion.⁵

2. The CONTRACT by which sometimes money is lent on a high premium for risk, but without any pledge of the ship, etc., as a security, is not strictly speaking bottomry, but a loan on an adventure, in which the lender has only the personal security of the borrower. This is a legal contract in all cases, except the case of ships bound to or from the East Indies, in which an exception is made by statute for the protection of the trade of the East India Company.⁶ In the proper contract of bottomry or respondentia, a subject is pledged for the loan; and the general rule of maritime law is, that whatever is capable of insurance may be the subject of these contracts,—the ship, the tackle and furniture, the provisions, the freight, the cargo, the goods, but not the wages of the sailors.⁷

A bond of bottomry over the SHIP, of course, binds the ship and owners, without any qualification. A bond of bottomry on the FREIGHT seems properly to have in contemplation only the freight of that voyage; but it has been held that the lender has the freight of a subsequent voyage bound to him, where the interest of third parties does not intervene.⁸

[533] It appears that the contract may be entered into, although the ship be at the time at sea.⁹

As money may be taken on the ship, cargo, or parts of either, there may be many bottomry and respondentia bonds on one voyage. In case of partial loss, the right of each lender is appropriate to the subject in his bond.

EFFECT OF THE CONTRACT.—The effect of the contract of bottomry is to give condi-

⁸ The Jacob, Baer, 1802, 4 Rob. Adm. 245. A bottomry bond was executed in America, in general terms, over ship and freight. The voyage was described as from Baltimore to Cork. The ship sailed, and, without fraud, went to Dublin instead of Cork. She there discharged and sailed, and the lender had no opportunity of enforcing payment. She, after this second voyage, returned to Britain, and was arrested, and was by order of the Court of Admiralty sold. The price of the ship was not sufficient to answer the debt, and the freight of this second voyage was attached in the hands of the agents of the owners. The learned judge of the Court of Admiralty 'held the freight of the subsequent voyage, in the custody of the Court, answerable for the demand.' He intimated that this was not a general rule in all cases and circumstances, where any third party may be interested in the freight of the subsequent voyage. But in this case there is no person concerned but the owner of the ship and the holder of the bond.

⁹ Emerigon denies this, vol. i. p. 484. But Valin (vol. i. p. 346) lays it down, and his opinion seems to be followed. Marshall 754.

tionally at once a personal claim, and a real security for the sum to which the lender is entitled; that of respondentia creates in general only a personal obligation.

I. Respecting BOTTOMRY, Mr. Erskine has laid it down, but without citing any authority or decision, that it imposes no personal obligation upon the borrower.¹ This doctrine, however, is contrary to all the authorities,² and even to the very nature and known effects of the contract. Indeed, the controversy in other countries has been, whether it creates any other than a personal obligation. Our older formalists inserted a clause of personal obligation in bottomry bonds; but, on the authority of Mr. Erskine, this was at one time omitted in collections of forms. In more modern practice, however, the personal obligation is continued in bonds of bottomry.

The real right which is vested in the lender in bottomry extends over the particular subject of his security. Where the loan is to the owners of the ship, the security, unless restricted, is over the ship, with its tackle, furniture, and provisions. In England it is fixed law, that 'where the ship and tackle are brought home, they are liable, as well as the person of the borrower, for the money lent.'³ There is not a single reported case establishing this to be the law of Scotland; but this circumstance, with the understood nature of the contract among merchants, is evidence of the law being fixed beyond dispute. Erskine lays down the real burden on the ship as the legal effect of this contract; and in the records of the Admiralty Court, in every case of a competition of creditors on the price of a ship, the preference of bottomry creditors appears to have been held unquestionable.⁴

RISKS.—In questions on bottomry, it may happen that the ship may not have sailed, or that she may have been lost by such deviation⁵ or defect as would free an underwriter, or that she may have suffered damage without any such defect, or that she may have completed her voyage.

1. In the first of these cases a real right seems to be vested, as well as in the [534] last.⁶ The marine interest, indeed, cannot be due, because that is the price of a risk, which in such a case is not incurred;⁷ but the money has been advanced on the faith of a real security, and it has been applied to the benefit of the ship, and therefore to the extent of the principal and common interest there appear to be legal grounds for preference.

2. Where the ship has perished by not being seaworthy, or by deviation, the personal contract will be effectual. It may be questioned whether, in a case of want of seaworthi-ness, the risk has ever begun; and so, whether the rule applied above to the case of a ship which has not sailed on her voyage, should not regulate the lender's claim?

3. Where there is no partial loss, a distinction is (in the absence of specific stipulation) admitted between general and particular or simple average, the lender being held liable to the former, not to the latter.¹ General average is for a loss incurred, towards which the whole concern is bound to contribute pro rata, because it was undergone for the general benefit and preservation of the whole. Simple or particular average is one of those incorrect expressions which, though in familiar use, and sufficiently understood by persons versant in the matter, are apt to mislead. It means nothing more than the damage incurred by or for one part of the concern, and which that part alone must bear. The loss of an anchor, the starting of a plank, the leaking of a cask, the accidental loss of part of the ship, or cargo washed from the deck, are examples of simple or particular average, or loss incident to the proprietor that suffers. The loss of masts, or rigging, or goods cut away or thrown overboard, to ease the ship and lessen the common danger, are examples of general average.² In one sense, simple or particular average affects the bottomry or respondentia creditor, where it lights upon the subject of his security, for it lessens the security which he holds. In another, it has no effect on his debt, since the condition of payment is the arrival of the ship or goods. That condition is fulfilled by their arrival, though damaged; and unless there is an express stipulation that his claim shall be liable to particular average, the whole sum is due. In the same sense, the real security is subject to general average; but, further, the creditor is also liable to a deduction from his personal claim against the lender, on account of general average. So it is laid down by the best foreign authorities,³ who even hold an opposite stipulation to be unlawful. But different usages prevail in different countries, and that of the particular country to which the ship belongs must be regarded. In England, it seems to be a disputed point whether the lender be liable to general average, independently of stipulation. The dicta of two eminent judges, adverse to the lender's obligation, are reported in the books;⁴ and the two authors who have lately written on this subject differ very much in their opinions on the point.⁵ But Mr. Marshall seems to me to have supported the doctrine very satisfactorily, that bottomry creditors are liable to general average. [535] In Scotland there is neither decided case nor authority on the subject. The bond will, of course, regulate the question where it is explicit; where it is not, the rule adopted abroad, and for which so fair a principle is assigned, would certainly have much influence.

4. Where the voyage has been accomplished, the real right, as covering the whole claim, has vested over the ship, with its furniture, tackle, and freight: the ship, etc. may be brought to sale, the freight stopped in the hands of those by whom it is due.

PROCEEDINGS.—To make the debt effectual, the proceedings are in Admiralty by an application for the sale of the ship, and payment of the bottomry debt, or a warrant against those who owe freight.

The order of preference of bottomry creditors is in favour of the last in date; that loan or debt of which it can be said, 'Salvam fecit totius pignoris causam.'⁶ So, 1. Seamen are for their wages preferred to a bottomry creditor; for without their aid the furnishings are useless, and the voyage whereon the lender's right depends cannot be accomplished. 2. The last bottomry creditor is always preferred. If the owners have taken up money on bottomry to fit out the vessel, and in the course of the voyage the master has been forced to refit, the furnishers, in a foreign port, or lenders on bottomry for this purpose, are preferred before the former bottomry creditor. This proceeds on the same principle with the other rule of preference. Without this second loan the vessel could not have proceeded, nor the voyage have been accomplished. 3. The bottomry creditors on the latest voyage are, in the continental laws, preferred on somewhat of a similar principle.¹ 4. An effectual bottomry debt is good against purchasers in the course of the voyage, and it seems also to be effectual against prior lenders on vendition in security: for they are either owners, or at least the subject of their right is benefited, or the managers of it furnished with means by the bottomry loan.

[Where different creditors contribute towards the necessities of the ship, on the same occasion taking separate bonds, they will be ranked pro rata and without any preference, not-

II. RESPONDENTIA.—The contract of RESPONDENTIA is in foreign nations attended with the same real security over the cargo that bottomry produces over the ship.² In England, Blackstone has laid it down that the claim is only personal; but he rests this doctrine upon a principle so narrow,³ that doubts are naturally suggested of the soundness of his rule in any case. Accordingly, the later authors seem to admit the real security, wherever there is an express stipulation to that effect.⁴ In Scotland, we are not very familiar with [536] this contract; and no cases are to be found in our books in which it has become the subject of discussion. It is to be expected, that were any case to occur, our judges would pay much regard to the English rules; and that they would be brought with great reluctance to sanction a real security upon goods on the footing of a respondentia bond, unless on special stipulation.

CLAIM.—The claim under contracts of bottomry and respondentia is not very different in the two contracts. 1. In respondentia, as in bottomry, where the goods have been utterly lost by the fault of the master, in consequence of wilful deviation, from the vessel not being seaworthy, or from the goods being improperly packed and loaded, the claim of the respondentia creditor is effectual, but of course merely personal. 2. ² Pothier, Tr. du Cont. de Prêt à la Gr. Avant. Nos. 56, 57, vol. iii. p. 97; Emerigon, vol. ii. p. 561.

³ 'If the loan is not upon the vessel, but upon the goods and merchandise, which must necessarily be sold or exchanged in the course of the voyage, then only the borrower personally is bound to answer the contract' (2 Black. Com. 458). This principle does not apply to every case: for, 1. The voyage may be homeward; 2. If the voyage be out and home, the goods substituted for the outward cargo might afford the same security, and in foreign nations this is the law. Emerigon, vol. ii. p. 561.

⁴ Thus, Mr. Park says: 'Bottomry is a loan upon the ship, respondentia on the goods: in the former, the ship and tackle are liable, as well as the person of the owner; in the latter, for the most part, recourse must be had only to the person of the owner' (p. 410). Marshall, in his first edition, after saying that the respondentia lender has in general only the personal security of the borrower, adds: 'But the personal responsibility of the borrower is not in all cases the only security of the lender. Where the money is lent for the outward and homeward voyage, the goods of the borrower on board, and the returns for them, whether in money or in other goods purchased abroad with the proceeds of them, are liable to the lender' (p. 633). On this passage, in the first edition of this work, it was observed that Marshall quoted for this doctrine only the authority of Pothier and Emerigon, two foreign lawyers; that both of these are certainly of great authority (though in truth he has the support only of Emerigon, for Pothier in the place referred to is speaking of the question of risk, not of preference); and that there seemed reason to suspect that while the practical doctrine ought to be taken as broadly as it is laid down by Blackstone, the narrowness of the principle which he assumes has had a tendency to unsettle the rule. In Mr. Marshall's second edition he has altered this passage, confined the doctrine to the French law ('According to the French writers, the personal responsibility, etc.'), and on the authority of a case in King's Bench laid it down: 'That unless there be an express stipulation to that effect in the bond, the lender has no lien on the homeward cargo, nor any other security for his demand than the personal responsibility of the borrower or his sureties, if he has any' (p. 743).

The case referred to by Marshall is Busk v Fearon, sent on a case by the Lord Chancellor for the opinion of the King's Bench. 4 East 319.

from any other accident, for the risk of which an insurer would be liable, the claim is extinguished. 3. Where the voyage has never been entered upon, the claim is restricted to the principal sum, with common interest. 4. Where the voyage has been successfully accomplished, the claim for the principal and marine interest becomes absolute. 5. When the ship is lost, but the goods saved, a respondentia creditor is entitled to his money; as, where the ship is saved, but the goods lost, the bottomry debt is good.

In concluding on this contract, it may be observed that there is nothing in the nature of it to prevent the creditor from taking collateral security for the personal obligation, provided the condition of completion of the voyage be made a part of it, and that it is not a wager.¹

SALE OF THE SHIP OR CARGO FOR THE SUPPLY OF NECESSARIES.

The last resource for the supply of necessities is the sale of the ship or cargo.

The master has no power thus to sell, without having first deliberately tried every other expedient.² Nay, it has sometimes been denied that he has any such power, but only a power to hypothecate.³ In later cases, however, this power has been sanctioned in England, and the precedent will apply in Scotland. In one case of the sale of the ship, it was laid down as law by Lord Stowell, that it must be shown there was a necessity; and that in making out such a case, it is requisite to prove not only that the vessel was in want, but likewise that it was impossible to find money for that purpose without a sale.⁴ In another case, relative to a sale of part of the cargo, the same principles were applied;⁵ and generally it may be observed, that the duty of the master being to send the goods to their destination, [537] no power is implied in him which has not this object in view: nor is he entitled to levy money by an absolute sale of goods, to be delivered at the port of destination to the lender or his agent, without a right of redemption to the owner.⁶ 2. That although he may sell perishable goods which cannot be carried to their port, yet, where the goods are of a different description, circumstances must show a necessity to justify a sale short of the port of destination.⁷ How the master shall proceed to tranship, to deposit and store, or how else to deal with the goods, may be difficult to be determined in various circumstances; and no general rule can well be delivered, except the injunction to do that which a wise and prudent man will think most conducive to the benefit of all concerned.⁸ But at least a sale is the last thing to be thought of, and the most difficult to be justified.

In short, the doctrine seems to resolve into this, that in proving the necessity that is to justify a sale either of ship or cargo, without the consent and at a distance from the residence of the owners, it must at all events be made to appear that the necessity was imperative;

² Underwood v Robertson, 4 Camp. 138.

³ Johnson v Shippin, 2 Lord Raymond 984.

⁴ Fanny v Elmira, Hicks, 1809, Edward's Adm. 117.

[In the development of this branch of the law, a distinction has been introduced between the right to sell a part of the cargo, and the right to sell the ship and cargo. The former right may be exercised to provide funds for the repair of the ship, because this is for the benefit of the remaining part of the cargo; 'but,' said Lord Stowell, 'it never can be for the benefit of the cargo that the whole should be sold to repair a ship which is to proceed empty to the place of her destination.' The Gratitudine, 3 C. Rob. 240. But, secondly, the master may sell the whole ship and cargo, for the purpose of remitting the proceeds to their respective owners, when the voyage has become hopeless—obviously a right of a very different character from the former. 'This principle,' said Lord Gifford,

'may be clearly laid down, that a sale can only be permitted in case of urgent necessity, that it must be bona fide for the benefit of all concerned, and must be strictly watched' (1 Bing. 450). See the cases in Tud. M. and M. C. p. 73.

Connected with this subject is that of the powers and duties of the master in relation to transhipment of cargo, as negotiorum gestor for the freighters. In many cases this is obviously a preferable course to that of a forced sale in an unsuitable market. The leading case is Shipton v Thornton, 9 Ad. and El. 314. See also Tudor, M. and M. Ca. p. 77.]

that there was no correspondent of the owners at hand, who could supply necessities for the ship; that no money could be had by hypothecation; and that everything had been done in bona fide, and for the true benefit of the owners.

CLAIMS FOR REPAIRS AND FURNISHINGS ON BANKRUPTCY.

Claims may arise on contracts for the repairs and necessities of a ship, either on the bankruptcy of the owners, or on that of the master, or on that of all the parties to the contract.

I. CLAIMS ON THE BANKRUPTCY OF THE OWNERS.—1. The owners are liable only pro rata on contracts in which they personally engage. They are not sureties for each other; but each is considered as the manager of his own share of the common estate. On the bankruptcy, therefore, of any one owner, or on the bankruptcy of them all, the claim must be restricted to the individual shares.

2. When the contract is by the shipshusband or master, the tradesman has in Scotland a claim against each owner for the whole sum, drawing no more on the whole than full payment. The claim is as extensive as in England, where the plea of abatement has been omitted.¹

3. If the tradesman do not claim against the owners, but takes recourse against the master, the master will be entitled to a claim for relief against the owners.

4. Where a claim has been entered on both estates, if the master be indebted to the owners, he will be entitled to plead compensation or retention against his owners to the effect of relieving himself.

II. CLAIMS ON THE BANKRUPTCY OF THE MASTER.—The general rule is, that the master is himself debtor for all furnishings of repairs and necessities made by his order to the vessel under his charge, or sent to the ship while under his charge, without a special contract with the owners, and for all supplies of money to him as master. A claim may therefore be entered on his bankrupt estate in such cases, whether the supplies and furnishings have been actually bestowed on the ship, or converted to the master's use, or embezzled by the crew under his command. The claim may be made against the estates both of the owners and of the master, or it may be directed first against the owners, or first against the master's estate.

1. Where both have failed, and the supplies having been fairly applied, the [538] claim is made against both, the creditors may rank on the estate of each for the whole sum. In this case the master's estate will have the benefit of set-off against any balance of freight levied by him. He will also be entitled still to insist on levying any freights not yet paid, but which he had previously power to levy, so as to indemnify himself for his engagements.

2. If the supplies have been fairly employed for the necessary occasions of the ship, then the master's estate, against which a claim for the amount has been made, will be entitled to demand relief from the estate of the owner, provided no claim has already been made on that estate by the merchant. But even where such claim is entered, compensation or retention will be pleadable by the master's estate against the owners, on any balance which the master may happen to owe to the owners.

3. If the master have abused his powers, and perverted to his own use the supplies given or money paid to him, the owners will be entitled to demand relief from the master's estate, provided a claim has not already been entered on that estate by those who have made the advances.

SECTION II.

OF CONTRACTS FOR THE EMPLOYMENT OF THE SHIP ON GENERAL OR SPECIAL AFFREIGHTMENT.

A ship may be hired or freighted by one or more merchants for a particular voyage, or on time; or it may be advertised for the general use of all merchants who have goods to send to the port of the ship's destination, and independent contracts may be made for the carriage of specific articles. The former is called a CHARTERED SHIP, being freighted by a special contract of affreightment, executed between the owners, shipshusband, or master on the one hand, and the merchants on the other. The latter is said to be a GENERAL SHIP, or a ship on GENERAL FREIGHT; the bills of lading granted by the master on receiving the specific goods being commonly the sole evidence of the contract for carriage of those goods. Bills of lading are used both in special affreightment and in taking goods on board of general ships, not to supersede, in the former case, but to aid the evidence of the charter-party, by proving against the shipmaster the goods actually taken on board under the contract, and to afford the means of transferring the goods while the ship is at sea.

It is proposed in this section to explain, in the first place, the leading principles by which the doctrine of these contracts is regulated; and then to consider the several questions that may arise on the failure of any of the parties.

SUBSECTION I.—GENERAL PRINCIPLES RELATING TO CONTRACTS OF AFFREIGHTMENT.

The contract of affreightment is that by which an entire ship, or a principal part of it, is let to a merchant for the carriage of goods, or for such other use as it may be applied to; the owner of the ship being bound that the ship shall in all respects be fit for the stipulated purpose, and the merchant being bound to pay a certain sum for the freight or hire of the vessel. This contract, by us called AFFREIGHTMENT or CHARTER-PARTY, AFFRETEMENT in the French books, NAULIS in those of Italy, is of the class of contracts locatio conductio.¹ The essential principles and rules by which it is regulated are the same in special and in general [539] freight. These the charter-party expresses pretty fully; while the bill of lading, in general freight, leaves the chief obligations to the construction of law.

I.—OF CHARTER-PARTIES OF AFFREIGHTMENT.

In Scotland, the charter-party is not trammelled by those technical rules which, to a stranger, appear to oppose so many bars to the efficacy of the contract according to the jurisprudence of England.² The contract, when duly executed by the owners, or by the shipshusband, or by the master within the limits of his powers, is binding on the owners, and gives action direct in the Court of Admiralty against all concerned. It also in general contains a registration clause, in virtue of which it may be the ground of summary execution, without any necessity for a previous action.

The engagement to carry goods is in its nature a contract consensual, not absolutely requiring writing, but which may be proved by the oath of the owners; by the evidence of the master, mate, and others; by a bill of lading; by the fact of the merchant's goods having actually been carried; or by the fact of the goods being actually on board. The special contract of affreightment was formerly required by statute to be executed in writing in the form of a charter-party,³ and now any written contract entered into on this occasion is sub-

³ By 1466, c. 14, no ship was to be freighted without a charter-party, of which the points are specified. This law had fallen into neglect within the short space of twenty years, and was renewed by 1487, c. 109. But this, as well as the former Act, is not now in observance.

ject to a stamp-duty;¹ but no particular form of instrument or solemnity is necessary. This contract may be proved by formal charter-party, authenticated according to the requisites of the Act 1681 and other statutes; or by a memorandum, letter, or the like, holograph; or even if not holograph, but only signed by the parties, such writings will, as in re mercatoria, be sufficient to sustain action.

The affreightment may be of the whole ship, or of a part of the ship, described commonly by the ton, or barrel bulk.

Where the whole ship is freighted, it is the freighter's for that voyage: the unoccupied space is his, to fill up in any way that he pleases; and the master cannot receive other goods without the freighter's consent. If other goods be taken, either with his consent or without his knowledge, the master is accountable to him; while the whole freight is due, whether the ship be filled up or not.²

Where a part only is freighted, the master sufficiently discharges his obligation, if he give the stipulated room either in the place of the ship agreed on, or in a safe and proper place.

The ship may be hired for one or more voyages specifically described, or for a particular time. In the former case, the obligations are all regulated in reference to the particular voyage; in the other, they will be construed according to the more extensive object of the contract. The freighter on time is held tanquam dominus navis to many effects; as in questions of responsibility for furnishings on account of the voyage, or in the course of the ship's employment;³ or in questions of stoppage in transitu.⁴ In affreightment for the voyage, the ship is still in all respects considered as in the possession of the owners.

[A shipowner may either by the charter-party contract to employ the vessel and the services of the master and crew for a time exclusively for the benefit of the charterer, the master remaining the servant of the shipowner and not of the charterer, and the possession of the vessel remaining as the possession of the shipowner and not of the charterer in any case in which their rights come in question; or the shipowner may by the charter-party contract that the charterer shall during its subsistence have the possession of the vessel, and that the master shall during that time be the servant of the charterer. The former is a locatio operis vehendarum mercium—a contract of carriage of goods; the latter either a locatio navis or a locatio navis et operarum magistri et nautarum ad merces vehendas—a lease of the ship or of the ship and services of the master and crew, whereby the charterer takes the vessel into his possession as he would lease a house, and takes the master and crew into his own employment, through whom as his servants he will maintain the possession demised to him. In the latter case the charterer is considered tanquam dominus, or as owner pro hac vice. We have seen how this distinction may affect questions of stoppage in transitu, p. 232, ante, note 1. The question of the right to detain goods for freight, as it stands at common law, independent of special contract, is dependent on this possession of the ship, as giving the possession of the goods, without which, apart from special contract, there can be no lien. So, again, the distinction determines the question as to who it is as the master's principal that is liable to a shipper of goods for non-delivery of them; and again, it may enter materially into the question as to who it is that is liable for supplies of necessaries to the ship, although that is a question which turns rather on the credit on which they were made, than directly on the possession of the vessel. The importance of the distinction is not less than the difficulty of determining to which class the charter-party belongs is frequently found to be. There is no general rule except this, that the whole clauses of the instrument must be construed together, and effect given to every clause; and the effect and operation of the whole on the state of possession is to be deduced as a question of the fair meaning and intention of the parties. The mere technical phrases which by inveterate usage are introduced into almost every charter-party, often without any idea on the part of either shipmaster or merchant what the venerable clauses mean, go for little, if there are other clauses the result of which is to qualify and restrain them. Thus, words of 'demise' will not pass the possession, though in Hutton v Brag, 7 Taunt. 14, it was once held that they did so, notwithstanding such clauses co-existing alongside of the demising words; but that case is not now law. (Dean v Hogg, 10 Bingh. 345; Christie v Lewis, 2 Brod. and Bingh. 410.) Each case depends on its own specialties. See the English cases in MacLachlan, Shipping, pp. 307-315; and Abbot, pp. 240-263, 11th ed.; and see Parsons' Maritime Law, vol. i. pp. 232-236, where there is a valuable collection of American cases on the point.]

[540] By this contract, the owners or their representative let to freight to the merchant; and he on his part hires and takes to freight the ship by name and description, during a definite time, or for a specified voyage or voyages, for which the merchant binds himself to pay freight, either a particular sum, or so much per month, or so much per ton, etc. This being the essence of the charter-party, the obligations of the respective parties are raised by construction of law as the naturalia of the contract, unless in so far as altered by special stipulation.

I. The OWNERS and MASTER are bound in fulfilment of their contract to the following particulars:—

1. That the ship shall be seaworthy, or in all respects fit for the stipulated purpose; the hull sound; the tackle and outfit sufficient; the master and seamen able, and skilful, and adequate.¹ 2. That the ship shall be at the loading port, and clear for taking in the stipulated cargo, on the appointed day; and shall lie in readiness to load, during a reasonable time; after which the master may sail; or, if he stay, he may claim a consideration for loss of time. 3. That the ship shall sail at the appointed day, wind and weather serving. 4. That in taking the goods on board, in stowing them, and during the voyage, the master and crew shall take due care of the goods, according to the diligence prestable in the contract of location.² 5. That the ship shall be navigated according to the rules of good seamanship, and by the most direct, or at least the usual, course for the destined port. And, 6. That on arrival at the port of destination, the master shall deliver the goods, according to the bill of lading or address, in the same good condition as when put on board.

II. The obligations of the MERCHANT or FREIGHTER are: 1. That he shall furnish a sufficient cargo.³ 2. That the goods shall be sent within a reasonable time, otherwise the master may depart. 3. That, provided the voyage is completed, and the goods delivered, the stipulated freight shall be paid either at delivery of the goods, or at a stipulated time; or that a bill shall be accepted for the amount. Many nice and difficult questions may arise, depending on the construction of the contract, whether in various circumstances freight may be demanded pro ratâ itineris. 4. That if the ship be detained beyond a certain period, the owners shall be entitled to an indemnification for loss of time.

III. There may be many modifications of these terms, engagements, and risks; and many particular stipulations may be introduced, fixing new points of agreement between the parties, and giving rise to special claims. For example, although the parties may have arranged generally the destination, it may often be requisite (particularly in time of war) to reserve a power of directing the course and termination of the voyage, according to circumstances. The merchant may accordingly reserve this power generally, or within certain limits; and under such reservation, the supercargo is held to have the power in absence of the merchant.⁴ How far this power may be exercised by the bill of lading, shall be considered below.⁵ But a mere parole substitution of one port for another stipulated in the charter-party will not be sufficient.⁶

Sometimes, again, instead of leaving the time of loading or unloading to legal construction, a certain number of days is specified; and instead of leaving the indemnification for undue delay as a vague claim of damages, a certain sum, under the name of demurrage, is stipulated. But all these, together with the more minute discussion of the questions arising out of the correlative obligations now enumerated, will be considered under the claims on the bankruptcy of the several parties.¹

II.—OF SHIPS ON GENERAL FREIGHT.

The contract for the conveyance of merchandise in a general ship is made between [541] the shipowners, or the master acting for them, and the several owners of the goods to be carried. It is the pure contract locatio operis mercium vehendarum. It is left to legal construction, being seldom reduced into a written contract further than as it may be said to consist, first, Of the advertisement of the ship for freight; and, secondly, Of the bill of lading.

1. The ADVERTISEMENT proceeds expressly or tacitly from the owners or shipshusband.² The master in a foreign port has their full authority, while in a home port their assent is presumed to a public advertisement. The advertisement, therefore, is a part of the contract. Where it is conceived in general terms, the law supplies all the parts of the contract which the bill of lading does not express. Where the advertisement contains any special conditions, they are held as undertakings warranted on the part of the owners.³ Some doubt was entertained on the import of an advertisement bearing the expression 'to sail with convoy;' whether it amounted to a warranty, or expressed only an intention which, if accidentally frustrated, gave no relief. But it has been held in England, under three judges eminent for their knowledge in mercantile jurisprudence, that such an advertisement does infer a warranty.⁴

The owners of a general ship, advertised as bound for a particular port, must give to every person who may ship goods on board specific notice of any alteration in the destination; and they will be liable for all the consequences of neglecting this.⁵

2. The BILL OF LADING expresses more directly, and in the way of contract, the principal points of the owner's and master's contract. But it is chiefly confined to the description of the goods acknowledged to be received, the port of delivery, and the risks to be run, with the rate of freight to be paid by the shipper.

In a general ship a merchant may by contract engage freight to a certain extent, and the agreement may be effectually established by parole evidence. It may, however, be observed: 1. That as the master has full power to contract for and take in goods where the ship is on general freight, no agreement with the owners engaging freight will be effectual to secure to a merchant room in the vessel; unless it is intimated to the master, or to those acting for him on board, before he has taken goods on board, or engaged freight for the whole of the vessel.⁶ And, 2. That although a merchant is entitled, on the advertisement of

² Rinquest v Ditchel, 3 Esp. 64; Abbot, 11th ed. 278. Lord Kenyon held owners bound to sail with convoy, though there was no proof of the owner having authorized the advertisement.

⁴ Rinquest v Ditchel, supra, before Lord Kenyon. In Snell v Maryatt, 1808, in granting a new trial, the attention of counsel was directed to the import of such an expression, but it was never tried. In Saunderson v Busher, 4 Camp. 54, note, Lord Chief Justice Gibbs held such an expression to import an undertaking to sail with convoy; and Lord Ellenborough concurred in this dictum. Magalhaem v Busher, 4 Camp. 54.

⁶ [This is evidently contrary to legal principle, and it is, so far as we have been able to ascertain by inquiry, also contrary to mercantile practice. A merchant who engages freight-room from the owners never thinks it necessary to intimate to the master.]

the ship for general freight, to insist that goods which he brings alongside, and which are [542] not unfit to be taken, shall be received by the master, provided the ship is not filled up; yet if the master has engaged, or if the owners have made a contract, which has been intimated to the master, for the unoccupied room in the vessel, the merchant who comes on chance must yield the preference.¹

III.—BILLS OF LADING.

A BILL OF LADING is the written evidence of the undertaking to carry by sea, and deliver the goods therein described, for a certain freight.

Bills of lading are made use of both in combination with a charter-party, and for an engagement of freight in a general ship. But the bill of lading is commonly the sole evidence of the contract in the latter case, while in the former it is only collateral, its chief use being to fix the goods on the master, in fulfilment of that part of the charter-party. The form and effect of bills of lading have already been referred to in considering the question of delivery.² It is here necessary to consider the subject more at large.

Bills of lading are generally preceded by a simple receipt, acknowledging on the part of the master, or of the mate, or other person on board acting for him, that the goods have been received. This fixes the goods on the ship, and both master and owners would be liable to all the usual obligations or naturalia of the contract on this document alone. But the bill of lading is more ample, and serves important uses in the transference of the goods. The master must be careful not to give a bill of lading until the receipt is returned to him or cancelled; for he may thus place himself under a double responsibility—to the shipper on the receipt, and to a holder of the bill of lading purchasing on the faith of it.³ Care also must be taken not to deliver a bill of lading, even without a receipt, to any one but the shipper, without his orders, for he may in the same way incur a double responsibility.⁴

A bill of lading is called by French authors Connoissement; by Italian, Polizza di Carico; and by the Latin authorities of the Continent, Apocha Oneratoria. The form used in Britain is uniform, and generally printed with spaces left for introducing the names and descriptions of the ship, captain, goods, and voyage.⁵ Special stipulations may, however, be introduced.

[543] Bills of lading of goods to be exported are invalid, if not on a stamp.⁶ The right to the goods may, indeed, be otherwise established; but wherever the bill of lading is requisite to support the right of the claimant, the want of a stamp will be fatal.⁷

¹ Thomson v Clark, 15 June 1809. Thomson, trusting to the advertisement of a general ship, together with the assurance of the master that he would take goods if in time, brought alongside a quantity of goods, which were refused by the master, on the ground of his room being occupied by goods expected, and for which freight was engaged. Thomson, thinking he had a right to insist that his goods should be taken, took the violent proceeding of arresting the ship and the master, with goods worth £70,000. The water-bailie of Clyde, under the direction of Mr. Reddie, the learned assessor of that court, held that Thomson was not entitled to have his goods taken on board, as he had not established any special contract to that effect. And the Court of Session affirmed the judgment.

⁷ Davis v Reynolds, 1 Starkie 115. In this case 19 mats

The parts of this instrument to which it is important to attend are these:—

1. After the name of the ship and master, the VOYAGE is described. Where the charter-party leaves the direction of the voyage to the merchant, the signing of bills of lading to a particular port precludes a subsequent change by the merchant; unless he shall give up those bills of lading, or indemnify the master and owners against claims by the holders of the bills.¹ On the other hand, in such a case the taking of bills of lading specifying a certain port will not irreversibly fix the destination or conclude the election, provided indemnity be offered. The master cannot in this case be heard to say that he has insured to the port mentioned in the bill of lading; for under such a charter-party he ought to have insured to port or ports within the limits. Where a port mentioned in the enumeration of ports in the charter-party is omitted in the bill of lading, it fully relieves the master from going to that port; but where the foreign correspondent has desired him to go thither, his going has been held justifiable as in a question with the freighter.²

2. The Goods are described by their external characters and marks, varied according to the nature and condition of the commodity and the degree of knowledge which the master has of it, and for which he agrees to be accountable.

3. The obligation to DELIVER may be either general, and left in blank, or filled up to a particular person as consignee, or to the consignor and his assignees. It may also be limited to a special purpose, but this latter form is seldom practised.³

4. The exception of RISKS for which the owners and master are not to be responsible⁴ has been of late years enlarged from the simple exception 'of the dangers of the seas,' to an exception 'of the act of God, the king's enemies, fire, and all and every danger and accident of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of what nature and kind soever, excepted;' but from this, in particular cases, where cargoes are brought in boats from the shore, is saved, 'the risk of boats, so far as ships are liable thereto.'⁵

5. The master may insist on the condition of the PAYMENT OF FREIGHT being performed before he delivers the goods, or he may, at his discretion, dispense with that condition.⁶

There are commonly three bills of lading made out (but that is regulated by the occasion): one for the buyer or consignee to go by post; another to go with the cargo; and a third for the seller or consignor,—each bill containing a clause that, one being performed, the rest shall be void. Each is a contract in itself as to the holder of it, but the whole make only one contract as to the master and owners.

Under this instrument several questions may arise.

1. Condition of the Goods.—The shipmaster is as a trustee, having possession of [544] and a special property in the goods, for the purpose of carriage and delivery to the person who shall have right to demand performance of his engagement. The bill of lading is his acknowledgment for the goods, as received in good order and well-conditioned, accompanied of flax were sent from the north of England to London, and landed on Reynolds' wharf there. The buyer of the flax from the consignee tendered a bill of lading in support of his demand of the goods. It was rejected for want of a stamp. Then the plea was that there was no evidence of a transfer. Lord Ellenborough said: The right of possession follows the right of property. When the goods arrived at the wharf they were delivered to the wharfinger, as bailee, for the benefit of the person entitled. At that time the consignees were entitled, for they had paid for the goods, and had thereby acquired a right of property which they were competent to assign.

² Shepherd v De Bernales, 13 East 565. Here ships were freighted to go to Tangiers, St. Lucar, or Cadiz; and in the bill of lading Cadiz was omitted. The consignee at Tangiers ordered the master to deliver at Cadiz, and he did so. The freighter was held to have no defence against payment of freight on the ground of the master having gone to Cadiz.

³ See below, p. 595 (5).

⁴ [As to exceptions relating to loss from leakage and the like, see Moes, Moliere, & Tromp v Leith & Amsterdam Shipping Co., 1867, 5 Macph. 988. Such clauses do not exempt the owners from liability for negligence of the crew. Phillips v Clark, 2 C. B. N. S. 156; Grill v General Iron Screw Collier Co., 1 L. R. C. P. 600, aff. 3 L. R. C. P. 476.]

by his obligation to deliver them in equally good order, under condition of the payment of freight. In general, the master is not liable for anything but the external packages, and the fidelity of those on board in not invading the property within, unless the bill of lading shall contain a particular description of the goods and of their condition.¹ By the French marine ordinance² it was necessary to specify in the bill of lading the quality, quantity, and marks of the goods. But this means only the exterior and apparent quality; for it seldom can happen that the goods should be so exposed to the master's examination as to enable him to undertake for any specific condition of those goods. 'It is held,' says Valin, 'that the bill of lading affords evidence only of the genuine exterior and apparent quality of the goods; as, when it bears the goods to be indigo, hemp, sugar, linen, cotton, the master is responsible for goods of that sort, and for the same number of bales or casks, and with the same marks with those described in the bill of lading. But as to the specific internal or concealed quality—as whether the indigo is the true or bastard species, the linens of a particular quality, etc.—the bill of lading imports no obligation in this respect, unless proof be made of the bales, etc., having been exposed and examined.'

The master sometimes adds, for security against responsibility, 'the quality or contents unknown.' This ought to be added where there is any difficulty or uncertainty about them; and the claim will in such a case be limited to the delivery of the casks, bales, etc., as identified by their marks, in the same condition in which they were put on board.³ In England, a bill of lading, though very particularly expressed, is not, in a question on a policy of insurance, taken as evidence of the property alleged to have been lost; and at all events, the addition of the clause, 'contents unknown,' has been held to render the bill of lading useless as proof of the contents.⁴

Where the master examines and expresses in his bill of lading the special condition of the goods, this will be evidence against himself and the owners; and it would seem that it will be good evidence also against third parties, as against underwriters.⁵

2. Competition of Holders of Bills.—When the several parts of the bill of lading are found to have been endorsed to different persons, a competition may arise for the goods. Generally in such a case the shipmaster gives up the goods to him who offers the best

See also Targa, Ponderazioni, Della Polizza di Carico, c. 30 and 31, p. 68.

⁴ Haddow v Parry, in 1810, 3 Taunt. 303. In an action on a policy of insurance, 'on specie or bullion, by any one of His Majesty's ships, at and from Jamaica to England,' a bill of lading was offered in evidence, signed by Lieutenant Lawrence of the Rook. It was a bill of lading for 12,000 dollars, 12th August 1808; and under were inserted the marks of the chests, and of their numbers and contents, being described as containing 2000 dollars each. The Rook was taken by a superior force after a gallant resistance, in which Lieutenant Lawrence and four-fifths of his crew were killed. At the trial, before Sir James Mansfield, the bill of lading alone being tendered in evidence of the contents of the chests, he directed a nonsuit for insufficient evidence. On a motion for a new trial, Sir Allan Chambre observed that the bill was signed with the words, 'Contents unknown;' and the Court declared that these words rendered the bill of lading no declaration of what the chests of dollars contained. And so the rule was discharged.

[A master, by signing bills of lading for goods in bulk described by weight, does not bind the owner for a greater quantity of goods than he actually receives. Grant v Norway, 10 C. B. 665; Hubbersty v Ward, 8 Ex. 330, 22 L. J. Ex. 113. The rule has since been applied to cases where the bill of lading is signed by the shipper's agent, in place of the master, according to a usage which has sprung up in the Mediterranean steam packet trade. Jessel v Bath, 2 L. R. Ex. 267; Maclean & Hope v Munck, 1867, 5 Macph. 893.]

indemnity against future challenge. A still safer course is to lodge the goods in a warehouse, and to call the competitors to a judicial determination of their contest in a multiple-poining, in which the master may obtain a warrant for payment of his freight, or [545] for the sale of as much of the cargo as will satisfy it.

In exercise of the master's discretion, or in deciding the matter judicially, the rule of law is, that the property passes by the bill first endorsed.

In England this rule appears to be adopted, on the principle that where equity is equal between the parties, the legal right must have effect.¹

But it may be observed, that if any one claims on the part of the consignor of the goods, to the effect of stopping in transitu, the master is bound to prefer him, provided the first endorsed bill has not got into the hands of a third party without notice.

The cargo may also be demanded by the vendee, or consignee, or by one having right from him, where it has arrived before the bill of lading; and delivery on such demand will be good against all the world, except subsequent endorsees of the bill of lading for a valuable consideration.²

3. Bills signed to different Persons.—Where the master has signed different bills of lading, there seems to be room for a distinction:—

First, Where the shipper or consignor has shipped the goods without orders, he has authority to cancel a first bill of lading, and take another to a different person;³ and in such a case, there can be no doubt of the right under the second bill of lading to demand delivery of the goods. But he who first acquires an onerous title will carry the property.⁴

Secondly, Where goods are sent in execution of an order, or in the way of sale, the seller, after he has put the goods on board under a bill of lading to the buyer, cannot make the master alter that bill. He has no right to vary the consignment, except on the insolvency of the buyer or consignee; and the master will still be answerable under the first bill, and will be held to have altered the bill of lading at his own risk, unless he take an indemnity.⁵

³ Where goods are shipped without orders, says Lord Stowell, such a right exists. The seller, if he may be so described, retains an absolute power over the goods, for there is no purchase. But where orders have been received and executed, and delivery has been made to the master of the ship, and bills of lading signed, the seller is functus officio, except in the particular case where he is again reinstated by the privileges of the vendeur primitif. The Constantia, 6 Rob. Rep. 327. [Abbot, 11th ed. 300.]

⁴ Caldwell v Ball, 1 Term. Rep. 205. Here Ball, the master, signed a bill of lading to deliver to Messrs. Thomson & Fairbrother, or their assigns. This was endorsed by Thomson in the West Indies, and sent to Fairbrother with a letter, saying that he 'had been obliged to assign the other bills of lading to Cappel & Co. for security of bills drawn in their favour,' and that bill was endorsed to Caldwell, who thereupon advanced money for Thomson's use. The other bills of lading were subsequent. The master signed them for different parts of the cargo (making up the whole), to deliver to the order of the shipper or his assigns. These Thomson endorsed to Thomson & Fairbrother, provided they should engage to pay the net proceeds to Frome & Co., otherwise to the order of James Frome, nephew, on account of Cappel & Goldwin. These last bills were delivered to Cappel & Goldwin, as mentioned in the letter to Fairbrother, and were afterwards received by Frome & Co.; so these were first acquired by a third party, though the other bill was first granted on the day the first bill was endorsed to Thomson & Fairweather. On the master's arrival, Caldwell demanded the goods under the first bill of lading, offering freight, etc. Frome claimed the goods unless the net proceeds were paid to him. The jury gave verdict for Ball, i.e. they held him justified in delivering to Frome & Co.; and the Court refused a new trial, on the ground that the equities being equal, the first title was with Frome & Co.

⁵ Emerigon gives three cases illustrative of this doctrine in the French jurisprudence. The first is of six bales of silk consigned to the bearer of the bills of lading, and those bills sent to one person, while a different bill of lading was afterwards transmitted to another house, and where the inferior court of

[546] Thirdly, The effect of the endorsement of a bill of lading is to vest the endorsee, where he is a holder for value and bona fide, with authority to receive the goods beyond recall or countermand.¹ But where no value is given for the endorsement, it does not pass the property.² And so there may be stoppage in transitu on bankruptcy; or if it be made a condition that the buyer shall accept bills in course, although the bill of lading has been sent to him the goods may be re-landed, the condition not being performed.³

4. Bills of lading are negotiable by the custom of merchants.⁴ If the bill of lading be originally blank, or if it be endorsed blank or to the bearer, the shipper or other holder [547] may fill up the name of a person to whom the goods shall be delivered. Or the bill still remaining blank, the holder, provided he has not come by the bill accidentally or fraudulently, has the legal right. The master is bound to deliver to the holder, and he will Marseilles divided the goods between them, but the court of appeal preferred the holder of the first bills of lading. The second is of a quantity of sugar under bills of lading to Rey, but which the shipper having first tried to get altered, attempted to defeat by endorsing his own bill of lading to another: Rey was preferred. And the third related to bales of wool in somewhat similar circumstances. 1 Emerigon 317.

In Admiralty, under Lord Stowell, a case was decided on the same principles. A hundred hogsheads of brandy were shipped on order and for account and risk of Kye. Afterwards the shipper and the master went before a magistrate; and on the back of the retained bill of lading it was recited that the master had received the goods for Kye, but that the interest of the shipper requires that they should not be so delivered, and the master is prohibited from delivering them to Kye, but is ordered to deliver them to Ryberg. Lord Stowell said of the alteration of the bill of lading: 'I am clearly of opinion that if Mr. Kye had been an insolvent person, it would have amounted to a complete and effective revindication of the goods. But if the person to whom they are consigned is not insolvent, if from misinformation or former excess of caution the vendor has exercised this privilege prematurely, he has assumed a right that did not belong to him; and the consignee will be entitled to the delivery of the goods, with an indemnification for the expenses that may have been incurred. In the law of England, as far as I can collect it, and in all the books into which I have looked, it is not an unlimited power that is vested in the consignor to vary the consignment at his pleasure in all cases whatever. It is a privilege allowed to the seller for the particular purpose of protecting him against the insolvency of the consignee.' After quoting the cases from Emerigon already taken notice of (supra, note), he adds: 'These cases I consider to be a clear exposition of the law, that persons having accepted orders and made the consignment have not a right to vary that consignment except in the sole case of insolvency. The alteration may be made provisionally without actual insolvency; but if the insolvency does not take place, the act which was done is a mere nullity, and the seller has exercised a power to which the law does not ascribe any legal effect.' The goods were afterwards adjudged to Mr. Kye on a proof of the facts. The Constantia, Henrickson, 6 Rob. Adm. Rep. 321-330.

¹ See supra, p. 230 et seq., and the cases of Lickbarrow v Mason, etc.

Haille v Smith, 1 Bos. and Pull. 564. Here bills of lading were endorsed in security of money to be advanced by a banker. The advance was made by the person endorsing the bills of lading drawing bills on the banker, and the banker was held entitled to recover in trover for the goods.

Cumming v Brown, 1 Camp. Rep. 104. In this case there was a sale to Main, the consignee endorsing to him the bills of lading, which he endorsed over to Cumming, his creditor, for a previous debt, and also for money advanced, both amounting to the value of the goods. Cumming was held to have right to the goods against the consignor.

Virtue v Jewell, 1814, 4 Camp. 31. Here the fact of notice of the insolvency of the consignee would have entitled the consignor to stop notwithstanding the endorsement, had it not been for the value which at the time of consignment the consignor had received from the consignee. [Abbot, 11th ed. 420.]

² See the case of Coxe v Harden, 4 East 211, Abbot 428.

The opinions delivered to the above effect in that case ruled the determination in Waring v Coxe, 1 Camp. Rep. 369, where goods having been sold by Everard to Baggot & Co., one bill of lading was forwarded, by means of which Baggot & Co. got possession of the goods on their arrival; but after notice that the goods were to be delivered, not to Baggot & Co., but to Waring, Everard sent another bill of lading to Waring, in consequence of which he (being in fact agent for Everard to stop the goods in transitu, on account of Baggot & Co.'s insolvency) demanded the goods from the people on board. Lord Ellenborough held: 1. That Waring, as endorsee without value, had no right to the property; and, 2. That the right to stop in transitu is personal, and cannot thus be transferred.

[The right of the endorsee will accordingly be protected if he have given value to his immediate endorser, without notice of fraud or insolvency on the part of the latter. The Argentina, 1 L. R. Adm. and Ecc. 370.]

⁴ [The right of action on bills of lading is, by 18 and 19 Vict. c. 111, sec. 1, given to 'every endorsee to whom the property of the goods therein mentioned shall pass.' And in a question of title, the possession of the bill is prima facie evidence of property in the goods. 3 L. R. C. P. 190.]

exclude other assignees or creditors. It is settled that there is no distinction to be taken between a bill of lading endorsed in blank and an endorsement to a particular person.¹

5. Where the bill of lading is endorsed under a special condition, the right to the contents is charged with the condition.²

6. The ordinary condition, 'he or they paying freight,' makes the payment of freight a burden on the consignee's right; and if the consignee refuse to pay, the master has a lien; as to which, see below (Of Liens).³ But although the goods have been delivered without insisting for freight at the time, the master has a personal action against the consignee; and if he cannot recover from him, against the shippers; the clause being introduced for benefit of the master only. It is the custom to apply for payment of freight a certain time after the goods are delivered, it being understood that the delay is not a discharge of the consignee, but an indulgence; and the taking of delivery is as a new personal contract to pay freight.⁴

The person to whom the receipt for goods put on board is given, and who holds it, has the proper right to the bill of lading; and the master is not entitled to give the bill of lading, except to the person who can give the receipt in exchange. See above, p. 482.

Bills of lading for goods to be exported were, by 48 Geo. III. c. 149, subject to a stamp-duty; and it was held that goods carried from one part of Great Britain to another were not exported in the sense of the Act.⁵ But by the last Stamp Act, a stamp also is necessary for goods carried coastwise.⁶

SUBSECTION II.—CLAIMS ON CONTRACTS OF AFFREIGHTMENT UNDER CHARTER-PARTIES AND BILLS OF LADING.

As the obligations are reciprocal, claims may arise out of the contract of affreightment (whether under a special charter-party or in a general ship) against the estate of the owners or master, or against the estate of the merchant.

I. CLAIMS ON THE BANKRUPTCY OF THE SHIPOWNERS.

Setting apart those questions which depend on rights of preference or security, of which hereafter, and looking only to the effects of the personal contract, it may be convenient to follow as nearly as possible the course of the voyage.

[Where a bill of lading is blank in the name of the consignee, it is presumed that the consignor, especially if he be an unpaid vendor, intends to reserve to himself the property in the goods, and that the property shall pass by endorsement of the bill. And therefore, until the bill of lading has been endorsed and accepted by the endorsee, the consignor is entitled to vary the destination of the goods at his pleasure. (Sm. Merc. Law, 7th ed. p. 304, citing Wait v Baker, 2 Exch. 1; Ellershaw v Magniac, 6 Exch. 570, note; Scothorn v South Staffordshire Railway Co., 8 Exch. 341.) And even if the bill of lading is completed, the power of transferring the property in the goods remains to the shipper as long as the goods are in the hands of any agent of his. Mitchell v Ede, 11 Ad. and E. 888; Ellershaw v Magniac, supra.]

² Barrow v Coles, 3 Camp. 92. Here a bill of lading was endorsed deliverable to Vos, if he should accept and pay a draft annexed; if not, to the holder of the draft. Vos endorsed the bill of lading to Coles, but did not pay the draft. Lord Ellenborough at Nisi Prius held that the special endorsement on the bill of lading was sufficient to prevent Coles from acquiring the bill of lading from Vos for an onerous consideration, without satisfying himself that the condition was complied with. Verdict for the holder of the draft. [Abbot, 11th ed. 437.]

³ Walley v Montgomery, in 1803, 3 East 590. [But to discharge the owner's claim against the original consignee, he must have accepted the endorsement containing the condition. Where a bill of lading was endorsed to wharfingers in these words, 'Deliver to W. and K., or order, looking to them for all freight, dead freight, and demurrage, without recourse to us,' and the owners accepted the endorsement, they were held not entitled to sue the consignee for freight.' In this case it was admitted that the bill was not endorsed with the intention of passing the property in the goods. Lewis v M'Kee, 2 L. R. Ex. 37.]

1. In relation to the Loading.

As to the goods taken on board, the usual stipulation in the charter-party is, 'with all [548] convenient speed to receive on board, load, and stow, in a regular and proper manner, all such goods and merchandise as shall or may be sent by the said freighters alongside the said ship or vessel, not exceeding what the said ship can conveniently or safely carry over sea, besides her provisions, tackle, apparel, and appurtenances, the master's cabin and the usual and necessary room for the ship's crew excepted.' This, however, is only a special setting forth of what is implied in the contract of affreightment, and what, in its due proportion and relation, is implied in the engagement of freight in a general ship.

1. The owners and the master are chargeable with those goods (or the value of them, or damages for the loss of them), which are fixed on them by the ship receipt or bill of lading. The bill of lading, as already said, contains evidence of the existence, quantity, and external and apparent quality of the goods, considered in relation to the duties of the master;¹ the master and owners being responsible for the preservation and delivery of the articles received, the casks, bales, etc., as identified by their marks, in the same condition in which they were put on board.

2. The goods must be taken on board with due care and skill: Tackling must be supplied sufficient to guard against injury: The ship itself must be capable of receiving the sort of cargo for which she is engaged; must not be endangered by taking on board contraband goods; and must not be overloaded, but room left for her own furniture, and the provisions of the crew, and the proper working of the vessel.² A failure in any of these points may ground a claim against the estate of the owners and master. Thus, if a cask be accidentally staved in letting it down into the hold of the ship, a claim will lie for the loss;³ or if a ship is freighted to go to America for timber, and, owing to the small size of her port-holes, she cannot take in the large timber of that country, a claim of damage will arise to the merchant, on the warranty that there shall be no obstruction to the loading.⁴

3. The custom of the port regulates the responsibility in taking goods on board, where the ship is at a distance from the warehouse. In receiving goods on the quay, or in sending his own boats for them, the master is responsible for them from the moment of delivery.⁵ If in the timber trade it is the custom to float down the timber in rafts by the merchant's servants, the responsibility of the ship will begin only with delivery into the ship; if the master send his crew to float down the timber, the risk will be reversed.

4. The goods must be properly stowed, otherwise a claim may arise against the estate of the owners, as represented by the master. By most of the marine ordinances this is specially provided for,⁶ and rests securely on the general principle of the contract. By special statute in Scotland, 1467, c. 4, provision is made against improper stowage, 'under pain of tinsel of the freight, and amending of the skaith of the merchands.' And it is in particular provided, that no goods shall be carried upon deck; that such goods shall pay [549] no freight; and that if they be ('casten') thrown overboard, the other goods shall not make contribution with them.⁷

In Corban v Down, 5 Espinasse 41, delivery to the mate was held sufficient to charge the owners according to the custom of London.

In reference to what has already been said as to the hiring of an entire ship, the burden is generally expressed in such cases; and from non-compliance with the description, or where the freight is rateable, and the burden is found different from that stated, claims of damage may arise. It would seem, 1. That where the burden is mentioned only in description, and loosely and vaguely, it will not conclude the parties: neither, on the one hand, to restrain the freighter, at a gross sum for the voyage, from loading a full cargo according to the actual capacity of the vessel; nor, on the other, to bind the master to receive as a full cargo what has been so loosely stated.¹ 2. That it will be effectual to confirm the contract, if the parties be careful by proper words to limit it.² The only legal criterion of the tonnage on which, independently of special bargain, is the description in the ship's certificate of registry.³

2. In relation to the Condition of the Ship.

If in the condition of the SHIP there be essential defects, the merchant will have his claim for any loss thence arising. The ship must be seaworthy, by which is meant, that in all respects it shall be able for the voyage; that there must be a skilful master and able seamen; that the ship itself must be fit, in hull and in tackle, to encounter the perils of the sea; that it must be furnished with the proper papers; and that in rivers, ports, and narrow seas, the aid of a pilot must be taken. What, as a warranty, is implied in every policy of insurance, is either expressed in the contract of affreightment, or by the law implied as a part of the contract, viz. 'That the ship shall be tight, staunch, and strong, properly manned, and provided with all necessary stores, and in all respects fit for the intended voyage.'⁴ If any vice in these respects shall have either the effect of defeating the voyage, or of injuriously delaying it, or of injuring the cargo, the freighters will have their defence against the claim for freight, or action for damages.

It is of some importance to mark the distinction between a warranty and a covenant. In a policy of insurance, seaworthiness is properly a warranty; in affreightment it is a part of the contract of the shipowners. Want of seaworthiness in the former case voids the contract; in the latter, it gives relief from the hire, or grounds a claim of damage. The distinction rests on the difference between a hypothetical engagement and a mutual contract. In the former, the engagement itself depends on a certain event taking place, and there is no latitude, no equity: the only question is, whether the event has happened? In the mutual contract a more liberal construction is admitted: the question is, whether [550] the reciprocal engagement has substantially been performed?⁵ Ignorance of the defect will not avail the owners; nor will the most regular and formal survey at setting out on the voyage have any other effect than to strengthen the evidence in their favour, should the vessel be wrecked in questionable circumstances. The controversy between Valin and Pothier⁶ on this point may be considered as settled in this country in favour of Valin's Balfour, a law, of date 15th February 1507, is quoted to a similar effect. Sea Laws, c. 123; Balfour's Practics 620.

¹ Hunter v Fry, 1819, 2 Barn. and Ald. 421. By charter-party a ship was described as 'the ship Humber, of the burden of 261 tons or thereabouts,' and the freighter covenanted to load a full and complete cargo. The burden truly was 400 tons instead of 261. It was held that the loading of goods equal in number of tons to the tonnage described in the charter-party was not sufficient fulfilment of the covenant, but that the freighter was bound to put on board as much as the ship was capable of carrying with safety. And a verdict was given and approved of, for the difference between the sum actually paid for freight, and that which would have been payable if the skipper had loaded a full and complete cargo.

² [Abbot, 11th ed. 201.]

⁶ Even where there is a survey at the commencement of the opinion. In England, it is held that the want of seaworthiness implies a personal neglect, or at least that it is a breach of the contract; and this derives aid from the great principle of policy which regulates the responsibility of carriers by sea and land.¹ In Scotland, the doctrine has long been settled as an absolute rule, whether the defects were known at sailing, or secret and unsuspected, 'that the hazard of leakage, and such ordinary hazards as occur, not by stress of weather or any such extrinsic accident, but only from the ship and her furniture, lie not upon the merchant, nor are relevant to free the skipper, who must have his ship sufficient, at his peril.'²

1. SHIP, RIGGING, AND TACKLE.—The ship, and rigging, and tackle, must be sufficient for the safety of the adventure, and performance of the voyage. Thus, a ship which has been lengthened, and the new part not built with knees, has been held unfit for a foreign [551] voyage.³ A French ship, originally built without knees, according to their system of naval architecture, would not probably on that account alone be held insufficient.⁴ So the want of ground tackling, sufficient for the ordinary perils of the sea, is a defect in seaworthiness.⁵ voyage, Valin holds the claim of the merchant for loss to be unaffected by it, provided it appear that the vessel was not seaworthy at her departure. 'Dès que par événement il seroit vérifié que par des vices cachés il n'étoit plus navigable; c'est à dire, s'il étoit constaté qu'il avoit des membres pourris lassés ou tellement gâtés qu'il fut réellement hors d'état de résister aux accidens ordinaires des coups de vent et des coups de mer inevitables en toute navigation.' 1 Valin 620.

Pothier combats this opinion, contending for the more equitable conclusion, that absolute ignorance of the secret defect may well deprive the owners of freight, but ought not to subject them for damages. Charte-Partie, No. 30, vol. i. p. 319.

¹ Lyon v Mells, 5 East 428. Lord Ellenborough, in delivering judgment, said: 'The declaration avers a breach' (of the terms of the contract implied by law), 'that the lighter was not tight and capable of carrying the yarn safely; and the facts stated support the breach so alleged, by showing that the vessel was leaky, and had nearly sunk in the dock before the yarn could be unloaded from the lighter into the sloop. This we consider as personal neglect of the owner, or more properly as a non-performance on his part of what he had undertaken to do, viz. to provide a fit vessel for the purpose.'

See Abbot, ubi supra.

² Lawrie v Angus, 1677, M. 10107. Here Lawrie had a box of silk-ware on board of Angus' ship, which in the course of the voyage was 'wet by the leakage or spouting of the pump.' He brought his action for damages, and succeeded. The pleas in defence were: 1. The ship and pump were sufficient at the embarking of the goods, and that a split or rift was broken in the pump upon the voyage, which no man could foresee. 2. That the box was securely stowed till Lawrie, who was himself on board during the voyage, insisted on changing it, and placing it near the pump. The merchant answered, that in this contract of freight the shipmaster undertook all hazards, except what occurs by stress of weather, or by accident of the sea, as breaking on a rock, or by piracy. A proof was ordered of these facts: '1. In what condition the pump was at loosing, and if it had a stillage of timber about the pump, and if it was the ordinary custom to cover such stillages with pitched canvas, and if this was so covered? 2. How it came in the voyage to spout, and if there were any stress of weather or accident at sea? 3. If the merchant chose to set his ware by the pump, and if the hazard was signified to him?' On considering the proof, the Court 'found that the merchant chose not to set his goods by the pump; that the seamen could perceive no fault in the pump when they loosed, but that there broke up a rift or split in the voyage, and that the weather was fair all the time of the voyage, without any stress or accident.' The parties were then ordered 'to debate that point, whether the hazard of leakage, and such ordinary hazards as occur not by stress of weather, but only from the ship and her furniture, lie upon the merchant, or the skipper and his owners?' And 'having heard them at length thereupon,' the Court pronounced judgment in the terms quoted above.

Lamont v Boswell, 1680, M. 10110. The above rule was taken to decide this case, where, after repairing a ship at Dantzic, a leak sprung while the ship was in the roadstead, by which lint was injured. The skipper was found liable, 'seeing no extraordinary accident was proven either by stress of weather or otherwise.'

³ Watt v Morris, 10 May 1813, 1 Dow 32. This was a case of insurance. The ship had been lengthened from 80 to 113 tons burden; the new parts not being fastened with knees, which were usual and proper for such a ship. She sailed heavily, and was at last lost. In an action on the policy, the defence was on the breach of warrant of seaworthiness. The Court of Session held the insurers liable. The House of Lords reversed the judgment.

⁴ See Parker and others v Potts, in House of Lords, 15 Feb. 1815, 3 Dow 23.

⁵ Wilkie v Geddes, House of Lords, 27 Feb. 1815, 3 Dow 57. Here a ship at anchor in Leith roads drove under a strong breeze. She was riding with her best bower, and on dropping the small bower the cable broke. The master, with the view of entering into harbour, cut the cable, and made for Leith. The ship took the ground near the beacon, and in an action on the policy the defence was grounded on the warranty. The evidence showed the cables of the anchors to be rubbed and injured, and too light and short. The Court of Session did not consider the proof as sufficient, and pronounced judgment against the underwriters. Reversed in the House of Lords, on the ground that the law of the case was clear, and the evidence such as a jury would have held sufficient to show want of seaworthiness.

So, a ship which has not the rigging, sails, etc. necessary to enable her to escape from an enemy, or proceed with due expedition, is not seaworthy.¹

These illustrations are taken from cases of insurance; but they are equally applicable to the present inquiry, with a due regard to the distinction already stated between the contracts.

2. CAPTAIN AND CREW.—The captain and crew must be of sufficient skill and strength for the voyage.² Where, therefore, in a policy of insurance, liberty was given to touch at one port, and the captain from ignorance went into another instead of it, this ignorance was held to be a defect in the sufficiency of the equipment.³

3. PILOT.—The master of a ship, though understood to be competent to the common course of a voyage, cannot be supposed so familiar with the peculiar dangers and difficulties of narrow firths and rivers, and the entry into ports, as to be able to conduct those parts of the voyage in safety.⁴ To supply this skill, bodies of pilots or steersmen have been established in all maritime countries. After due trial or experience of their qualifications, pilots are licensed to offer themselves as guides in difficult navigation; and they are usually, as the counterpart of their privilege, bound to obey the call of a shipmaster to exercise their function. By the earlier marine laws, pilots ignorant of their duty were liable to penalties, the severity of which, while it shocks a modern reader, shows the importance then attached to the skill and fidelity of a pilot.⁵

In England pilots are established at several ports under the appointment of certain [552] incorporations, deriving their rights from ancient charters, or from particular statutes, which have been passed for regulating pilotage. Those statutes were consolidated in two Acts in 1812 and 1813,⁶ and again a new consolidating Act was passed in 1825.⁷ But those Acts extend to Scotland no further than as they may be evidence of maritime usage, and as illustrating some of the rules and principles of this branch of jurisprudence.

In Scotland the matter has hitherto been left to the rules of maritime law, and the usages and regulations of the several ports, firths, and rivers of the kingdom, relative to the appointment of pilots. The Trinity House of Leith seems to be the only institution in Scotland similar to those which are the object of the English Acts above referred to. It was instituted in the fourteenth century, and enjoys many privileges by royal charters (the last of which is dated 29th June 1797); and, in particular, authority to examine and appoint pilots for the Firth of Forth, and for the seas and firths, and along the coasts and islands of the

¹ Wedderburn v Bell, 1807, 1 Camp. 1. The ship in this case was lost in her voyage across the Atlantic, having parted with the convoy. Her main-top-gallant sail and studding sails, useful in light breezes, were rotten and unserviceable, though the sails used in stormy weather were in good condition. The crew was also insufficient. Under Lord Ellenborough's direction, the underwriters had a verdict in an action on the policy of insurance. [Abbot, 11th ed. 302.]

² See the above case of Wedderburn.

³ Tait v Levi, 1811, 14 East 481. This was an action on a policy of insurance, to port or ports in the Mediterranean, not higher up than Tarragona, which was then in possession of our Spanish allies. The captain, from ignorance, went into Barcelona, then in possession of the French (the enemy), instead of Tarragona. A verdict for the underwriters was directed by Lord Ellenborough, and the Court of King's Bench confirmed the nonsuit, on the ground that, there being special care taken to stipulate the means of avoiding a danger that required great discrimination, precise knowledge was requisite in the master. III. c. 104 has a title in the statute book greatly broader than belongs to it: it is an English Act merely.

Northern and German Oceans.¹ This corporation has appointed certain rules and orders for ensuring the good conduct and attendance of pilots; but the employment of those pilots can be enforced only by an authority greater than that of the corporation; and the beneficial exemptions from responsibility which, under the English statutes, shipmasters enjoy on duly placing their ship under the care of a pilot, are left to the disposal of the common law in Scotland, and the rules of discreet and prudent management.²

1. It is a part of the rule which obliges the owners, in respect to the seaworthiness of their ships, to have on board persons able and sufficient to navigate her, that they must have a pilot on board in all places which are said to be a pilot's fairway, where a pilot is by regulation or usage deemed necessary—whether at the commencement of the voyage, in its course, or at its close.³ And where a pilot cannot be had, they must take the aid of persons locally acquainted with the navigation.⁴ On this point questions may occur with underwriters or with freighters; and in both cases the employment of a pilot seems to be an implied part or condition of the contract.

2. In compliance with this condition, it will be sufficient if the master take such pilot as by the regular custom of the port, or the law of the place, is authorized to act in that capacity, provided he be at the time fit to act, and not by intoxication or otherwise manifestly incapable. If a pilot offer himself who is not licensed or qualified by the rules of the port, but whom the master has reason to believe to be a sufficient pilot, it has been doubted whether this be enough to save from responsibility. The question does not seem to have been determined;⁵ but at least it would be requisite for the master to make out an exceedingly strong case in justification of his choosing such a person.

¹ The town of Edinburgh has also a right to appoint pilots for the navigation of the port, harbour, and road of Leith.

² [By the Merchant Shipping Act, 17 and 18 Vict. c. 104, the existing pilotage authorities (including Trinity House, within certain limits) have the exclusive power of determining the qualification to be required from persons applying to be licensed as pilots, of granting licences to act accordingly, and fixing the districts within which they may act. They may also license the master or mate of any ship to act as pilot of that ship, or the other ships of the same owner, within limits to be specified in the certificate to be granted (secs. 333, 368).]

Every qualified pilot, on his appointment, shall receive a licence containing his name, usual place of abode, a description of his person, and a specification of the limits within which he is qualified to act. And the principal officer of customs at the place at or nearest to which he resides, must, upon his request, register his licence; and no pilot can act until his licence is registered; and if he act beyond the limits for which he is qualified, he is an unqualified pilot (sec. 349).

If, while acting as a qualified pilot, he is not provided with his licence, or refuse to produce it to the person by whom he is employed, or to whom he tenders his service; or refuses, or wilfully delays, when not prevented by reasonable cause, to take charge of a ship within his limits, upon a signal for a pilot, or upon being required to do so by the master, etc.; or refuses, on the request of the master, to conduct the ship into any port or place into which he is qualified to conduct her, except on reasonable ground of danger to the ship; or if he quit the ship without the consent of the master, before the service for which he was hired has been performed; or be intoxicated, or do certain other acts specified in the statute, besides incurring a penalty, he is subject to suspension or dismissal (secs. 351, 365).

The employment of pilots is now compulsory in all districts in which it was formerly compulsory; and all exemptions from compulsory pilotage also continue in force (sec. 353). And home-trade passenger ships must employ qualified pilots, unless they have certificated masters or mates (sec. 354).

A qualified pilot may supersede an unqualified pilot; but it shall be lawful for the master to pay to the latter a proportionate sum for his services, and to deduct the same from the charge of the qualified pilot (sec. 360).

An unqualified pilot may, however, take charge of a ship where no qualified pilot has offered to take charge, or made a signal for that purpose; or when a ship is in distress, or is under circumstances making it necessary for the master to avail himself of the best assistance which can be found at the time; or for the purpose of changing the moorings of a ship in port, or taking her into or out of dock, where this can be done without infringing the regulations of the port (sec. 362).]

⁴ Thomson v Bisset, 1826, 4 S. 670, N. E. 677. In this case the ship was in pilot's fairway, at the entrance of a difficult harbour in the Isle of Scarpa, in the Hebrides: there were no licensed or branch pilots to be procured; but the lighthouse-keeper and his assistant, and the fishermen on the coast, were in use to guide vessels. The master was held bound to take that aid.

⁵ See Law v Hollingsworth, 7 Term. Rep. 160.

3. The principle of the rule which requires a pilot, does not seem to apply to [553] the case of a port or river to which the ship belongs, and with the navigation of which the master is familiar.¹

4. In cases where a pilot is necessary, the fact of his merely being on board will avail nothing, if the master control his proceeding, and damage arise. On the other hand, the presence of a pilot on board will not defend the master and owners from responsibility for neglect or wilful obstinacy, to the injury of others: it can only have the effect of supplying the requisite of seaworthiness, and placing the peculiar dangers of the river or port on the same footing with the ordinary dangers of the sea. It seems even doubtful how far the owners can be saved from responsibility for damage arising while under the pilot's care. In England, this is provided for by the statute above mentioned;² but as the Act does not extend to Scotland, we are left to general principles. Perhaps the very groundwork, on the solidity of which the efficacy of this safeguard in navigation depends—namely, the entire superseding of the captain's authority in the conducting of the ship—should, in a question with the freighter, save the owner from responsibility. But at least a different consideration seems admissible in the case of collision or damage done to others not engaged in the adventure. And accordingly we find that in England such responsibility has been contended for in several cases beyond the operation of the Pilotage Act.³

4. BILLS OF HEALTH, LICENCES, AND NECESSARY PAPERS.—Under the stipulation that the ship shall be furnished 'with everything needful and necessary for the voyage,' the master will be bound to provide the vessel with such papers as are necessary for her sailing to the destined port, or to guard against capture or detention. She must have a licence when engaged as a licensed ship, and a bill of health when she sails from a suspected port, or when that is required at the port of destination.⁴ But the necessity of a licence will [554] be limited to the necessity of the actual voyage, not extended to any imaginary necessity to guard against a possible danger.⁵

² By 52 Geo. III. c. 39, sec. 50, it is enacted, That no master or owner shall be answerable for loss or damage, nor prevented from recovering loss and damage upon a contract of insurance, 'for or by reason or means of any neglect, default, incapacity, or incompetency of any pilot taken on board, in pursuance of any of the provisions of the Act.' See also 6 Geo. IV. c. 125, sec. 55. It has been held that the above law does not apply to vessels having on board pilots under any other regulations than those of this particular Act. Attorney-General v Case, 3 Price's Cases 320. So it cannot be held in Scotland, that the damage occasioned by the pilot's negligence, etc., is to fall merely on the pilot. See below, the question of Collision of Ships. [The Protector, 1 Rob. 45, overruling Neptune the Second, 1 Dods. 467.]

So with regard to the Liverpool Pilotage Act (though incorporating this part of the 52 Geo. III.), the Court of Exchequer held that this freedom from responsibility did not exist, on the ground that the Liverpool Act was not compulsory or penal on the captain to take a pilot. Attorney-General v Case, 3 Price 302. freighted for Cagliari in Sardinia with iron. On her arrival at that port, the plague being at Malta, there was a general alarm at Cagliari. The Board of Health refused her admission for want of a bill of health. She then sailed back to Palermo to rejoin convoy, and at length got a certificate from the convoy's captain, which, not being verified by the captain's signature, was not held sufficient at Cagliari. She was delayed for two months. Iron had fallen in value, and the action was for the difference. Evidence was given of a bill of health being always required at Cagliari. On the other hand, the custom-house had for several months not granted such certificates, leaving the application for them to be made to the foreign consuls. Lord Chief Justice Gibbs said: 'The words "needful or necessary for the voyage" oblige the defendant to have every paper required to advance or facilitate the object of the voyage.' 'The ship was excluded because she wanted this document, and the law of Cagliari was well known upon this subject.' 'It is contended that the words apply only to documents required by the laws of this country or the law of nations. But this is not the meaning of the covenant in the charter-party: the words bind the owner to furnish the ship with every document necessary to the performance of the voyage; and as the ship was excluded from Cagliari on account of her not being provided with a bill of health, the defendant is responsible.'

3. In relation to the Conduct of the Voyage.

In the conduct of the VOYAGE the master is bound to be ready at the appointed time; to sail as soon as wind and weather permit; to accomplish his voyage by the shortest and most direct course, consistently with safety and the usual practice; and to navigate the ship with skill and care.

I. COMMENCEMENT OF VOYAGE.—1. If the loading port is at a distance from the place where the ship is, she must be so despatched as to reach that port against the stipulated time. If a day is specified, and the ship do not arrive, the merchant may hire another, the owners being liable, on the common principles of location, for any damage arising out of this necessity, unless they can justify themselves by inevitable accident or obstruction.¹

2. The ship, when ready, must sail without delay; but the master is not only entitled, but bound, to avoid sailing in a dangerous gale,² and a claim for loss will arise from his misconduct if he neglect this precaution. In the older regulations he was bound to take counsel; but with the improvement of navigation this is left entirely to him,³ his owners and himself taking the risk on themselves.

In England there has been much discussion on the nature and effect of such stipulations under the doctrine of conditions precedent and simple covenants. The doctrine is plain and intelligible, and well understood in Scotland. The question is, Whether, according to the true nature of the contract, this stipulation is meant to be an absolute condition, without which the counterpart of the contract is not to be performed? or, Whether the breach of it merely impairs the expected advantage, or exposes the party to loss, which may be the subject of a claim for damages? In a contract of affreightment, although there be an undertaking to sail on a particular day, or with the first convoy, it is not like a warranty in a policy of insurance, the non-performance of which voids the contract; but it is an obligation to be substantially performed, the breach of which may expose the party to a claim of damages, and which admits of an answer by reasonable excuse.⁴

[555] II. CONVOY.—The ship may be bound either by public law or by warranty to sail with convoy.

1. In time of war, when the danger of great losses to this country, or gain to the enemy, is imminent, the Legislature interferes to prohibit the sailing of merchant ships without convoy.⁵ In the former and in the late French war this policy was followed. In time of peace, these hostile precautions are not required; and a very brief statement of the points in detail while the necessity subsisted may be sufficient:—1. The rule was general, that no private merchant vessel should sail on a foreign voyage without convoy. 2. The master to any port or ports in St. Domingo, with a covenant to procure a licence. A licence was obtained, the ship sailing to Cape François and Gonaïve (ports under Christophe, and not in the power of the enemies of Great Britain). The ship was afterwards captured by a British frigate with her return cargo, which the licence was not sufficient to protect, supposing a licence necessary, and she was condemned; but this was reversed, as no licence was necessary to the ports before mentioned. It was held that there was action on the covenant to procure a licence, because that covenant could only apply to a voyage for which a licence was necessary.

with the maist pairt; and gif he does otherwise, and ocht cum to the ship bot gude, the master should pay the skaith gif he has quhairwith.' Sea Laws, c. 37; Balf. Pract. 922.

⁴ See above, p. 594. Davidson v Gwynne, 1810, 12 East 381. Here one point was, Whether the direction to proceed and join the first convoy for Portugal was a condition precedent? Lord Ellenborough, and Grose, Le Blanc, and Bayley, Justices, held it not so, and that in the following cases the doctrine was settled, that unless the non-performance alleged in breach of the contract goes to the whole root and consideration of it, the condition broken is not to be considered precedent, but as a distinct covenant, for the breach of which the party insured may be compensated in damages. was required to use his utmost endeavours to continue with the convoy during the whole voyage, and not to separate without leave of the commander, under heavy penalties. 3. Bonds with sureties to observe these rules were required at clearing out. 4. On breach of these rules, all insurances on ship, cargo, or freight, belonging to the master, or any one directing or privy to such evasion, were made void. 5. The only exception admitted was under licence, in granting which Government had an opportunity of considering the particular case.¹

2. In time of war, the obligation to sail with convoy is generally an express, but, if not, it is an implied part of the contract. If the freighter insure, it is a warranty in the contract with the underwriters. This obligation may be undertaken by bill of lading, stating the ship to be bound to the port of destination with convoy;² or by advertisement, if a general ship;³ or by charter-party, so as even to have the force of a warranty. Under this obligation, although the insurance be vacated (which it would be for breach of the warranty), the merchant will have his indemnification against the master and owners. The general rules are these:—

1. Under a warranty to join convoy, the obligation is to join at the place of rendezvous appointed by Government, and the obligation is held sufficiently fulfilled by joining convoy at the usual place of assembling for convoy. This is part of the law merchant, which makes usage the great interpreter of mercantile contracts. A capture on the intermediate course, therefore, will not ground a claim against the owners for breach of contract, unless there be a special stipulation.⁴ If the convoy have sailed, a ship cannot legally endeavour to overtake it.⁵ If, having sailed with convoy, the ship be driven back, she is not obliged to wait for a new convoy, but may sail on her voyage. Or if she be driven into a port where there is no convoy appointed, she may sail without convoy from that port.⁶

2. The convoy must be the naval force under the command of that person whom Government has appointed.⁷

3. The criterion of sailing with convoy is, generally speaking, the possession of sailing instructions from the commander of the naval force. Without this, the master cannot answer signals; he does not know the place of rendezvous in a storm; he does not put himself under the control or protection of the convoy.⁸ But this rule admits of exceptions, in so far as it will be sufficient, if the master has taken every means in his power to obtain orders, and has been prevented by inevitable accident from having them.⁹

4. The ship must continue with the convoy, in order to fulfil the contract. There are here three points: 1. It will be an excuse for parting, if the ship has been separated by a storm or inevitable accident; 2. It is not enough to depart with convoy (though the words are so conceived), without continuing under protection; and, 3. It is not enough if the convoy is only for part of the voyage.¹⁰ But,

5. Although the convoy does not go the entire length to the place of destination, it will be enough if it be the only convoy which is appointed for vessels destined to that port. The

where the ship arrived in due time at the place of rendezvous, and, finding the convoy gone, put herself under the protection of a man-of-war which had come there to join the squadron. contract must be so modified by construction.¹ But it is not enough that the ship has sailed with the convoy appointed for another voyage, though that convoy is bound on the same course for great part of the way, if the ship be left unprotected during any part of the course which the proper convoy would have covered. It may indeed be said, that unless the loss has happened in the unprotected part of the voyage, there should be no ground for exception. But it is impossible to separate the question on the warranty from the provisions of an Act intended for a great object of public policy.²

6. It is a part of the same rule, that convoy must be always understood in reference to the orders of Government, by which it is to be regulated.³

III. COURSE OF THE VOYAGE.—Damage may arise during the voyage from delay or deviation; from injury received by the goods; or from the entire loss of them by capture, shipwreck, or jetson. But no indemnification can be claimed against the owners in any of those cases, where the delay, or injury, or loss, has been occasioned by perils of the sea or of the enemy. Against damage proceeding from perils of this description, the merchant may protect himself by insurance. Where the loss is of a nature which a policy of insurance will not cover (as not being from perils of sea or enemy), the owners and the master must be responsible. If the ship be driven by force of winds or by hostile chase into a port not included in the stipulated voyage, or if she be disabled by sea-damage or an enemy, not only can the merchant claim no damage from the owners for any injury the goods also may have sustained, but he cannot so claim on account of the deviation and delay occasioned by taking refuge, or which may be requisite to have the ship repaired, if that be practicable. Formerly, the master seems to have been held bound even in such cases to find another ship; but now the law is, that if the ship is capable of being repaired, the master is not bound to send the goods in another, but may detain them till the ship be refitted. Referring to the law, as already stated, relative to the power of sale and disposal on the part of the shipmaster,⁴ either for the purpose of extricating the ship, or as agent for the merchant in preserving his goods, it may be added, that for any undue delay, deviation, or injury, by fault of the master, the claim by the merchant is for damages. This may furnish a plea of retention against the claim for freight, on the actio contraria; but cannot support a defence against payment of freight, as on a broken condition or warranty.⁵

4. *In relation to the Termination of the Voyage.*⁶

[557] TERMINATION OF VOYAGE.—In bringing the voyage to a close, the master must take the assistance of pilots where necessary; secure the vessel safely; and deliver the cargo to the consignee, or holder of the bills of lading; or after the lay-days are over, to a wharfinger, for the benefit of all concerned, otherwise the owners and he are liable for the goods, or for the damage suffered.

1. The cargo or goods are to be delivered safely. If not, the freight may be forfeited, or a right to damages raised. If the object of the voyage fail in this, the very last act of it, the freight will be lost: as, where a ship is obliged to anchor on the outside of a bar, and to land the cargo by boats, the loss of the goods in their way from the ship to the shore will be attended with the same effect as if lost in the middle of the voyage. If damage be suffered in the act of delivery by sea-water, by collision, by bad tackling, or the like, the merchant will have his claim of damages.

Where the bill of lading acknowledges the goods to be received, and engages to deliver them safely, the master is chargeable with them as in good condition. He must by his contract guard himself against responsibility for what is unknown; and if he do not so guard himself, and do not obtain satisfaction as to the condition of the goods, he is held tacitly to undertake for the safety of the goods to the full extent.¹

2. The goods must be delivered according to the number and weight acknowledged in the bill of lading. In the question for what the owners and master are accountable, there is no difficulty where the things consist in number. But where the commodity is in quantity, to be ascertained by measurement, great difficulties arise from the variations in weights and measures, and from the effect of heat, moisture, motion, etc., in diminishing or augmenting the bulk of the substance. In such cases, it must be left to a jury to determine whether there is truly embezzlement, or whether the difference does not proceed from natural causes or variation of measurement. A cargo of grain, for example, generally comes into less compass by the mere agitation of the voyage; and as corn merchants in their dealings generally allow an average to correct the measurement, perhaps it would be thought a fair rule that some proportion should be allowed of diminution, to save from the charge of embezzlement.²

Where foreign weights are mentioned in the bill of lading, the usage of merchants settles the construction of the contract. By that usage the weight expressed in the [558] contract is checked by the king's landing scales, and freight paid according to the net weight ascertained there.³

3. The manner of delivery, and the termination of the responsibility, will in all cases be regulated by the custom of the port. The delivery must be to the consignee or to his wharfinger, or in boats, or on the wharf, according to that custom. But the consignee may on tendering freight demand delivery overboard, without landing the goods on the wharf.⁴ If the custom is to discharge into lighters, the master is to watch and guard the lighters till fully laden,⁵ but not afterwards;⁶ nor will this obligation lie on the master, if it be the usage for the consignee himself to superintend the delivery of the cargo.⁷

The master will acquit himself of his obligation to deliver, if he lodge the goods with another shipmaster, or carrier, or wharfinger, provided he take care that they be so lodged as to make that other chargeable with them.⁸ The master is bound to land and lodge the goods with a wharfinger where there is any difficulty about freight, instead of keeping them on board. In some landing-places (as in the London Docks) the wharfingers provide men to unload the ships, and do not permit labourers provided by the owners to be employed. In such case they are held liable for negligence in the unloading by which damage is occasioned, although they make no direct profit by the employment of those men.¹ The master will also discharge himself and his owners by delivering to one entitled to stop, and who shall regularly stop, the goods in transitu.²

¹ Sprott v Brown, 1803, M. 10114. A large mirror was shipped from London, addressed to Edinburgh, and contained in a case marked 'Glass.' The master gave a receipt for the case, 'which I promise to deliver safe.' The contents of the case had not been examined. On arrival at Leith it was sent on men's shoulders to Edinburgh, and when opened the great plate was found broken to pieces though the frame was unhurt. In an action against the master and owners, the Judge-Admiral 'found, that on receiving a package with the word glass written on it, it was incumbent on the master, if he did not mean to abandon all recourse against the person shipping the goods, to refuse taking the package on board till the shipper did satisfy him that it was actually sound and entire; that, seeing the word glass so written, he was certiorated of the extent of his risk, and had sufficient ground to justify an extra charge on account of that risk; and therefore found it established, presumptione juris et de jure, that the defenders must have had the extra risk in contemplation when they fixed the rate of freight, and decerned against them for the value,' etc. The case was brought under review of the Court of Session by suspension and reduction. But that Court unanimously adhered to the judgment of the Admiral. ² In Stein v Stenhouse, 2 Feb. 1811, 16 Fac. Coll. 174, there were shipped 452 bolls of barley from Newburgh to Leith, but only 447½ bolls were delivered. It appeared from the lists of the shore-dues of Leith that the measurement at the end of the voyage was less in one out of 30, and more in one out of 100. The Court held that the diminution in this case did not raise any presumption of embezzlement.

4. If by the terms of the charter-party a time for completing the delivery is stipulated, the consignee is entitled to insist for the whole of that demurrage.³

5. The delivery is to be made only on payment of freight, and on payment also of the premium, and other petty average expressed in the bill of lading, and of any average contribution for loss in the voyage.⁴ It has been laid down as recognised in practice, that security for average is required before delivery of goods.⁵ But the master is not entitled to retain the goods for arrears of freight due on other goods.⁶

5. Of the Responsibility of Shipowners under the Edict, and of the Limitations of this Responsibility by Statute.

RESPONSIBILITY UNDER THE EDICT.—The responsibility of shipowners and masters under the edict has been reserved for this place,⁷ because it has undergone by special statute some [559] modifications which are not extended to the case of the other persons comprehended within this law.

The rule of the edict is, that the persons comprehended under it being once chargeable with goods, they must answer for their restitution in the same condition, unless the goods have perished or suffered injury by the king's enemies, or inevitable physical accident. The exception in the charter-party and bill of lading includes 'the act of God and the king's enemies; the dangers and accidents of the sea, rivers, and navigation; the restraints and detention of kings, princes, rulers, and republics; and all and every other unavoidable dangers and accidents.' This is only an express enumeration of the inevitable perils which by law would excuse the owners from responsibility. Formerly the exception was expressed in terms more brief, 'the dangers of the sea excepted.' The alteration was made in consequence of a trial the event of which alarmed shipowners; where a vessel which had struck on a sunk mast in the mouth of a river, and so had been forced on a bank which had altered its form by floods in the river, was held to have suffered by a peril too remote to come under the proper description of the act of God.⁸ But it does not appear that the alteration changes much the rule of responsibility which would have been applied under the old form.

1. To the description of a peril of the sea, or according to the new form, 'an act of God, danger, or accident of the sea, rivers, and navigation,' it is essential that it shall be a peril unavoidable. If due skill, vigilance, and care could have avoided or repaired the misfortune, ment, which failed; and next, in the alteration of the bill of lading.

[Special conditions, as that the owners shall not be accountable for leakage or breakage, do not relieve them from liability for gross negligence. Phillips v Clark, 2 C. B. N. S. 156. (See Wilton v Atlantic, etc. Co., 10 C. B. N. S. 453; Moes, Moliere, & Tromp v Leith and Amsterdam Shipping Co., 1867, 5 Macph. 988.) The rule laid down in Phillips v Clark is in conformity with the decisions on special contracts between land-carriers and their employers, as cited 1 Sm. L. Ca. p. 210, and the views expressed in Dom. Proc. on the question, What is a reasonable condition? Peek v North Staffordshire Railway Co., 32 L. J. Q. B. 250, 273.]

the owners will be liable. Thus, it is a peril of the sea if a ship strike a rock, or run on a sandbank, or suffer in accidental collision by force of the winds against another ship, without fault or negligence on the part of those on board.¹ But if the ship have been negligently or unskilfully navigated, so as to be run on a known rock or shallow, without the compulsion of an irresistible gale to occasion the disaster; or if in traversing the course of another vessel the master or steersman has not kept his proper courses, and so has occasioned a collision; or if during the night he has not kept lights where they are required by the usage of navigation, the owners will be responsible for damage to the merchant.²

2. Capture by pirates is a peril of the sea, and so held after taking the opinion and examination of merchants as to the construction by usage of the true perils of the sea.³

The question, What is a peril of the sea? gives rise to the preliminary difficulty, [560] By what tribunal is that to be determined?—by the jury, as a question of fact, or by the judge, as matter of law for the Court? And this difficulty depends on the combination of fact with the legal construction of a written instrument. It is true, in general, that the construction of ambiguous expressions in instruments belongs to the Court; but the meaning of the words, as applied to the practice of trade, must be derived from usage, and merchants must be resorted to for the proof of that usage. And perhaps the rule is most correctly stated by the author of the Treatise on Merchant Ships and Seamen, where he says that 'the cases furnish very strong authority to show, that even if the decision of the question does strictly and properly belong to the judge, yet his decisions will be guided by usage, and the course of practice among merchants, which are matters of evidence and of fact.'⁴

3. But not only the common perils of storms, and their direct consequences, by striking on a rock, stranding, etc., are clearly within the excepted perils. So also are the more remote dangers consequent on such accidents. Thus, the loss of goods plundered by the inhabitants on a ship going on shore, was, in a question of insurance, held as a peril of the sea.⁵

4. The effect of storms and tempests on the ship herself, in straining, springing a leak, shipping great seas, and other such accidents occasioning damage or injury to the cargo, being within the exception, so as to free the master and owners from liability where there is no fault or negligence, it was questioned whether such effects produced by the operation of superior force from the hand of man are under the same rule; as where a vessel is taken in tow by a king's ship, or is forced to bear up to answer a signal, and in the course of her sailing under this external force suffers damage which otherwise would not have happened? It has been held that such a case falls under the exception, as a peril of the sea.⁶ But if

² See Abbot, ubi supra, where this doctrine is well delivered. Roccus gives the rule thus: Magister navis oneratae, pleno velo navigans, si inciderit in vada (vulgariter dicta nelle secche), tenetur de culpa; quod non praeviderit id quod a diligente nauta fuisset praevisum. Verum si ex impetu ventorum et tempestate coactus, et non ex imperitia in vado seu scopulos inciderit navimque fregerit et merces sint amissae vel deteriores factae, tunc non tenetur. Note 55. Again, see, in note 56, his amplification of the rule: Culpa vacat nauta si id agit quod diligens faceret.

Emerigon details a judgment in a case of capture by pirates, where the distinction was correctly drawn. Holding such capture a peril of the sea, the judgment was against the owners, on account of the captain and his whole crew having gone on shore on a deserted island in the Morea to hunt, pirates having taken advantage of this desertion to run away with the ship (vol. i. p. 532).

The case of the Trent and Mersey Navigation v Wood, as commented on by Abbot, p. 329, may also be taken as an illustration; there being a fault in the master, in so far as he did not infer from the appearance of a ship in the river the neighbourhood of an anchor.

⁶ Hagedorn v Whitmore, 1816, 1 Starkie 157. In this case the ship was taken in tow by a British ship of war, and obliged to use an extraordinary press of sail, in consequence of which, and a high sea, she shipped a quantity of water, by which her cargo of linens was damaged. It was an insurance

this compulsion proceed from the fault of the master,¹ or from an order which was unlawful, and not backed by irresistible force, this extraordinary injury will scarcely be brought under the exception.²

5. Detentions and restraint by kings, princes, rulers, etc., are held to apply only to 'actual and operative restraints, not merely such as are expected and contingent, however reasonable and well-grounded the apprehension may be, or however fair and honest the intention of the master.'³ Detention of a British ship by a British man-of-war, proceeding on state necessity, or on mistake, not attributable to the master's fault, is within the exception.⁴

[561] 6. The saving clause adjoined to the exception of the charter-party in West India voyages, where boats are used in loading and unloading (viz. 'saving the risk of boats, so far as ships are liable thereto'), was meant to provide a remedy against the exemption which, under the general words of the exception, might be pleaded in case of loss of goods in boats, and against the carelessness which might thus arise. The judges in England have held, that though the wording of this saving clause is very obscure, it was meant to keep owners, as to responsibility for loss in boats, on the same footing on which, previous to the introduction of the exception, they stood as to losses on board the ship; that is, that they are not liable for dangers of the sea.⁵

7. If a ship depart from the usual or stipulated course, and a loss happen, the master and owners will (under certain qualifications by statute) be responsible. Thus, 1. If, being chartered to sail from Leith to London, the master choose to call at Berwick or any intermediate port, and a storm afterwards arise, in which the goods of the merchant shipped on board are damaged, or obliged to be thrown overboard, the master and owners will be liable for the loss; the owners to the extent of the value of the ship and freight, the master for the whole amount. 2. If, according to the course of the voyage, it is usual or necessary to call at an intermediate port, any loss arising in similar circumstances will be construed as a proper peril of the sea, to be covered only by insurance. But, 3. If the contract of affreightment should be so expressed as to exclude such intermediate ports, though in the usual course of the voyage, the master and owners will be liable, as in the case first stated of the ship having deviated by calling at an intermediate port.⁶

case. Lord Ellenborough held this a peril of the sea. See next note.

² Phelps v Auldjo, 1809, 2 Camp. 350. This case may serve to illustrate the doctrine, though it was an insurance question. A ship in harbour abroad was ordered to examine a strange sail in the offing: the master, without protest or remonstrance, and uncompelled by any force or threat, set sail and found the vessel neutral. Lord Ellenborough held this a deviation unexcused, as, without force, the master had gone probably in hope of a prize. Damage to the cargo in such an expedition would probably not be held to fall under the exception in the charter-party.

³ Atkinson v Ritchie, 10 East 534. Here the master, on a justifiable alarm proceeding from the British consul at St. Petersburg, of an intended embargo in the Russian ports, sailed with half a cargo. He was found responsible in damages to a large amount. The judgment delivered by Lord Ellenborough particularly deserves perusal.

⁶ Stewart v Johnston, 17 Jan. 1810, 13 Fac. Coll. 504. Here the Perth Merchant Shipping Company publicly advertised vessels to sail from Perth and Leith, the only intermediate port mentioned in these advertisements being Newburgh. Stewart shipped 51 bolls of malt at Perth for Leith. The ship delivered part of her cargo at St. Andrews. She was detained there two days, and afterwards was lost between St. Andrews and Leith. The Court of Session, in an action for the value of the malt against the master and owners, held that the shippers were entitled to rely on the public advertisements as their contract of affreightment; and whatever was the custom (into which they were not bound to inquire), to expect that the shortest, safest, and most expeditious course

The claim for damages on account of breach of charter-party is to be determined on a different principle from that which rules the case of insurance. Insurance is a contract of indemnity against loss, not for the securing of gain; and the prime cost is the value to be indemnified. Affreightment is a contract whose object is the attainment of expected gain, by means of the transportation of goods to a particular place, which the shipmaster and owners undertake to perform. The loss by failure in the performance of this contract cannot be indemnified, unless by paying to the merchant the value of the goods as at the port of destination.¹

LIMITATION OF RESPONSIBILITY BY STATUTE.—By several statutes, the responsibility of owners of ships, and in one instance of masters also, has been very materially limited. Those limitations, 1. have been held not to extend to lighters, barges, boats, or vessels of any burden or description, used solely in rivers or inland navigation; but only to those which are used in sea voyages.²

2. Shipowners are freed from any responsibility for loss or damage by fire.³ [562]

3. Owners and part-owners are declared not to be answerable, beyond the value of the ship and freight, for any loss by act or neglect, without their fault or privity; value of the carriage of their own goods, and hire due or to grow due under any contract of carriage, being in this question deemed freight,⁴ and the master and mariners being responsible as at common law.⁵

It is also provided, that if any loss or damage shall happen by more than one separate accident, or on more than one occasion, in the course of a voyage, or in the interval between was to be pursued between the different ports mentioned in the advertisements. The Court therefore refused to allow a proof of the practice followed by the company in performing voyages from Perth to Leith.

² 53 Geo. III. c. 159. This matter came into question in a case from Greenock, relative to a gabbart or lighter used in navigating the Clyde; and when the case went to the House of Lords, this point of exemption of such vessels, which seems to have been taken for granted in Scotland, seemed so important, that the opinion of the twelve judges was required on it. But the pressure of business having prevented the opinions from being given, the Chancellor, taking the aid of Abbot, Chief Justice of the King's Bench, peculiarly conversant with the meaning of this Act of Parliament, delivered the opinion, 'that the Act of the 26 Geo. III. c. 86 relates only to ships and vessels usually occupied in sea voyages, and that it gives no protection in case of small craft, lighters, and boats, and so on, concerned in inland navigation.' Hunter & Co. v M'Gown & Co., 12 June 1819, 1 Bligh 571.

III. c. 86, sec. 1, A.D. 1786: 'That no person, etc., who is owner or owners of any ship or vessel, shall be subject or liable to answer for or make good to any one or more persons, any loss or damage by reason of embezzlement, secreting, or making away with, by the master or mariners, or any of them, of any gold, silver, diamonds, jewels, precious stones, or other goods or merchandise, which shall be shipped, taken in, and put on board any ship or vessel; or for any act, matter, or thing, damage or forfeiture done, occasioned, or incurred by the said master or mariners, or any of them, without the privity or knowledge of such owner or owners, further than the value of the ship or vessel, with all her appurtenances, and the full amount of the freight due or to grow due for and during the voyage wherein such embezzlement, etc., or other malversation of the master or mariners, shall be made or done.'

By 53 Geo. two voyages, any such loss shall be compensated in the same way, and to the same extent, as if no other loss had happened during the same voyage, or in the same interval.¹

4. Owners or masters are freed from responsibility for loss or damage to gold, silver, diamonds, watches, jewels, or precious stones put on board, *unless the true nature, quality, and value shall be entered in the bill of lading, or otherwise declared in writing to the master or owner.*²

[563] 5. By the English Pilotage Acts, no master or owner shall be answerable for loss or damage 'for or by reason or means of any neglect, default, incapacity, or incompetency of any licensed pilot acting in the charge of such ship or vessel, under or in pursuance of any of the provisions of the Act, where and so long as such pilot shall be duly qualified to have the charge of such ship, or where and so long as no duly qualified pilot shall have offered to take charge thereof.'³ This statute does not apply to Scotland, being limited to pilotage on the coasts of England.⁴

In commenting on these Limitation Acts, it may be observed, 1. That the Act of the 53 Geo. III. c. 159, in the case of registered ships, comprises all the accidents and neglects intended to be provided for by the Legislature, and for most, if not all purposes, may now be considered as containing the law on the subject.⁵ 2. That these laws are grounded on reasons of policy recognised by other commercial nations.⁶ 3. That the statutes are generally intended to limit the responsibility of owners, not of masters. There is, indeed, only one of the cases enumerated in which masters are named in the Act, viz. where jewels, money, etc., have been put on board without any disclosure of their nature or value. In such case, on proof of actual embezzlement, a remedy will lie against the master, as proof of privity on the part of the owners will charge them; but otherwise the loss will fall on the merchant.⁷ 4. That as to damage from fire, since the master is not by name comprehended within this exception, it may be questioned whether it was not intended that the rigid policy of the common law should operate on him to the general safety of all concerned; but the stipulation in the modern bill of lading removes his responsibility.⁸ 5. That, where goods are injured by the spilling of corrosive liquids, as aquafortis, though in common language they are said to be burnt, the owners will not be free on the exception of fire out of their responsibility. Such an accident may indeed occasion fire, as lime may and sometimes does, when carried by sea; but where there is no ignition, and damage thereby occasioned, the statute will not be held to apply:⁹ and the matter will be determined on the footing of negligence, on the edict, unless the damage was plainly occasioned by sea-risk. 6. That, generally speaking, this law, which takes away the responsibility for fire, will not be held to derogate from the special regulations of ports and harbours prohibiting fires on board of ships lying there. In a case already quoted, where the 26 Geo. III. was in the courts of Scotland held to apply to ships engaged in river navigation, it not being alleged that the owners were aboard when a fire happened, the owners were held to be freed by the statute; care being specially taken to guard against the supposition that the Act was held to free the captain from responsibility.¹ 7. The owners are not, on the Act 53 Geo. III., [564] held responsible beyond the value of ship and freight, although the loss be occasioned by the misconduct of one of their number, who was also master.² 8. The value of the ship is to be estimated, not as at the commencement of the voyage, but as at the time of the loss; and although there may be some practical difficulty in this, it is a difficulty in matter of evidence, not of law.³ The fishing stores (belonging to the owners) of a ship employed in the usual manner in the Greenland fishery, and which often are as valuable as the ship itself, are valued as part of the ship and her appurtenances;⁴ although in insurances they are usually made the subject of a separate agreement, that being entirely a matter of contract, of which the construction depends in many cases on usage. In reckoning freight, the whole freight of that voyage is to be taken, whether paid in advance or not.⁵ But the value is not the amount of freight contracted for: it is not to exceed the amount that would have been carried had the voyage been completed, subject to diminution by jetson and other losses.⁶ 9. It is declared that the remedy against the master and mariners shall remain entire for embezzlement or fraud, abuse or malversation.⁷ If, therefore, it can be proved against the master that he actually received into his own custody a valuable packet of money or jewels, and if the evidence shall satisfy a jury that he has embezzled them, he will be responsible, although the contents were not disclosed or stated in the bill of lading. And, in the same way, he would be liable for the value of goods so embezzled, if, in the distribution of the value of the ship among those who had suffered loss, the owner of those goods should not receive his full payment. 10. In those cases in which the responsibility of the owners is restricted to the value of the ship and freight, provision is made for the case of several merchants having claims on a ship inadequate to the whole demand. This is to be settled by a proportionate distribution; to effect which, certain proceedings are declared competent in England. 11. In questions of embezzlement which regard either the owners, or master, or mariners, doubts may arise on the bill of lading. Where the bill bears a certain quantity, as of coffee, and less is delivered, it is of itself proof of embezzlement if the difference is considerable. Where the bills bear contents unknown, this will not preclude a proof of actual embezzlement, though it will throw the onus probandi on the merchant. Where goods are to be carried for hire, the proprietor has a right to the utmost

vol. D, p. 385. This was a case on a policy of insurance in the Scottish Court of Admiralty. The question was, Whether under a policy of insurance a loss might be recovered occasioned by the breaking of some baskets of oil of vitriol, as being damage occasioned by fire? Held to be an injury from improper stowage, that it was the effect of the sea, the wind, and waves, on goods improperly stowed which occasioned the breakage of the oil of vitriol, and that this breakage, by erosion or otherwise, occasioned the damage.

The arbitrator, on a reference, submitted by his award this question to the Court: Whether the fault or negligence of one of the owners takes away the protection given to part-owners by the Act? The Court held that it did not; that joint-owners are not like partners, but are exposed to have persons introduced into the ownership of whom they know nothing, and that the Act specially protects each against responsibility, without his own fault or privity.

care; where they are not to be carried for hire, still proper and prudent care must be taken of that which is committed to the master's custody.¹

II.—CLAIMS ON THE BANKRUPTCY OF THE MERCHANT OR SHIPPER.

[565] On the bankruptcy of a merchant who enters into a charter-party, or who ships goods in a general vessel, claims against his estate may be grounded upon any of the obligations incumbent upon him by the contract, express or implied, and of which a short enumeration has already been given. Without entering minutely into all the questions which may be raised in this way, the points, Of Furnishing a cargo, Freight, and Demurrage, are important.

1. Of the Obligation to furnish a Cargo.

This, which forms one of the chief engagements on the part of the merchant, includes two points of obligation, on each of which a claim may arise against him: one relative to the quantity of goods to be furnished as a cargo; the other to the time at which the cargo is to be furnished.

1. The ship may be freighted for a gross or general sum, or at so much per ton; or the engagement may be rateably, at so much per cask or bale. In the two former cases, the freight will be demandable, and the rate is ascertained, whether a cargo is furnished or not: so that the actual loading of a cargo is of importance, chiefly as it affords security by lien for the freight.² But in the latter case the cargo must be furnished in order, strictly speaking, to raise a claim for freight at all, or at least to ascertain its amount. Questions sometimes occur as to the amount of damage to come in place of freight, as where the stipulated cargo was to consist of different commodities at various rates. The rule for such a case seems to be, that an average must be taken.³

If the cargo is not furnished, the master may, after waiting the appointed or a reasonable time, take a protest, and engage for another cargo; and action will be competent to him for the loss suffered by the change.

[See Scott v Gillespie, 1827, 5 S. 624; Jones & Co. v Ross, 1830, 8 S. 495; Gowans v Thomson, 1844, 6 D. 606.

By the statute 17 and 18 Vict. c. 104, sec. 503, it is enacted that no owner of any sea-going ship or share shall be liable to any extent whatever to make good loss or damage that may happen, without his actual fault or privity, by fire of or to any goods, merchandise, or other things taken in or put on board such ship; nor for the robbery, embezzlement, etc., of any gold, silver, diamonds, watches, jewels, or precious stones taken in or put on board the ship, unless the owner or shipper thereof has, at the time of shipping them, inserted in his bill of lading, or otherwise declared in writing to the master or owner of the ship, the true nature and value of the gold, etc. Nor (sec. 388) shall any owner or master be answerable to any person for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of the ship, within any district where the employment of such pilot is compulsory by law. And by sec. 504, no owner shall be answerable in damages to another beyond the value of the ship and freight, where without his actual fault or privity any loss of life or personal injury is caused to any person carried in the ship; or by reason of the improper navigation of the ship, caused to any person carried in any other ship; or for damage or loss caused to goods, merchandise, or other things on board that ship; or by reason of the improper navigation of the ship to any other ship or boat, or to any goods, merchandise, or other things on board any other ship or boat.]

² Where the ship is freighted at so much per ton, it is of importance to have the goods put on board to the full extent, for there is no lien on what is deliverable to the consignee for the dead freight. See below, p. 621.

³ Thomas v Clarke, 1818, 2 Starkie 450. In a charter-party of this sort, a great variety of articles were mentioned to be shipped at Rio Janeiro, as coffee at 12s. per hundredweight, sugar at so much per hogshead, etc. The ship was forced to return without a cargo. Lord Chief Justice Abbot intimated 'that the proper course would be to estimate the freight by means of an average, so as to take neither the greatest possible freight nor the least, and that he should inform the jury that such an average was the proper measure of damages;' and so the verdict went. [Abbot, 11th ed. 212.]

See below, p. 614.

If the ship is not fully loaded, the master may sail with the cargo which he has received, and demand full freight; or he may take in goods from others so as to fill up the vacant room, and instead of trusting to a claim of dead freight, indemnify himself in this way for the deficiency. But there is considerable delicacy necessary to be observed in taking in the goods of others. It may be of importance to the merchant to exclude from the market the goods which might so be taken, and rather to sail with a deficient cargo than to forward them. He is undoubtedly entitled to exercise this privilege, provided he give full security for the freight; and the shipmaster ought to be very careful to give the merchant the fullest opportunity of using this privilege before taking other goods on board.¹ The master may take in other goods in the case of the merchant's insolvency.

Where the freight is rateable according to the cargo, the merchant must furnish a full and complete cargo, unless he has taken care specially in the charter-party to limit the extent of the cargo on which the master is entitled to insist. The parties may settle previously what shall be considered as the cargo to be loaded; and when it is so settled, [566] it will be of no importance in the question whether the ship might have carried more or not. But this will require a precise and specific limitation. It will not be enough to control the general rule, that in describing the ship a certain measurement is mentioned, where either the implied bargain or an express agreement obliges the merchant to find a full and complete cargo: for no given dimensions can be a just measure of the quantity of tons which the vessel may carry; this necessarily varying with the specific gravity of the goods. It has been ruled, that as on the one hand, in a charter-party for a gross sum, the master would not be entitled to refuse to take as much as the vessel could conveniently and safely carry, notwithstanding such descriptive mention of the measurement; so, in a rateable freight, he is entitled to insist on such complete cargo being delivered to him.²

2. The time within which the cargo is to be furnished is generally regulated by special convention. Independently of any such stipulation of lay-days and demurrage, the merchant is bound to bring forward the cargo within a reasonable time; or where the bargain is specific, he must furnish the cargo at the day appointed, otherwise the master is free to take other freight, and to bring his action for damage. This ruled a very strong case, where the merchant was not held entitled to a literal interpretation, but bound to have his cargo ready by the time which, according to the substantial purpose of the contract, the parties must truly have intended.³ It is, however, a justification for not providing a cargo, if the merchant have stipulated the arrival of the ship on a particular day as a condition:

² Hunter v Fry, 1819, 2 Barn. and Alder. 421. Here the charter-party described the master as master of 'the ship Hunter, of 261 tons burden or thereabout.' The voyage was to the West Indies, and the freight at so much per ton. The freighter's agent was to supply a full and complete cargo of 'coffee in bags and casks, with logwood for dunnage, etc., not exceeding in whole what the said ship could reasonably stow and carry over and above her stores,' etc. In loading the ship there was furnished only 28 tons of coffee, 20 tons of logwood, and 288 tons of sugar. She could have carried 240 tons of coffee in bags, 40 tons in casks, and 20 tons of logwood for dunnage; and a sum of £918 was the amount of freight that would have been earned over what was received had the full cargo of coffee been sent. Judgment was given for the above sum; Lord Chief Justice Abbot, and Bayley, Holroyd, and Best, Justices, delivering their opinions that the description was not restrictive, and the contract for a full and complete cargo. [Abbot, 11th ed. 203.]

³ Thomson v Inglis, 1813, 3 Camp. 428. Here the contract was to load a full and complete cargo at Tobago, and to despatch the ship therewith in time to join the convoy that should be appointed to sail for Great Britain on the 1st August. The ship arrived at Tobago 8th July, and was ready to load on 14th. The convoy sailed on 22d July, at which time the ship might have been loaded. A small quantity of goods was then on board, and the merchant offered a full loading if the master would stay a few days. But he would not, and he set sail to join convoy. Lord Ellenborough held, that as the vessel was in time to load for the 22d, when the convoy passed, the charterers were, according to the reasonable construction of the charter-party, bound to supply her before the time when the general West India convoy passed by the station; and that the captain was not bound to wait, though he might afterwards have overtaken the convoy, as he must thereby have increased the risk of capture. A verdict went for the dead freight.

for the presumption is, that he must dispose of his goods in another ship, if that contract be broken; or that, if the ship do not arrive, he will not enter into contracts for providing the goods.¹

See further, of Demurrage, below, p. 622.

2. Of the Obligation to pay Freight.

The principal obligation of the merchant is to pay freight; and this obligation rests either on the charter-party, or on the bill of lading, by which the payment of freight is [567] made a condition of delivery. Lien for freight will be considered afterwards. At present, only the personal obligation is to be taken into view.

FREIGHT is stipulated either, 1. As a gross sum for the whole voyage; or, 2. At so much per ton of the ship's burden; or, 3. Rateably, at so much per ton, or cask, or bale of the goods embarked; or, 4. By time, at so much per month, week, etc. Those agreements have different effects, of which something has already been said in speaking of the furnishing of a cargo.²

PRIMAGE, or HAT-MONEY, and PETTY AVERAGE, are duties which are generally provided by the charter-party or bill of lading to be paid along with the freight. The former is a small payment to the master for his care; the latter has nothing to do with average loss, but merely covers the expense of towing, beaconage, etc. These duties are regulated entirely by usage, and sometimes are converted for a percentage on the freight.

The FREIGHT as agreed on, with these additional duties, or where no special agreement has been made, the usual and accustomed freight, may be demanded before the goods are taken possession of by the consignee: adding, on the one hand, the average contribution which may be due on the goods, either to the owner of other goods or to the ship; and deducting, on the other, what may be due for average contributions from the ship, or the rest of the cargo, to the owner of the goods.³

A remarkable distinction exists between the stipulation of freight by time, and the ordinary case of freight in the gross, or by the measure of the cargo. In the former case, the duration of the voyage is at the risk of the merchant; in the latter, at the risk of the shipowners.

In freights on time, it is material to fix what shall be the inception or commencement of the voyage. If no time be fixed, it is from the day on which the ship breaks ground and begins the voyage.⁴

The month is understood to be a calendar, not a lunar month.⁵

1. Where, after a charter-party has been executed, a bill of lading is granted for the whole or part of the cargo, deliverable to a certain person or assigns, 'he or they paying freight,' can the master deliver the goods to a third party, holder of the bill of lading, without demanding freight at the time, and afterwards claim against the shipper under the charter-party for payment of freight? When this point first occurred in England, Lord Kenyon held the shipper not to be answerable; but the Court of King's Bench was of a different opinion, and a new trial having been granted, a verdict was under Lord Kenyon's direction given against the merchant for the freight.⁶ The doctrine is now, by subsequent cases, completely settled according to that decision.¹ The principle on which the English determinations have proceeded, seems correctly to accord with the true construction of the contract. That principle is, that the clause introduced into the bill of lading relative to the payment of freight is intended solely for the benefit of the shipper. So it had been decided in Scotland previously to the case quoted in the preceding note.² It has also been [568] held, that where the shipmaster has taken from the agent for the owner of the goods a bill on a third person, which is not duly honoured, the freighter is still liable on his charter-party.³ And where the original shipper still retains an interest in the goods, an assignment of the bill of lading will not discharge him of his obligation for freight.⁴

2. It has been doubted whether the person taking delivery under a bill of lading, with a condition that the consignee is to pay freight, becomes liable for payment of the freight as by personal contract. It is settled, 1. That a consignee is, in the general case, liable for the freight, and may be sued for it;⁵ but that one who is merely agent for the consignor does not become personally answerable.⁶ And, 2. That where the consignee sells to another, that other becomes liable for freight on receiving the goods. An opposite opinion was at first entertained both by Lord Kenyon and by Lord Stowell.⁷ But Lord Ellenborough held, in a case tried before him, that the taking of the goods by the purchaser under the bill of lading was a virtual assent by him (as ultimate appointee of the shippers for the purpose of delivery) to take the goods upon the terms of the bill. This opinion was confirmed by the Court of King's Bench,⁸ and is approved of by the present Chief Justice of that Court.⁹ But if it plainly appear that the freighter alone was credited, the endorsees of the bill of lading will not be personally liable for the freight after delivery of the goods;¹⁰ and the endorsee of such a bill of lading, making goods deliverable to order or assigns on payment of freight, although he has paid over the proceeds of the goods to the endorser of the bill of lading before being called on to pay the freight, will still be liable for it.¹¹

³ Marsh v Pedder, 1815, 4 Camp. 257. Gibbs, Chief Justice, held it to be the same as if the freighter himself had paid the freight by a bill which turned out bad. If the bill is not paid, the principal remains liable. Osy here was agent of the freighter, and settled with the plaintiff in that character. Circumstances may vary the effect of taking a bill of exchange either from agent or principal. If the party having the offer of cash, merely for his own accommodation prefers a bill of exchange, upon that he must seek his remedy.

at Alicant stated the goods to be shipped by Montgomery & Co. on the Whim, to be delivered, etc. at London, etc., to the order of Hargraeve & Dalzell, or to their assignees, he or they paying freight. The bill of lading was endorsed to William Peters, and by him to Taylor & Son of London. When the goods were delivered to Taylor & Son, no freight was demanded or paid. The master brought his action against Taylor & Son for the freight, who pleaded that, being purchasers from the original consignees, they were not liable for freight, there being no contract between them and the ship-owners, express or implied. Lord Ellenborough held the action maintainable against them, as the ultimate appointees of the shippers for delivery, and who, having taken the goods under the bill of lading, virtually assented to the terms of the bill. Verdict accordingly, and a rule refused for a new trial.

[By 18 and 19 Vict. c. 111, sec. 1, it is enacted that every consignee of goods named in a bill of lading, to whom the property of the goods therein mentioned shall pass upon or by reason of such consignment or endorsement, shall have transferred to and vested in him all rights of suit, and be subject to the same liabilities in respect of such goods, as if the contract

3. If a consignee take the goods from the shipmaster, without a distinct intimation that he means to refuse payment of freight, he will not be held entitled, however bad the condition of those goods may be, to retain them on account of a claim of damage against the master and owners.¹

[569] IN WHAT CIRCUMSTANCES FREIGHT IS DUE.—It is next important to distinguish the cases in which freight is demandable in whole or in part. The GENERAL RULE is, that freight is due only provided the voyage has been performed, and the goods delivered at the destined port. For the intention is, that the goods should be carried to a particular destination, and the agreement is to carry them thither, unless prevented by the dangers of the sea or other unavoidable accident; while the counterpart is to pay freight only if the goods be delivered at their place of destination.² But to this doctrine there are exceptions, resting on the ground either of an express contract, or on that of an implied contract, or on the equity between the parties, in the circumstances of the case.

In England this matter, as dealt with in courts of common law, rests on the narrow footing of a special contract, express or implied.³ In Admiralty, the decision proceeds not only on contract express or implied, but on the relative equity between the parties.⁴

In Scotland the mingled jurisdiction of law and equity prevents the necessity of having recourse to different principles of judgment in various tribunals. In the Court of Session, as well as in Admiralty (and in both on the same grounds as in the Admiralty of England), the equity between the parties, as well as the contract expressly entered into, or that which may be inferred from their conduct, furnish grounds of exception to the general rule above laid down. And,

1. Where the ship has been lost or disabled during the voyage, but the goods have been saved, and carried on to their destined port, freight is due, the condition or undertaking by the shipmaster being performed. And the master is entitled, with this view, either to retain the goods a reasonable time, till the ship be repaired, or to hire another vessel to complete the voyage.⁵

2. Where the goods have arrived at their destined port, but have suffered injury, it is settled, 1. That freight is due although the goods should have fallen in price, or have become damaged or spoiled by their own inherent vice.⁶ 2. That freight is due by implied contract if the merchant take the goods; and that the freight must in such case be paid without abatement on account of the damage, or of the expense in trying to remove the injury which contained in the bill of lading had been made with himself. But this (sec. 2) is not to affect the right of stoppage in transitu, or claims of freight by or against the original shipper or owner of the goods.]

courts of common law, it could not say that the delivery at a port in England was a specific performance of its terms. But there being no contract which applied to the existing state of facts, the Court found itself under an obligation to discover what was the relative equity between the parties. The Court sits, no more than the courts of common law do, to make contracts between parties. But, as a Court exercising an equitable jurisdiction, it considers itself bound to provide as well as it can for that relation of interests which has unexpectedly taken place under a state of facts out of the contemplation of the contracting parties in the course of the transaction.' 'If a freighted ship,' says Lord Mansfield, 'becomes accidentally disabled on its voyage, without the fault of the master, the master has his option of two things—either to refit it, if that can be done within convenient time, or to hire another ship to carry the goods to the first port of delivery.' Luke v Lyde, 2 Burr. 887.

the goods have suffered, unless the damage has proceeded from the master's fault or [570] the insufficiency of the ship.¹ 3. That the merchant will not be allowed to pick and choose, taking that part of the cargo which is not damaged, and rejecting that which is spoiled.² But it has been much contested, especially among foreign jurists, whether in the case of damage by mere accident the merchant can abandon the cargo for the freight? Valin and Casaregis favour the abandonment.³ Pothier argues against it strenuously.⁴ The principle on which the former place their opinion seems extremely questionable,—that the goods forming the sole object of the contract ought to be the only pledge for the freight, and that from the goods alone payment of it ought to be exacted. This is not true, for the personal contract gives a direct action for performance, and an actio contraria for the hire. It would, besides, make this contract a bargain of risk to the master, without any hope of corresponding advantage, if this doctrine were sanctioned; whereas the true nature of the contract is that of carriage, or locatio operis mercium vehendarum, which, in being available only if the service be duly and fully performed, is already attended with risk enough, inseparable from its nature. This question Lord Chief Justice Abbot leaves doubtful in the law of England, having found no case in which the point has been adjudged; but stating in general, that he understands the right to abandon in such circumstances never to be claimed in English practice.⁵ In Scotland this matter appears to have been regulated on the principles of equity and of the contract of carriage, whereby the owners are liable for all damage arising from negligence, bad stowage, the bad condition of the ship, unskilful navigation; while it never appears to have been held that the merchant could be liberated from freight on account of damage by mere accident or irresistible force, which are cases excepted out of the edict.⁶

3. Where the goods have not arrived at their port of destination, the rules are: 1. That if the ship be disabled by sea-damage or hostile force, and the shipmaster offer to carry the goods forward, but is prevented by the merchant, he will be entitled to his whole freight.⁷ 2. That in those circumstances the shipmaster will be entitled to demand his freight [571]

¹ Lord Mansfield said: 'It is nothing to the master of the ship whether the goods are spoiled or not, provided the freighter takes them. It is enough if the master has carried them, for by doing so he has earned his freight.' Luke v Lyde, 2 Burr. 888. ⁷ In Lutwedge v Gray & Co., 1732, Elchies, Mutual Contract, No. 3, two points occurred:—1. Whether the shippers, refusing the master's offer, and abandoning to underwriters who take the goods under their own charge, are liable for freight in full? and, 2. Whether the merchant taking the goods, without insisting on the shipmaster carrying them forward, is liable pro rata itineris?

VOL. I.

A ship from Glasgow to Maryland, and back to Glasgow, being on freight to Gray & Co. for the homeward cargo, and having also goods belonging to others on general freight, was cast away on the coast of Ireland, and part of the cargo (tobacco) saved. The owners offered to carry forward the goods, and provided a ship for that purpose. Gray & Co. abandoned their tobacco to the insurers, who shipped it to Bristol. The other tobacco on board in the same condition, belonging to the other shippers, they were willing to have forwarded by the ship provided; but the master would not engage to carry it to Glasgow, and they themselves had it transported thither, where part was found utterly spoiled, and was burned. In an action for freight, the Judge-Admiral held the full freight to be due for the goods saved, since the freighter offered to carry them on. The Court of Session altered this judgment, and, holding the contract of affreightment as dissolved by the loss of the ship, although some of the goods were saved, they found: 1. That the freighters, abandoning to the underwriters, did not thereby subject themselves to freight; and, 2. That freight was due pro rata itineris for the cargo carried to Glasgow, though some of it was found unmarketable and burned. The House of Lords reversed this, and 'declared that the merchants were liable for the full freight of such of the goods as were given up to the insurers, and for the freight pro rata itineris of such as were brought to Glasgow, notwithstanding some of the tobacco was found damaged and burned there.' 23 Feb. 1733, 1 Pat. 119.

In the case of Luke v Lyde, Lord Mansfield stated and pro rata itineris, if the goods are received by the merchant.¹ This seems to proceed on the footing of a new agreement.² For, strictly speaking, the original contract is left unperformed, and nothing can be claimed unless either the master shall fulfil his contract, or the owners shall agree to take the goods. This seems to be a proper case for abandonment. If the merchant look for advantage in taking the goods, the risk of the loss, if he take them, is his. If the goods be in a situation whence they cannot be extricated, or at least not without an expense beyond their worth, the loss is total, and the freight not due. The goods are held to be received if they are abandoned to the insurer,³ or where, having been captured, condemned, and sold, the proceeds on a reversal and restitution are taken by the insurer.⁴ 3. If, in the course of the voyage, an obstruction shall arise not attributable to the parties, but the owners of the goods shall, on the whole, derive full advantage, as if the voyage had been completed according to the original design, freight will be due, not on the contract strictly speaking, but on the equity between the parties. So, in the case of American ships bound to France or Holland, even during the subsistence of the extensive blockading system against France, the full freight was held to be due, where the owners of the cargoes made their election to sell the goods in England; and where they did not, it was left to them to settle the freight with the master. 'The Court (says Lord Stowell) considered a voyage from America to this country very nearly the same in effect as a voyage [572] to those contiguous countries to which those vessels were originally destined: in all probability, the markets of this country were not less favourable than in the blockaded ports; and no doubt the sale was executed with every attention to the interests of the owners of the cargo.'⁵ 4. If the voyage be divisible, there are practical distinctions and exceptions relied on the above case, and said that Lord Chancellor Talbot delivered as the reasons of the above judgment in the House of Lords, 'That the whole freight is due upon the goods sent to Bristol, because the master offered a ship to carry the goods to Glasgow, which was the port of delivery. But as the master declined carrying the other goods to Glasgow (the port of their delivery), as to them he ought to be paid only pro rata, viz. as much as was proportionable to his carrying them to Youghal, the place where the accident happened.' 2 Burr. 885, 887.

See the Copenhagen, 1 Rob. Adm. Rep. 289; Christy v Row, 1808, 1 Taunt. 300.

² This further illustrated in the case of Cook v Jennings, 7 Term. Rep. 381; Mulloy v Backer, 5 East 316; and by the observations of Lord Chief Justice Abbot, 370, and the cases which he has cited.

[It would seem that an agreement to accept the goods at an intermediate port, so as to entitle the owners to freight pro rata itineris, may be implied from the merchant's failure to answer a notice sent to him, that the cargo would be sold on his account. Wilson v Bennet, 10 March 1809, 15 Fac. Coll. 251. Here a ship, freighted from Dundee to Bridport with grain, was stranded off Portland Island. The shippers abandoned to the underwriters, who took delivery of the greater part of it, and had it sold. The master did not claim his lien for freight, but an action was afterwards brought against the shippers. The Judge-Admiral decreed for 'such proportion of the stipulated freight as shall correspond to the part of the voyage performed, and the quantity of grain received, in respect that the obligation to pay freight in general only ceases on the total loss of the goods shipped, or on the total abandonment of those goods by the freighter to the master; in respect that although the master did not take advantage of his lien over the cargo, the obligation by the charter-party still remains entire upon the freighter; in respect that the master, where the partial non-fulfilment of the contract does not arise from any fault on his part, is entitled to such proportion of the freight as may correspond to the part of the stipulated voyage which the vessel has performed, and to the quantity of goods delivered, though not at the port of destination; and, finally, in respect that the abandonment of the cargo to the underwriters cannot affect the reciprocal rights of the freighter and master of the vessel.' Affirmed in the Court of Session.

⁴ Baillie v Mondigliani, Marshall 728; Park, p. 90.

to the general rule above laid down. Where the parts are entire, and the words will allow them to be so considered, freight may be due for the part accomplished. Thus, the outward and homeward voyage may be so separated, that freight for the former may be due, although the ship is lost during the latter; but the separation must be distinct.¹ But, 5. Whatever doubts may be entertained of the right to abandon the goods to the shipmaster for freight, where the goods have arrived at their destination damaged, yet if they have been stopped short, and the freighters have no means of completing the voyage, the merchant is entitled to abandon them. So, where goods were wrongfully seized, sent to London, and delivered a considerable time, an offer afterwards to prosecute the voyage, but which was refused, was held to discharge all claim for freight.² Again, where a cargo was seized at Naples by the Government, and so prevented from being delivered to the consignee, the merchant was held not liable for outward freight.³ In all these cases, according to the true construction of the contract, the payment of freight was made to depend on an event which never happened.

4. Where part of the goods have perished, if the stipulated freight be proportional to the quantity of goods, freight will, of course, be due only for what is delivered. But if the freight is stipulated generally for the voyage, there is a difficulty. Lord Chief Justice Abbot seems to think, that where the charter-party does not afford a rule, still the owners of the ship are not to lose the benefit of the voyage; and it would seem, that where the loss is not such as to authorize an abandonment, the proportion must be settled rateably.

5. Freight, or a compensation for it, is also due where the goods have been thrown overboard for the general safety, or sold for the use of the ship. The average contribution comes in place of the goods, and the freight is due under deduction of the average [573] falling on it.⁴

6. Freight is also due wherever the merchant demands his goods before the completion of the voyage, without any fault on the part of the ship. And so the master may refuse to deliver them, unless the whole freight is paid.⁵

7. If the ship have been captured, there is no freight due. If after capture, however, there is a recapture, and the ship proceed afterwards with the cargo to the port of delivery, the right to freight revives; or if an embargo have been imposed, and the voyage have afterwards been resumed and completed, freight is due.⁶

8. Where the freight is for time, and the goods have arrived, but after detention by embargo or by capture, the freight is due in the same way as if the ship had been detained could be exclusively attributed to one of the parties, it would be proper that the loss should fall there; but the fact is, that the calamity is common to both, for both ship and cargo were equally affected by the blockade. The ship could not have entered the interdicted port in ballast, any more than the cargo could in any other vehicle. The loss arises from the common incapacity of the one and of the other. I think, therefore, that what equity would suggest is, that the loss should be divided; and under these circumstances, I shall direct that a moiety of the freight shall be paid.'

¹ In Taylor & Co. v Hog, 1802, M. 10113, the voyage out and home were not specifically distinguished, and it weighed much with the Court, 1. That the outward cargo was of coals, little else than ballast; 2. That the proceeds of it were presumed invested in the homeward cargo, and so lost along with it.

The following case and opinion were produced to the Court:—

'The Court of Session, before they pronounce their judgment, wish to have the opinion of His Majesty's advocate as to the probable decision of such a case in the High Court of Admiralty of England.' Sir John Nichol, King's Advocate, answered: 'I am of opinion that the High Court of Admiralty of England would probably hold that the contract in this case is to be considered as for one entire voyage, which not being completed, and the cargo from Gottenburgh being a total loss, that no part of the freight contracted for is due to the owner of the Agnes.' Action was denied for the freight. 8 May 1802. See Byrne v Pattinson. [Abbot, 11th ed. 410 et seq.]

Contrast with this the English case of Mackrell v Simond, Abbot 333, where the charter-party was held to recognise an outward and a homeward voyage as two distinct voyages.

by contrary winds.¹ So, where a ship is detained by the crowded state of the docks or harbour, the freighter is liable to the owner of the ship for the delay.²

9. The rule already laid down respecting freight (viz. that it is not earned otherwise than by performance of the voyage), rests on the same views of expediency which ensure the vigilance and exertion of mariners, by making their wages depend on success. It is competent to the parties, notwithstanding, to stipulate for payment of the freight either on the loading of the goods or at particular points of the voyage; or to bargain for a sum absolute, to be paid independent of the risks of the voyage. But some difficulty has occurred in settling the lines of distinction. It would seem, 1. That where the sum stipulated is in the nature of proper freight, the right to it must depend on the condition which rules the claim of freight; and so, if that condition is not performed, the money, though paid, may be sought back.³ But where the freight is expressly stipulated to be paid by anticipation, a stipulation of repayment has been required to sustain a claim for having it back on failure of the voyage.⁴ 2. That parties may agree thus to pay by anticipation; but it will require a very precise stipulation to make the payment independent of the arrival of the ship.⁵ 3. That where the agreement is to pay a sum absolute for taking the goods on board, action may be maintained for it independently of the fate of the voyage.⁶ In cases of this sort, where there is ambiguity, it is a question for the jury what the agreement truly is;⁷ which may depend either on the bargain or on the usage.⁸

[574] DEAD FREIGHT.—The merchant who freights an entire ship is liable to pay freight for the goods transported, and a compensation for the loss suffered by the failure to supply a full cargo. What is thus paid for the unoccupied space is not, strictly speaking, freight for which the goods may be retained by the shipmaster against the consignee.⁹ It is called DEAD FREIGHT; but it is an unascertained claim of damages or unliquidated compensation for the loss of freight, recoverable in the absence and place of freight.¹⁰ The claim for dead freight is grounded on the covenant in the charter-party, by which the shipper is bound to supply a full cargo. Where the agreement is for freight at so much per ton, according to the ship's measurement, the claim of dead freight is easily ascertained. Where the cargo is intended to be various, and at different rates, it has sometimes been said that usage regulates the proportions; but it will generally be found that this must be referred to a jury or to an arbitrator, and perhaps in the end resolve into a mere inquiry into average gain on such a voyage.¹¹

The right to freight does not commence till the ship has broken ground, and begun the

¹ Moorsom v Graves, in 1811, before Lord Ellenborough, 2 Camp. 627. Here a ship freighted for £6300 the first eight months, and at the rate of 47s. 6d. per ton per month afterwards, was captured and confiscated, and detained some weeks. Being liberated, she took in a new cargo, which arrived. Held freight due as on a voyage never discontinued. [Abbot, 11th ed. 370.]

The voyage was to Lisbon; the ship lost in the Downs. The action was for a sum to be paid on shipment. Lord Ellenborough held these words only to mean that freight should be paid in London instead of Lisbon, but by no means to dispense with the performance of the voyage. He added, that if the defendants had paid the freight on shipment of the goods, they might have recovered every penny of it back again.

See Lord Chief Justice Gibbs' remark in 5 Taunt. 437.

principle freight was held due notwithstanding loss of the goods by shipwreck, where payment was to be made in cash one month after the sailing of the vessel, the ordinary duration of the voyage being six weeks. Leitch v Wilson, 1868, 7 Macph. 150.]

voyage;¹ and therefore, whatever expense in preparation, loading, etc., may have been incurred, the freighters will not have any claim for freight if the ship be lost or captured before the voyage begins.²

If the voyage be subsequently prohibited by the Government of the country, the contract is dissolved, and the goods must be unloaded without any claim for freight arising from it. But neither will the increased danger from hostilities vacate the contract or alter the freight; nor will a temporary embargo have this effect,³ unless it be an embargo by way of reprisal against the country to which the ship belongs.⁴

In arranging a voyage, the slight hope entertained of a freight homeward sometimes leads to the alternative covenant of a consideration for freight homeward; or the chance of losing the market for the exported cargo suggests a stipulation that the cargo shall be brought back; or it is agreed to give a greater freight on success, and a smaller freight in case of disappointment. Under such covenants as these several questions have arisen. And, 1. It has been questioned whether a master, who had covenanted to carry out a cargo to St. Petersburg for sale, and, after waiting a certain time, to bring it back to England, was entitled to carry it to another likely market? It was held that by so doing he had substantially fulfilled the purpose of the voyage.⁵ 2. In another case, goods were to be taken to St. Petersburg and sold there, and a home cargo brought back, which was to be provided by the merchant. In that event, £4000 of freight was to be paid; but if no cargo [575] could be obtained, then £2700 was to be paid. The master was held not to have departed from his charter-party in carrying the cargo (which was not suffered to be landed at the stipulated port) to a port where he might reasonably expect a market; and where, not having succeeded in getting a cargo, he took on board goods for which there was full room in the ship, so as to earn a freight without injury to the original freighters. The master was allowed to claim the whole stipulated freight of £2700, without deduction of the freight for the goods taken on board.⁶

3. Of Lay-days and Demurrage.

To regulate the time during which the master shall be obliged to remain with his ship for the purpose of procuring a cargo, or of sailing with convoy, or of unloading at the port of delivery, it is commonly stipulated in charter-parties, 1. That a certain number of days, called LAY-DAYS, shall be allowed; or sometimes the customary time for loading

The shipowners claimed in various ways, so as at least to get a part of their expense, but were nonsuited. A rule for a new trial refused, on the ground that there had been no commencement of the voyage, and no advantage gained by the merchant, and therefore neither freight nor recompense due.

⁵ Fuller v Staniforth, 11 East 232. The master carried the cargo to Stockholm (after waiting the stipulated time at St.

Petersburgh), where he sold it, and took in a new freight. He was found entitled to his freight, deducting what he had received for the freight of goods from Stockholm.

⁶ Bell v Fuller, 1810, 2 Taunt. 285. The Court held this to be nothing more than the case of a contract to bring back a certain quantity of goods, in which case there is no reason why the master may not earn what else he can by taking other goods on board for his own benefit. Between this case and the one in the preceding note, this distinction was made by the Court: 'There the lead was the property of Messrs. Fuller; but the lead was not brought back: it was sold at Stockholm; and, for aught that appears, the means which the captain had of obtaining any freight at Stockholm might arise from the use he made of the lead there; and on that account, perhaps, the Court of King's Bench might think that the captain, who had not been authorized or directed to act thus, but had done all this for his own benefit, should not be entitled to that profit. But in this case, on the best consideration, we think that the defenders are not entitled to deduct from the £2700 the profit which the captain made.'

and unloading; and, 2. That a further time shall be allowed, called days of DEMURRAGE, during which the ship may be detained on payment of a daily sum as hire during the delay. Two classes of cases may be distinguished: 1. Where there is a special stipulation for lay-days and demurrage; 2. Where the contract is left general, or the customary time stipulated. And,

I.—1. Where there is a SPECIAL CONTRACT for a certain number of lay-days or demurrage, this is an absolute engagement by the freighter not to detain the ship beyond these periods; and if such detention should take place, the owners of the ship will be entitled to indemnification for the delay, not merely on the express contract, but in the nature and on the principles of a claim of damage.¹ To this demand the freighter will be liable, not only where the delay shall have been occasioned by his fault, but where it shall have arisen from circumstances over which he has no control, provided they are not such as to dissolve the contract. His engagement is absolute, that the thing shall be done within the time: he is 'the adventurer, who chalks out the voyage, and is to furnish at all events the subject out of which freight is to accrue.'² So the delay occasioned by the crowded state of the docks, or the order of warehousing the goods:³ so also a merchant covenanting to furnish [576] a cargo at Gibraltar within a limited time, but prevented from doing so by a prohibition of intercourse on account of an infectious disease, was held answerable in damages to the owner.⁴ In such cases, in short, the rule is, that during the loading or unloading of the ship, the merchant runs all the risk of interruptions from necessary or accidental causes; while the shipowners have the risk of all interruptions from the moment the loading or unloading is completed.⁵ Even the unlawful seizure of goods by revenue officers occasioning delay, or detention by port regulations or custom-house restraints, is no defence against demurrage.⁶

2. If the days of demurrage be limited, and the ship be detained beyond them, the sum settled for demurrage will prima facie be taken as the best measure of compensation of the damage, both in convenience and in justice; leaving 'it open, however, to the shipmaster to show that more damage has been sustained, and to the freighter to show that there has been less, than this allowance would compensate.'⁷ If delay be occasioned by the merchant, by which expense is incurred, he will be liable for that expense.⁸

In December, a monition was taken against the captors, but they did not appear till February, when they consented to restitution. Lord Stowell allowed a simple demurrage, referring it to the registrar and merchants to fix the proportion. 1 Rob. Adm. Rep. 287.

Randall v Lynch, 1809, 2 Camp. 352, 12 East 179. It was agreed that 'forty days should be allowed for unloading, loading, and again unloading the said cargoes,' and that ten working days of demurrage should be allowed, at £5 a day. In this case the great press of business at the docks prevented the unloading of the vessel for thirty-five days after expiration of the stipulated lay and demurrage days. But Lord Ellenborough held that the merchant was liable, and the jury gave compensation for thirty-one days' detention, after the days of demurrage, at the rate of the demurrage settled. In King's Bench a motion to arrest judgment was discharged.

⁵ Barret v Dutton, 4 Camp. 333. The distinction was curiously brought out by the concurrence of two accidents. After a ship was ready to load, the Thames was so frozen over that it was impossible to continue the loading. After the frost the loading was resumed and completed; but the custom-house having been burnt, there was a delay of a fortnight before the clearances could be obtained. It was in evidence that it was the master's business to get the clearances. Thirty lay-days, which were stipulated, expired during the frost. The action was for demurrage from the expiration of the thirty days. Lord Chief Justice Gibbs held the frost no excuse from payment of demurrage; but the burning of the custom-house he held a defence, as it occurred after completing the lading. [Under a proviso, 'Detention by ice and quarantine not to be reckoned as laying-days,' held by the Exchequer Chamber that the exception would apply whenever there was no access to the ship by reason of ice from any one of the storing places from which merchandise was conveyed direct to the ship. Hudson v Ede, 3 L. 3. It is not merely in the case of a ship under special affreightment that the law as to demurrage takes place: it also holds in the case of a general ship.¹ This point is not likely to occur often. But, 1. Where a merchant has engaged freight in a general ship, and unduly delays to bring forward his goods, a claim for demurrage may be grounded either on the general rule of law, as for damage sustained, or on a special stipulation; and, 2. In the delivery of a cargo from a general ship, it may happen that great delay may be occasioned by those whose goods are to be delivered, who are apt sometimes to convert the ship into a sort of warehouse; or there may, on the whole, be delay without fault imputable to any one. And in contemplation of this, demurrage is often stipulated. Under contracts of this nature, it may be doubted on whom the demurrage is to fall. Where a merchant's goods happen to be in the bottom of the hold, and the stipulated lay-days are exhausted before the goods that are above them are delivered, is such merchant, though ready at the first to receive his goods, to pay demurrage? It seems to be settled in England, on the general principle already stated, that the demurrage in such a case falls on the owner of the goods still on board, leaving it to him to seek his redress against those who may have been in fault.² And although much has been said to free the innocent owners of the undermost goods from [577] a claim for demurrage at the instance of a person unable to perform his part of the contract, it has been held a good answer to this, that neither the master, nor the owner of the undermost goods, nor any one else, is in fault, but an accidental loss is to be sustained, which by the connection between the parties is laid on the owner of the goods; and that even on the principles of locatio conductio, the ship being detained while the goods are undelivered, the additional hire is due by the owner of the goods which are on board.

4. If demurrage be stipulated during the time the ship shall wait for convoy, the master is not entitled to claim demurrage for a single day after the convoy is ready to depart; and if stipulated while the ship is waiting for a cargo, demurrage ceases the moment the ship is fully laden, and the necessary clearances have been obtained. In either case, further detention by adverse winds, a frost setting in, or an embargo imposed, will not continue or revive the demurrage.³

5. In settling the lay-days, or the days of demurrage, the contract generally specifies 'working days,' or 'running days.' The former stipulation excludes Sundays and custom-house holidays. Under the latter the days are reckoned like the days in a bill of exchange. Where the expression is general, 'days,' the legal construction is for running days;⁴ but if usage should settle it otherwise, it rules the construction.⁵

II. Where there is NO SPECIAL CONTRACT for lay-days or demurrage; nothing said on the subject; or an agreement that the usual time shall be allowed for loading or unloading;

¹ As an authority for this, the case of Burmester v Hodgson has been quoted. [Abbot, 11th ed. 274.] But I do not distinctly perceive the point as in Mr. Campbell's report, 2 Camp. 488.

This has been held as law in the Scottish Court of Admiralty.

Lannoy v Werry, 2 Brown's Parl. Cases 60, where two ships were freighted, with special directions as to convoy in particular circumstances, and an agreement of £6 per day for the one and £7 for the other while they should 'wait for convoy at Gibraltar.' On 27th September the convoy arrived at Gibraltar, and the ships stayed with the convoy a long time, partly detained by tempestuous weather. The determination in the House of Lords was, That demurrage should not be paid for such portion of the detention as was to be attributed to want of wind, or adverse winds, but for all the rest of the time during which the convoy was not ready or able to sail.

the time during which the ship must remain to load or unload will be regulated by what is customary, or reasonable, or (in circumstances not occasioned by fault of the shipper) necessary, to accomplish those acts. After this the master will be entitled to sail, if no demurrage has been stipulated; or to have his allowance for demurrage, if there is an agreement to that effect; or, if still detained, will be entitled to demand damages.¹ Under this rule, the master will not be entitled to demurrage in this case, as where a special contract for days is made, if the delay be occasioned by the crowded state of the docks;² nor [578] where the customary mode of delivery of the particular article requires more time than in ordinary delivery.³ It will be only where the difference in the requisite time of delivery is to be ascribed to the shipper or consignee that demurrage will be due.⁴

The endorsee of a bill of lading taken to assigns, has no defence against the payment of demurrage on account of having got no notice of the arrival of the ship, it being his duty to watch the arrival.⁵ And the same rule has been applied where the goods were, by the bill of lading, deliverable to a well-known merchant in London.⁶ But where the ship's name is entered so incorrectly at the custom-house, that the consignee cannot after due inquiry discover the arrival, that will be a defence.⁷

If the master be detained forcibly after the expiration of the lay and demurrage days, or if he voluntarily stay on request of the shippers, he will be entitled to damage in the nature of demurrage.⁸

¹ Pary v Yelton, 28 Feb. 1806, Judge Cay's Notes, vol. D, 569. Here Yelton freighted from Pary, part-owner and ships-husband, the ship Duchess of Cumberland, about to proceed to Toningon on a voyage, thence to Memel for timber to Leith, at 33s. 6d. per load, etc. Nothing said of lay-days or demurrage. The voyage was performed, and the ship arrived at Leith. The master, 22d October, wrote to Yelton for instructions, but got no answer; 25th, he protested for six guineas demurrage for every day after expiration of ten days from his arrival. Twenty-one days from arrival passed before the ship was unloaded. Against a demand for demurrage, the chief defence was, that none was stipulated. The Judge-Admiral held 'demurrage due at common law, wherever a ship is unnecessarily detained by the fault of the shipper or consignee, either by not timeously furnishing a cargo, or by not timeously discharging it,—no man being at liberty to convert a lawful contract into an engine of oppression: and that this doctrine was fully recognised in Lawrie v Jameson & Co.' (See below, note 8.) The judge allowed three guineas a day for every working day between the ship's arrival and the time when the defenders began to work on her delivery. And in this judgment the parties acquiesced.

² In Rodgers v Forresters, 1810, 2 Camp. 483, the freighter was 'to be allowed the usual and customary time to unload the said ship or vessel at her port of discharge.' This, in ordinary circumstances, at London, was proved to be seven days; but, for bonded goods, when the ship can get a berth. The ship entered the London Docks 25th August, and on 31st the goods were bonded, and all ready to receive them into the cellar; but the crowded state of the docks delayed the discharge till 26th October. They might have been landed immediately on payment of the duties, but not sooner with the benefit of bonding. Lord Ellenborough held, that since the bonding system was introduced, the landing of goods on immediate payment of the duties had ceased to be the usual and customary mode of unloading a cargo of wines, and so the implied contract had not been broken. Verdict accordingly.

In Burmester v Hodgson, a similar verdict under Mansfield, Ch. J., 1810, 2 Camp. 488, where, if the goods (brandies) were not to be bonded, but the duties paid at once, they might have been much sooner delivered. The universal custom of bonding such goods was held to rule the construction, and to bind the master to wait the turn of the dock.

⁸ Lawrie v Jameson & Co. The ship Bell, Lawrie owner, and Anderson master, was sent by Jameson & Co. of Leith to St. Petersburg for a cargo of tallow contracted for by Atkins & Co. of that city. There was no bargain as to demurrage or lay-days. The instructions by Jameson & Co. addressed the ship to Atkins & Co., and directed the master 'to get clear and sail before 1st September, N. S., as the premiums of insurance advance greatly after that day.' The ship arrived 22d July 1787, and the master applied to Atkins & Co. The tallow, owing to the dryness of the season, did not come down from the interior of the country till October. The master made a protest against the merchants for not loading by the 1st of September, but waited at desire of Atkins & Co., under an opinion that he was bound to do so. The lading was on board and the ship cleared out 28th October, and actually sailed out of Cronstadt. By contrary winds it was forced to return, and was frozen in till 11th May. The master's claims were—1. Freight; 2. Demurrage from 1st September to 11th May; 3. An indemnification to a

A protest ought always to be made; but it cannot be said to be indispensable where the charter-party settles the lay and demurrage days. Even where no days are fixed, [579] a protest appears not to be indispensable, though useful both to interpellate the shipper or his agent, and to fix the time, and adjust those circumstances about which there can at the time be no dispute.¹

SECTION III.

OF THE INDEMNIFICATION OF LOSS OR DAMAGE SUFFERED IN A VOYAGE.

This subject divides itself into four several heads of inquiry:—1. Collision of one ship against another; 2. Sacrifices for the common safety by general average of loss occasioned; 3. Salvage to those who have preserved the ship or cargo; and, 4. Contracts of Insurance.

SUBSECTION I.—OF THE INDEMNIFICATION OF LOSS FROM COLLISION OF SHIPS.

Evidence as to the true cause of the collision of ships is always of difficult access. The accident generally happens in the darkness of night; or is accompanied with a confusion and agitation, and attended by a feeling of irritation or of self-interest, which poisons the sources of evidence. Where the fact is clear that a fault has been committed, the law is settled that the owners of the ship by whose fault the damage arises must suffer the loss which falls on them, and answer for the damage to the other ship. But where it is impossible to say, on the one hand, that there is a fault proved; while, on the other, the loss obviously has arisen from no violence of the elements, but from some error, or neglect, or want of precaution, of which circumstances preclude all hope of evidence,—the case is of difficult decision, and has in various systems of jurisprudence been disposed of, or the determination at least assisted, by very different presumptions and rules.

There are four possibilities under which such an accident may happen: 1. Where there is no blame imputable to either party; 2. Where both are to blame; 3. Where the suffering party only has misconducted himself; and, 4. Where the ship that has done the damage has alone been in fault. These cases, again, seem to be properly reducible to two principles of decision: one, where pure accident leaves the loss where it lights; another, where the loss follows the fault. It is in the application of this last rule, that, in ambiguous circumstances, recourse has been had to the aid of collateral considerations of expediency and of equity.

I. Pure ACCIDENT, or vis major, is plainly to be distinguished from the case of negligence or fault, open or concealed. It proceeds in no degree from the act of man, as to which it never can be certain that there is not some mixture of human passion and self-interest, or some neglect and want of precaution and vigilance. It arises from physical causes alone, from the violence of the winds or seas, the effect of a hurricane, storm, lightning, or other natural calamity: as when a ship, by the violence of a tempest, is driven from her moorings, and, in collision against another vessel, sinks her, or is sunk by the blow.² merchant for whom he had shipped flax, which he was prevented from delivering. It was admitted on all hands, that, after the protest on 1st September, the master might have returned empty, or taken another cargo. But the owner contended, that the shipmaster having waited at the desire of Jameson & Co.'s correspondents, they were answerable for the effects of the delay. The case was first adjudged in the Court of Admiralty of Scotland, and afterwards carried by appeal first to the Court of Session, and then to the House of Lords. The judgments varied. But by one judgment of the

VOL. I.

Court of Session, which was affirmed in the House of Lords, the shipowner was allowed his freight, and a compensation in the nature of demurrage, for the period from 1st September to 29th October, when it was proved that, by mercantile usage, the ship being clear and ready for sea, demurrage ceased. Determined in H. L. 10 Nov. 1796, 6 Brown Parl. Ca. 474, 3 Pat. 493.

¹ Charters, 13 Jan. 1665, M. 12501. The Court held parole evidence sufficient without a protest.

² This is a distinction acknowledged in English law as well

II. Under actual, or possible, or presumed FAULT, may be comprehended cases of actual fault or negligence, in which the proof of the fault gives the manifest and clear rule, that the guilty person shall pay the loss. Cases also may be included under this class where [580] the damage proceeds from the act of man, in circumstances where it is impossible to say to whom blame should attach.

In all the cases which have been mentioned, the first question seems to be, how the decision shall be as between the ships? The next, how matters shall be arranged between the ship and cargo of each vessel?

I. As between the SHIPS.

1. The loss must be indemnified by the ship which is in fault; and the rules by which this is to be judged of, in so far as it depends on the Court, are important to be observed. And, 1. The law imposes upon the vessel having the wind free, the obligation of taking proper measures to get out of the way of a vessel that is close-hauled, and also the obligation of showing that it has done so.¹ And a failure in either point will leave the responsibility on the owners of such vessel. 2. The neglect to furl the sails of a ship in attempting a creek or river in which others are lying; the allowing her to have too much headway to be stopped by the ordinary precautions; the neglect to drop the anchor in due time to stop the vessel's way, and other the like omissions or mistakes, will lay the responsibility on the ship so circumstanced.² 3. If every proper precaution has been taken on the part of the ship which is said to be the assailant vessel, it will next be necessary to inquire, Whether those measures were counteracted and defeated by any improper measures taken by those on board the other ship? In questions of this kind, the assistance of Masters of the Trinity House is generally taken in Admiralty;³ and failing this, and with a jury of unskilful men, it will be necessary to prove the rules of sailing, and the orders that in particular circumstances are fit to be given, that they may be compared with the facts as they appear in evidence.⁴

as in general maritime jurisprudence. Indeed, I believe the expression 'act of God,' as denoting pure accident, has originated in England. See below, Buller v Fisher, p. 629, note 6.

³ See the way in which Lord Stowell disposes of such a case in the Woodrop-Sims, supra, note 1.

⁴ [Connected with this subject is the question whether the party against which a verdict of damages has been found, is entitled to deduct the amount which the injured party has recovered from underwriters. In the law of England, it is settled that he is not entitled to deduct it. The point was reserved in the First Division case of Morison v Bartolomeo, 1869, 5 Macph. 848; but on the pursuer's producing an assignation from the underwriters to their rights as against the defenders, judgment was given for the full amount.

By the Merchant Shipping Act, secs. 296-299, the following rules are laid down as to ships meeting each other:—

Whenever any ship, whether a steam or sailing ship, proceeding in one direction, meets another ship, whether a steam or sailing ship, proceeding in another direction, so that if both ships were to continue their respective courses, they would pass so near as to involve any risk of a collision, the helms of both ships shall be put to port, so as to pass on the port side of each other; and this rule shall be obeyed by all steamships and by all sailing ships, whether on the port or starboard tack, and whether close-hauled or not, unless the circumstances of the case are such as to render a departure from the rule necessary in order to avoid immediate danger, and subject also to the proviso that due regard shall be had to the dangers of navigation; and as regards sailing ships on the starboard tack close-hauled, to the keeping such ships under command (sec. 296). Every steamship, when navigating any narrow channel, shall, whenever it is safe and practicable, keep to that side of the fairway or mid-channel which lies on the starboard side of such steamship (sec. 297). Power is conferred on the Admiralty to make regulations requiring the exhibition of such lights, and the use of such fog-signals by such classes of ships, whether steam or sailing ships, within such places and under such circumstances as they think fit. The Admiralty may from time to time revoke, alter, or vary the same (sec. 295). This power has been exercised. And it is provided that if, in any case of collision, it appears that it was occasioned by the non-observance of any rule for the exhibition of lights or the use of fog-signals, or any of the above rules, the owner of the ship by which such rule has been infringed shall not be entitled to recover any recompense whatever for any damage sustained by such ship in such collision, unless it is shown that the circumstances of

2. Where the loss arises by pure accident, or the act of God, the rule is, that it falls where it lights. This is the rule of all the codes maritime and municipal. It is the proper case of the Roman law, as laid down by Ulpian; which, on occasion of damage by fault or negligence done by one ship to another, gave action for indemnification, but no remedy if the collision was blameless.¹ So also the rule was settled in the earlier codes of maritime law, both of the south and of the north.²

3. It is in the case which lies between these two extremes that the main difficulty is found, for the resolution of which, rules so different have been resorted to. This is the [581] case where both parties are to blame, or where there is neglect or fault which is inscrutable. By the maritime law this is a case of average loss or contribution, in which both ships are to be taken into the reckoning, so as to divide the loss. And although it may be said (according to Cleirac³) that this rule of division is a rustic sort of determination, and such as arbiters and amicable compromisers of disputes commonly follow, where they cannot discover the motives of parties, or where they see faults on both sides, this impeaches neither the justice nor the expediency of the rule. The rule of the Roman law appears to be against the determination of the maritime codes.⁴ But in the immature jurisprudence of Rome, relative to maritime commerce, the more difficult case which was forced on the attention of subsequent navigators does not appear to have occurred. In distinguishing more scrupulously the cases to which the doctrine is applicable, one case is where there is fault on both sides; the other, where there is fault which cannot be fixed on either. As to the former, Lord Stowell, the greatest authority on a question of this nature, and under whose peculiar cognizance such questions fall in England, views the doctrine consistently with the rule of the maritime codes. 'A misfortune of this kind,' he says, 'may arise where both parties are to blame; where there has been a want of diligence or of skill on both sides. In such a case, the rule of law is, that the loss must be apportioned between them, as having been occasioned by the fault of both of them.'⁵ In the other case of inscrutable fault, there seems not to have been any example in England requiring decision; while the only authority on the point in the books of Scottish law is to be found in the book which goes under the name of President Balfour, where, as one of the Sea Laws, the rule of equity, as adopted in the maritime code, is laid down as the law of Scotland.⁶ It seems, therefore, to be a

the case made a departure from the rule necessary (sec. 298). And if any damage to person or property arises from the non-observance by any ship of any of the rules, such damage shall be deemed to have been occasioned by the wilful default of the person in charge of the deck at the time, unless it is shown that a departure from the rule was necessary (sec. 299).]

It was different in some codes, and regarded as a case of average (Ord. of Oleron, art. 14; Wisbuy 26). Lord Chief Justice Abbot, speaking of the rule of these latter authorities, by which injury without fault is to be borne equally by the owners of the two vessels, adds that, 'by the law of England, damage happening in this manner either to ship or cargo by mere misfortune, and without fault in any one, the proprietors of the ship or cargo injured must bear their own loss (Buller v Fisher). I have already mentioned that such a misfortune is considered as a peril of the sea, and in this respect the civil law agrees with the law of England.' Abbot, p. 354.

In general, says Marshall, 'by the marine law, an injury done by collision to a ship or her cargo, where no blame is imputable to the master of either, the loss is to be equally borne by the owners of both. But this rule is not adopted by the law of England.' He also refers to the case of Buller v Fisher, in 1800. Marshall on Insurance, p. 493.

'The Lords find that both ships in this case were in fault, and that the whole damage sustained by the owners of the ship Wells, and of the cargo, which were sunk and lost, should be borne equally by the parties; and find, therefore, that the appellants are liable to the respondents in the sum of £1535, 16s., one-half of the value of the Wells and of her cargo, such half not exceeding the value of the Sprightly and her freight. And the Lords further find, that the appellants are not liable to pay interest on the said sum of £1535, 16s., and that they and the respondents ought to bear and pay their own expenses.' point still open to consideration, both in England and here. In legal arrangement it belongs to the doctrine of Average or Contribution; and the point is, whether it be not consistent with equity and expediency that the contribution or average of such a misfortune, in the case of inscrutable fault, as well as in the case of obvious fault on both sides, shall comprehend both ships, to equalize the loss as if all were embarked on the same bottom. In point of equity, much undoubtedly may be said on both sides; in point of expediency, there appears to be no sufficient protection, without some such rule, for weak and small vessels against stronger and larger ships, the masters and crews of which will undoubtedly be more careless when they know that there is little risk of detection, and none at all of direct damage to their vessel, by which a smaller ship may be run down without injury to the assailant. But under the rule alluded to, the fear of loss will operate as strongly on the masters of large ships as of small, since the damage is to fall proportionally on both; and if thus equal vigilance and tenderness can be secured on the part of large ships against small, as if they were themselves in danger of direct injury, this rule of maritime law is recommended by very strong reasons of expediency.

It is very true that the laws already quoted from the Consolato del Mare may be construed as not entirely consistent with that rule. But while the cases there stated are at [582] least such as arise out of physical accident, all the northern codes of maritime law accord with the doctrine. The laws of Oleron and those of Wisbuy, the code of the Hanse Towns, the Ordonnance de la Marine of Louis XIV., and last of all, the Code de Commerce, all divide the damage according to the same rule which is laid down by Balfour in his Sea Laws, as already quoted.¹ And the principle of the rule is approved of by the most eminent commentators and jurists of the Continent.²

Taking this, then, in these circumstances as a question not yet settled by any judicial determination, and respecting which any decision to be given would probably be ruled by the maritime law, as grounded on strong reasons of expediency, and established by all the authorities quoted, the question of contribution would on that footing include two points: 1. Whether the ships are to contribute equally, or proportionally to their value? The laws of Wisbuy made a rateable contribution.³ The laws of Oleron made it a contribution in equal shares.⁴ So did the Hanseatic code.⁵ And the chief authorities seem to favour this rule. Valin, in arguing this matter, after quoting the various authorities, states not only the law, but the principle, to be in favour of an equal division of the loss, without regard to the value of the ships, as not only shorter and plainer, but as better fitted to operate on the minds of shipmasters, who might otherwise be careless of their course.⁶ It will be observed that the responsibility of shipowners is limited to the value of the ship and freight by the laws already taken notice of, both by the general statute relative to liability for losses arising by perils of the sea, and also by the Pilotage Acts. It will also be observed, however, that the Pilotage Acts do not extend to Scotland. 2. The next question would be, whether the cargo of the ship is to suffer contribution as well as the ships themselves? It

In Holland the rule is followed, 'propter bonum publicum et culpæ probandæ difficultatem' (Neostadii Decis. 49).

Cleirac seems justly to place it on a presumption that both are blameable, and their justifications unsatisfactory (Us et Coutumes de la Mer, pp. 67, 68).

Pothier places the rule on the footing of equity and public expediency, 'that shipmasters may be more careful in taking all possible precautions' (Avaries, No. 165, vol. ii. p. 426).

Emerigon gives also his full approbation to the rule as well founded in principle (vol. i. p. 417, ch. 12, sec. 14, No. 3).

Valin justifies the doctrine on reasons of expediency (vol. ii. pp. 165-169).

ought always to be recollected in this question, that the owners of the cargo cannot possibly be in fault, and that the reason of expediency on which mainly the rule of the maritime code rests cannot therefore apply to them, while no case of proper average can arise where there is not a voluntary sacrifice for the common safety.¹

It is a different question whether a cargo damaged in the collision should be deprived of the benefit of the contribution to be made by the other ship; for this is part of the damage which has been occasioned by the misfortune; and if it were to be considered merely as a peril of the sea, as between the merchant and his own shipowners, he who may perhaps have suffered the most would unjustly be left without a remedy. According [583] to some authorities, the cargo ought in such a case to have the benefit of the contribution.² Valin dissents, and lays it down as law, that the contribution is only between the ships, to the total exclusion of the cargoes from the benefit as well as from the burden.³ The former rule, however, seems to have been adopted by the House of Lords in a case already referred to.⁴

In cases of damage by collision, it is no defence to the owners that the ship in fault is under the direction of a pilot, and that the remedy lies against him. They are liable in the first place, and must seek their remedy against the pilot.⁵

II. As between the SHIP and the CARGO, it can admit of no doubt, that if damage have arisen to the cargo from the fault of the master of the ship in which it is embarked, the merchant will have indemnification against the master and owners, under the limitation of the Acts already referred to.⁶ But if the ship be under the guidance of a pilot at the time, the remedy will be only against him, by the English pilot laws; 6 Geo. iv. c. 125, sec. 55.

If the loss is by accident, it is a peril of the sea, which must fall where it lights, and which is excepted from the obligation in the charter-party.

If the damage should arise in that case of inscrutable fault which we have already treated so much at large, as between the owners of the cargo and the owners of the ship which carries it, the rule appears to be, that it is a mere peril of the sea, and within the exception in the charter-party.⁷

SUBSECTION II.—OF INDEMNIFICATION OF LOSS BY GENERAL AVERAGE; AND OF THE LEX RHODIA DE JACTU.

Among the losses and injuries incident to a sea-voyage, some are of a nature to affect only the subject which directly suffers injury; in others, the loss happening to one subject is relieved by a general contribution on the part of all concerned in the adventure, towards the indemnification of the sufferer. The latter description of injury or loss forms what is properly to be called an average loss, the loss being spread by average allotment over the

On this point much difference is to be found in the codes and authorities in maritime law. The Hanseatic Code excluded the cargo from contribution (Jus Marit. Hans. art. 2 and 4). The laws of Wisbuy and of Oleron included the cargo (Ord. de Wisbuy, art. 26 and 67; Jugem. d'Oleron, art. 4; and Kuricke (p. 803) and Vinnius (in Peck. 264) seem to approve of this). But Cleirac and Valin are against it, and their reasons seem to be good.

saw the Atlas coming, and kept close to the wind in order to give the Atlas an opportunity to pass. This the Atlas mistook, and unable to weather both ships, she and the Patriot ran foul of each other, and the Atlas went down. Lord Kenyon said: 'That if the defendants have been guilty of any degree of negligence, and it can be proved that the accident could have been prevented, they, the owners, would certainly have been liable on the charter-party; but they are exempt by the condition of the charter-party from misfortunes happening during the voyage which human prudence could not guard against, against accidents happening without fault in either party. I am of opinion that neither ship could be deemed to be in fault, and that the misfortune must be taken to be within the exception of the perils of the sea.'

whole. The former is also commonly called average, though strictly speaking it is not entitled to the name, but is merely a partial loss. In using the term average, however, to express these very different sorts of loss, the words general and particular are added. A GENERAL AVERAGE is a loss incurred by sacrificing something for the common benefit, towards which the whole concern is bound to contribute pro rata, because it was undergone for the general preservation of the whole. SIMPLE or PARTICULAR AVERAGE is one of those incorrect expressions which, though in familiar use, and sufficiently understood by persons [584] versant in the matter, are apt to mislead. It means nothing more than the damage incurred by or for one part of the concern, and which that part alone must bear. The loss of an anchor, the starting of a plank, the leaking of a cask, the accidental loss of part of the ship, or of goods washed from the deck, are examples of simple or particular average, or loss incident to the proprietor that suffers. The loss of masts, or rigging, or goods, cut away or thrown overboard, to ease the ship and lessen the common danger, are examples of general average.¹ It is of the latter, or general average loss, that we are now to treat. The doctrine is important, not only in regulating questions between shipowners and merchants whose goods have been put on board, but in questions of insurance of daily occurrence; for insurers are liable to indemnify the insured against those contributions which are properly denominated general average.

ROMAN LAW DE JACTU MERCIUM.—The doctrine of general average takes its origin from the LEX RHODIA DE JACTU, a part of that code of maritime law which has already been mentioned as the most ancient in Europe, and which was adopted by the Romans and all the nations of the Mediterranean. This law, establishing a partnership or rule of contribution for indemnifying sacrifices made for the common safety, has been praised and commented on in every maritime country in Europe, more perhaps than any other part of the marine law. Commentators have expressed their wonder and admiration that a law so perfect in policy and in justice should be found in the most ancient code of marine law, while it is that very character of manifest equity which most naturally recommended it to early adoption. The justice of contributing after the danger is passed, and the ship and cargo saved, to the repairing of the loss of what has been sacrificed in order to obtain that safety, could not fail to suggest itself to the framers of a code of maritime regulations. The reasons in policy have been engrafted afterwards.

The text of the Rhodian law is to be found in the Pandects, as preserved by Paulus: ‘Lege Rhodia cavetur ut, “SI LEVANDÆ NAVIS GRATIA JACTUS MERCIUM FACTUS EST OMNIUM CONTRIBUTIONE SARCIATUR QUOD PRO OMNIBUS DATUM EST.”’²

This law is illustrated and discussed in the Pandects by Paulus, Papinian, and other eminent lawyers. It forms the subject of ample and excellent commentaries in various countries of Europe, of which the most distinguished are those of Peckius and of Vinnius, which forms the third commentary of the book ‘Ad rem Nauticam; the short tract of Weitsen;³ the treatise of the learned and judicious Bynkershoek; the treatise of Schomberg; and the dissertations on this subject which are to be found in the works of Valin, Pothier, and Emerigon. The subject is also treated very ably by the English authors on maritime jurisprudence, Abbot, Park, and Marshall. And there is a recent essay in which a practical view of it has been given with great perspicuity and correctness.⁴ Above all, are to be estimated the lights which have been thrown on this subject by the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty in England, whose decisions on this, as on every subject which has come under his cognizance, are directed at once to the decision of the cause and the improvement of the general system of jurisprudence.

GENERAL AVERAGE OR CONTRIBUTION proceeds on the principles of a partnership by necessity. Where in the danger of shipwreck or capture it is thought by those on board advisable to sacrifice any part of the cargo, or of the ship, the masts, guns, anchors, cables, and so forth, for the general safety, the loss is to be adjusted by a contribution from all [585] who have partaken of the benefit. But instead of labouring to adjust the dangerous limits of a definition, it is better to describe in a detailed and minute commentary: 1. In what circumstances, or for what losses, a contribution may be demanded; 2. What is liable to contribution; and, 3. What is the mode of reckoning, and the principles according to which the contribution is to be laid on those concerned.

1. In what Circumstances, and for what Losses, may Contribution be demanded?

Two things are necessary to ground the right to contribution: 1. That the property shall have been advisedly sacrificed for the common safety; and, 2. That such sacrifice shall have preserved the property of those concerned.¹

1. If unadvisedly, and without due cause, goods have been thrown overboard by a timorous master, he and his owners alone will be liable; and it has been settled as the criterion of a sacrifice sufficient to ground a claim for contribution, that it must have been the result of a consultation among those on board, as grave and deliberate as the urgency of circumstances will fairly admit.² This consultation is to be directed to two points: First, The necessity of lightening the ship; and, secondly, The goods which it is most advisable to sacrifice.³

Casaregis and the other continental writers distinguish two species of jactus; one, regular and orderly, the other tumultuous and precipitate: the former, a measure of necessary precaution against approaching danger; the latter, from the perturbation and alarm of imminent peril: the former admitting of orderly though rapid deliberation; the latter defying all consultation, where every hand with desperate effort is employed in throwing overboard whatever comes within its reach.⁴ These distinctions are perhaps more curious than useful, more the result of the elaborate study of a favourite subject than the result of practical cases and observation. In this country every such case is properly a jury question; and the distinctions of regular and irregular jactus, though founded in nature, and useful in directing the consideration of those who are to deliberate on the case to the important points, are not fit to be set down as matter of law.⁵ The presumption is, that the case falls under the class of irregular jactus, so as to relieve the master from the necessity of having been too curiously observant of regular forms;⁶ but to this presumption it is necessary that,

² [The requirement of a consultation of the crew is scarcely reconcilable with modern practice, which is founded on the absolute responsibility of the master for the safety of the ship and cargo. Accordingly, in the leading English authority, Birkley v Presgrave, 1 East 220, a plea on this ground was expressly overruled. See Lord Kenyon's opinion: 'The rule of consulting the crew upon the expediency of such sacrifices is rather founded in prudence, in order to avoid dispute, than in necessity. It may often happen that the danger is too urgent to admit of any such deliberation.']

⁴ Targa, speaking of this irregular jactus, characterizes it as a state of alarm, where 'ogn' un gettació che li vienne alle mani; che perciò é incapace di regola.'

⁵ Any one who wishes to study this matter will find it fully discussed in the 19th and 42d Disc. of Casaregis, already referred to, and Kuricke, tit. 8, art. 4. Emerigon, in his section entitled 'Observations Générales sur le Jet,' has collected the authorities to be relied on, vol. i. pp. 605–611.

⁶ Casaregis, Disc. 45, No. 31; 1 Emerigon 605. Targa says, that during sixty years, in which he had officiated as a in the first moment of tranquillity, an entry shall be made in the log-book of the circumstances, and a specification of the goods or articles thrown overboard, and that at the first port affidavits shall be made to the fact, to prevent the purloining of goods under the cover [586] of their having been thrown overboard. This is a universal rule.

Questions have been agitated respecting the effect of difference of opinion among those on board. The general rule laid down in all the codes, and by all the authorities, is that the majority shall decide.¹ These provisions have chiefly in contemplation, what seldom happens now, that the merchants are on board. But in every such question the judgment of the master and crew deliberately formed will rule the case; the master's opinion, where he has no adverse interest, being entitled to great weight.

2. The effect of the sacrifice must be to save the ship from the impending danger. Should the ship be wrecked in that storm, and some of the goods be saved; or should she be captured by the enemy who then has her in chase, and some of the goods be restored; those will not be liable to contribution.² But if, after having been preserved from that danger, they encounter another distinct and different, that part of the cargo or the ship which is saved contributes to the first average, according to their value as saved, deducting salvage.³ It does not seem to be laid down, whether the owners of the property so saved are to share the whole average loss with the proprietor of the goods thrown over; or only to bear such proportion as would belong to them had there been no subsequent loss, deducting the contribution of all the rest of the cargo as at the period of safety.

In the detail of particular losses, some questions of great nicety may arise.

1. The proper case is JACTURA, or JETTISON; or the casting overboard of parts of the cargo or of the ship, or guns, stores, etc., to lighten the vessel in a storm or for flight, or to enable her to float when aground. 1. Goods stowed on deck and thrown overboard are not to be relieved by contribution. They are encumbrances to the navigation, which ought not to have been there; and their ejection is to be ascribed rather to the necessity of clearing away this improper embarrassment, than to the consideration of lightening the ship. A claim for indemnity may lie against the master and owners; or the merchant, if he knew that his goods were so stowed, may be held to have run the risk himself; but the loss is not a proper average.⁴ 2. Goods on board without a bill of lading, are not to be averaged if lost.⁵ But this circumstance can only found a presumption that the goods are beyond the proper cargo, and on board without the master's consent: and this presumption may be refuted.⁶ 3. Where goods are either thrown overboard to lighten the ship, so as to float her from a bank on which she has struck, or to get her over a bar in refuge from a storm or capture, or for necessary repair; or if they be placed in lighters or boats, and lost by the sinking of the boats or lighters; these are considered as proper cases of jettison.⁷ But, 4. The lightening of the ship, in order to get over a bar at the port of destination, does not seem magistrate at Genoa, conversant with this subject, he had known only five instances of regular jactus, all of which were suspected of fraud, because the forms had been too well observed.

² Ord. de la Marine, tit. Du Jet, art. 15; 2 Valin 194; 1 Emerigon 616. But if any fair distinction can be made between the chance of recovery which is given to the owners of the goods remaining on board, by the sacrifice, and that which the ejected goods have of being recovered, average seems to be due. Weitsen, de Avariis, No. 20; and Casaregis, Disc. 45, secs. 33, 34, 75. Observe in the former the word postea, and the case which he puts in illustration. So the case put in the Digest, l. 4, sec. 1, is of the ship having

continued afloat, and wrecked in alio loco. So also Erskine should be understood, resting his dictum upon that law (iii. 3. 55). [It is also to be observed that the sacrifice must be made for the general safety. Therefore, where a quantity of dollars were thrown overboard, to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy, it was held not to be a subject of average. Butler v Wildman, 3 B. and Ald. 398.]

to be an average loss, for which contribution is to be made, but is a loss by fault of [587] the master.¹ 5. Where goods are sent on shore in lighters for the mere purpose of debarkation, the loss is not average.² 6. The cutting away of masts, sails, cables, etc., is average, when done for the ship's safety. But it has been observed that, in practice, foreigners are apt to fall into a mistake in conceiving that every loss of mast or sail on a lee-shore is average, and particularly that such injury as afterwards requires them to be cut away entitles the shipowner to contribution; whereas these are partial losses proper to the ship.³ 7. The foreign rule, which holds as average the cutting of a cable, or loss of an anchor, in the necessary despatch of joining convoy, is not sanctioned by our practice.⁴ But similar losses occasioned by the danger of running ashore, or upon rocks, or being run foul of by other ships, or for the purpose of getting clear when run foul of, are average losses. 8. The sacrifice of sails, ropes, and other materials cut up and used at sea for the purpose of stopping a leak, or to rig jury-masts, or supply any other requisites towards the general safety, is average.⁵

2. Not only goods or parts of the ship thrown overboard, or otherwise sacrificed, are average, but also damage occasioned to other goods, or to the ship, in ejecting them: as the cutting of the deck or sides of the ship to facilitate the ejection; or the injury that follows upon the cutting down of the mast by its falling on some other part of the ship, or on goods, and occasioning damage.⁶

3. The expense of going into port, and of the operations or detention there, have given occasion to many questions. Thus, where the ship has sustained injury in a storm or hostile encounter, and goes into port to refit; this may be necessary for the general interest and safety. But it has been much questioned whether any or what part of the loss thus accruing is average. Where the injury has been voluntarily incurred as a sacrifice for the common safety (as cutting down a mast), it seems to be clear that both the expense of the repair itself, and the collateral and necessary expense of unloading and warehousing the cargo for the purpose of making the repairs, with the extra expense of maintenance and wages during the detention, are average.⁷ Where the cause of going into port is damage sustained by a peril of the sea, it was decided in the Roman law that the expense of refitting, and the collateral expenses, were not average.⁸ It was held otherwise in Holland;⁹ [588] and in an early English writer the rule is laid down in the same way.¹⁰ In France the

¹ The rule is laid down generally by Callistratus: Navis onustæ levandæ causa quia intrare flumen vel portum non potuerit cum onere (Dig. lib. 14, c. 2, l. 4); by Peckius and Vinnius, p. 242; by Weitsen, sec. 17; and by Casaregis, Disc. 46, sec. 29. But the point which I have stated seems rather to be omitted than implied in those authorities. The principles on which contribution may justly be denied are: 1. That the master is in fault by taking a cargo which the port will not admit; and, 2. That each merchant whose goods are on board, takes such risk as in the ordinary course of that voyage may fall on him. Pothier draws the distinction plainly, and satisfactorily shows that the lightening of a ship for gaining access to the destined port is not average, but a loss by the fault of the master. 2 Pothier 423; Avaries, sec. 146.

Casaregis, in Disc. 19, relates a case of the mainmast of a ship having been broken in a tempest, so that it was necessary to cut the stays and ropes; and in falling, it carried off the stern and part of the side, by which all the goods there stowed were thrown into the sea, and other damage sustained. If in this case the mast had been cut down, instead of having been broken by the tempest, the consequential loss would have been rightly adjudged average.

⁸ So Julianus answered in a case where a ship, having met with a violent storm, and having her masts and rigging destroyed by lightning, was forced to go into a port to refit. Having put to sea again, and delivered her cargo safely, the question was, Whether the owners of the cargo were bound to contribute to the loss suffered by the shipmaster? Julianus decided that he was not 'respondi non debere.' Hic, enim sumptus instruendæ magis navis quam conservandarum mercium gratia factus est. Dig. lib. 14, tit. 2; ad Leg. Rhod. l. 6. same doctrine prevailed: the loss by delay, the expense of unloading, warehousing, and loading, and the maintenance of the crew, were held average; not the expense of the repairs themselves, unless they were of a more than ordinary cost.¹ In England, of late years, the doctrine of Beawes was questioned,² though it seems to have had the assent of Mr. Justice Buller on one occasion.³ In several recent cases the matter has been much discussed; and the result of those determinations may thus be stated: 1. That where the general safety requires a ship to go into port to refit, by whatever accidental cause occasioned, the necessary expense of going into port, of preparing for the refitting of the ship, by unloading, warehousing, reloading, and even the charges of the crew during the necessary detention, are average. 2. That the costs of the repairs, so far as they accrue solely to the ship itself as a benefit, and are costs which would have been necessary at any rate in that port on account of the ship alone, are not average. 3. That, wherever the expense of repairs is such as would not have been incurred but for the cargo on board (as, for example, such as, though necessary for the ship, might have been made with safety to her in a port where they would have been less costly), the extra expense is average.⁴

[589] 4. But it is not enough that benefit has arisen to the cargo or general interest: it must be a benefit proceeding from an act done with a view to the general interest.⁵

³ Da Costa v Newnham, 2 Term. Rep. 407.

⁴ The doctrine of this paragraph will be proved and illustrated by the following cases:—

1. Jackson v Charnock, 8 Term. Rep. 509. But it will be observed, that here there was a peculiarity in the charter-party, by which the ship was to be kept in repair at the freighter's expense.

2. Power v Whitmore, 1815, 4 Maul. and Sel. 141. Here the ship encountered a storm off the Isle of Wight, which damaged her bowsprit. This, with the appearance of stormy weather, induced the master and crew to go into port, where the damage was repaired, and they stayed twenty days to avoid the storm. The master claimed the expense of this repair, and the maintenance and wages of the crew during the twenty days' stay, as general average. The Court of King's Bench rejected the claim. Lord Ellenborough said, that here there was no sacrifice of part for the sake of the rest. The damage incurred was by the violence of the wind and weather, and the only sacrifice made by the master was of their time and patience.

3. Plummer v Wildman, 1815, 3 Maul. and Sel. 482. Here the ship suffered by collision, so that for the general safety, and in order to prosecute the voyage, she was obliged, after cutting away part of the rigging, to return and refit in a West India port. The particulars claimed as contribution were: pilotage into Kingston; surveying and repairing the damage; wharfage and cooerage on landing, and stowing the cargo during the repairs; the charges of reloading; wages and crimpage for replacing deserters. Lord Ellenborough said, that if the return to port was necessary for the general safety of the whole concern, it seems that the expenses unavoidably incurred by such necessity may be considered as the subject of general average. It is not a question so much what was the first cause of the damage, as whether the effect produced was such as to incapacitate the ship, without endangering the whole concern, from further prosecuting her voyage, unless she returned to port and removed the impediments. As far as removing the incapacity is concerned, all are equally benefited by it; and therefore it seems reasonable that all should contribute towards the expense of it. But if any benefit ultra the mere removal of this incapacity should have accrued to the ship by the repairs done, inasmuch as that will redound to the particular benefit of the shipowner only, it will not come under the head of general average; but that will be a matter of calculation upon the adjustment. The amount of the expense of repairing, to be placed to the account of general contribution, must be strictly confined to the necessity of the case; and the arbitrator will have to determine how much was expended upon such repairs as were absolutely necessary to the enabling the ship with her cargo to prosecute the voyage; and for so much, and no more, the defendant will be liable to contribute. As to the charge for the captain's expense during the unloading, repairing, and reloading, the shipowner must bear the captain's expenses, and crimpage must be disallowed: it does not come under general average. The other judges concurred.

[The distinction between the two last cited cases is scarcely brought out by the author with his usual clearness. The cases are expressly distinguished by Lord Ellenborough in Power v Whitmore. In that case the claim of average was rejected on the ground that the going into port to refit, although necessary, was a consequence of accident resulting from peril of the sea. In Plummer v Wildman the damage to be repaired was voluntary cutting of the bowsprit rigging, and the repair of this damage was a proper subject of average.]

Covington v Roberts, 2 New Rep. 378. This was a case of damage occasioned to a ship by carrying too great a press of sail to effect escape from a privateer which had captured her. The cargo was saved, together with the ship, but the hull and masts were damaged. The benefit to the cargo was held as incidental, not the object and cause of the damage.

Taylor v Curtis, Holt 192, 6 Taunt. 608, 2 Marshall 309. This was a ship separated accidentally from convoy, which defended herself against an American privateer, whom she beat off. She arrived at St. Thomas' almost a wreck, and

5. Where a ship is purposely run on shore to prevent her foundering at sea, or to shun the manifest danger of striking on rocks, and she is got off with damage, this is an average loss.¹

The rule is the same when the vessel is run on shore to avoid capture.²

6. The expense of employing workmen to perform extraordinary service for the safety of the ship is average.³

7. Damage done to ship or cargo during a combat, the issue of which has saved the ship and cargo, and sums expended in curing the wounded, seem fairly entitled to be considered as average. But the point is settled in favour of the opposite opinion.⁴

8. If the whole ship be freighted, and the master on his own account take the goods of other merchants on board clandestinely, the jettison of those goods, if the owner of them had notice of the encroachment, will not ground a claim of average.⁵ If he put his goods on board in bona fide, it would rather seem that he will have a right to claim average, the freighter having relief against the master and owners.⁶

2. Of Property liable to Contribution.

The subjects of contribution generally are: the cargo, the ship, and the freight.

I. CARGO.—The common rule is, that what pays no freight pays no average.⁷ But this is not to be strictly taken, so as, according to the old Lubeck law quoted by Langen- [590] beck (as alluded to by Magens), to exempt from average the goods taken by the master delivered her cargo in safety. The cargo was valued at £21,000, the goods of the defendant £1000, the loss to the ship nearly £3000. An average was claimed against the defendant of £138. But it was held, after full argument, not to be a case of general average; that it was the duty of the captain and sailors to defend the ship, as much as to pump her after a leak. The loss fell where the chance of war directed it.

Stevens says that the practice at Lloyd's has been conformable, and that the opinions of two eminent counsel sanctioned that practice; but he argues strenuously against it, as coming under the head of inevitable loss and partial damage. Stevens on Average, 31, 34; see also his Appendix, 231.

[The doctrine in the text has been confirmed and extended by an important and generally accepted decision of Mr. Justice Story, The Colombian Insurance Co. v Ashby, 13 Pet. Sup. Court Rep. 331. In this case, it was found that the ship had been properly run on shore when she was drifting broadside on close to the shore. The vessel was run upon a bank, where after the storm she was left high and dry. The lives of the company and the entire cargo were saved, but the ship could not be got off, and became a total loss. The owners of cargo were held liable in an average contribution, on the ground that an intentional stranding is a sacrifice of the ship for the benefit of the cargo, and that it is unreasonable to say that if a man loses his whole property for the common benefit he shall receive nothing, but if he lose part only he shall receive full compensation. In cases of fortuitous stranding, the expense of discharging the cargo, but not expenses afterwards incurred, constitute general average. Job v Langton, 6 El. and Bl. 779.]

⁴ So Pothier decides, Avaries, No. 144, distinguishing this from the dangers of the sea.

Emerigon, on the other hand, in a case where a French ship suffered much damage in fight with an English ship, gave his opinion that it was a case of simple average, the exposure to an enemy being as much a peril of the sea as a storm. He supports his opinion by the authority of Cleirac, sur les Jugemens d'Oleron, art. 9, tit. 5, p. 50; of Casaregis, Disc. 46, No. 43; Disc. 121, No. 3; of Targa, 256; Kuricke, tit. 14, art. 3.

Valin says that the damage sustained by the ship and goods in a combat to avoid capture is common average, 'although Kuricke, Targa, and Casaregis are of a different opinion' (2 Valin 156).

In Robertson v Brown, 1785, M. 13430, the Court of Session decided against the sufferers, contrary to what had been the prevailing opinion of Scottish merchants, on the strength of certificates that such had been the view taken in London in the course of the American and French war.

out of friendship freight-free. The substantial rule is, that goods (or even money as goods), if on board for traffic, whatever may be their nature, or to whomsoever they may belong, and whethêr paying freight or not, provided they be on board at the time of the ejectment, are liable to contribution.¹ 1. That part of the cargo which has been thrown overboard is liable to contribution; otherwise the owners of it would alone be exempted from loss.² 2. Goods stowed on the deck are liable to average if saved; and more justly, perhaps, than if better stowed.³ 3. There is no contribution for the passengers or crew; for it is impossible to put a value on the life of a free man.⁴ 4. The wearing apparel, personal jewels, or money in the purse of passengers or crew, do not contribute:⁵ as accessories of the person, they are by the law or usage of some states exempted;⁶ while in others they contribute, with the exception of the ordinary wearing clothes.⁷ In Scottish practice it seems only to be such luggage of passengers as is put in boxes or chests that contributes.⁸ 5. Although money in a man's pocket may be exempted, as a sort of accessory of his person, money or bills in his possession are said to be liable to contribution: at the same time, bills are not themselves valuable, and the true interest may be held, and the money recovered, without them.

II. SHIP.—The ship contributes to all average losses; but the stores and provisions do not contribute. The correct statement is, that the value of the ship, deducting provisions, stores, wear and tear, and partial loss, is the subject of contribution.⁹

III. FREIGHT contributes to average, but not the seamen's wages.¹⁰ It is not for the general benefit that the seamen should have any motive to oppose a sacrifice in which the safety of the whole is involved; while this exemption from average is no more than a fair recompense for their extraordinary exertions during the storm.¹¹ In reckoning the freight for contribution, the wages are deducted.¹²

3. Mode of valuing and apportioning General Average.

In the practical operation of adjusting the average, the value of what is lost is to be reckoned on the one hand, and on the other the value of the contributory interest, or of what is saved.¹³

I. GOODS are to be valued according to the following rules: 1. Goods jettisoned are to be taken at the market price which they would have brought at the port of delivery; freight, duties, and other charges deducted.¹⁴ 2. To goods saved a different rule is to be applied according to the circumstances. When the voyage is completed, and the average is adjusted at the port of discharge, the universal practice now is, to take the actual value of the cargo

But where average is claimed in respect of the expenditure of money for the general benefit, the person making it must be indemnified whether the ship and cargo are eventually saved or not. at the market price, stripped of all the charges attaching to it, as freight, duty, and landing charges; and to add the estimated neat proceeds of the goods jettisoned (taken in like manner), to the neat value of the cargo saved.¹ In the charges are not to be included [591] the premiums of insurance, nor the commission which the consignee has on sales.² Where the ship has been put back, the valuation must be at the invoice price.³ If the ship have arrived at a certain port, but unable to complete the voyage, and with no other means of sending on the goods, the value must be what the goods will bring there. 3. If the goods saved are damaged, they must be taken only at the deteriorated value, which alone has been saved.⁴ If goods jettisoned have been recovered after having suffered damage by the jettison, or if damage in the nature of average have been otherwise sustained, the value, as if sound, must be taken in the estimate for their contribution; since by the contribution from the rest they are made good to the merchant.⁵ If the cargo produce nothing, or the charges exceed the gains, or the goods be abandoned to salvors, there will be no contribution from the cargo, for there is no benefit.⁶ 4. When the freight is paid at the loading port, it is added to the value of the cargo, the merchant having then the interest in the freight, by its being converted into a charge on the goods. The loss is to be contributed, not according to the bulk or weight of the property saved, but according to its value. So gems or pearls of inconsiderable weight and bulk, but great value, pay according to the interest which the owner has in the safety of the ship.⁷

II. The valuation of the SHIP for contribution is attended with some difficulty. The wear and tear of the ship during the voyage, and the consumption of provisions and stores, make fair deductions from the value of the ship as contributory interest; and various methods have been taken in the several maritime codes to attain a general rule for this deduction. In one, the ship and freight are both taken, but at half their value;⁸ in another, the ship or the freight is excluded, at the option of the owners of the cargo.⁹ The object is to approximate as nearly as possible to the value of the ship as at the time of the average loss. This seems best to be done by taking the hull, masts, rigging, and stores, as at the time of her sailing, and then deducting the provisions and stores expended, the wear and tear of the voyage, and partial losses sustained. There seems to be another method of coming at the value; viz. to state the deteriorated value, and to add what is made good by general contribution. But the former is generally adopted.¹⁰

III. The amount of FREIGHT which is to be taken as contributory interest is the actual sum received by the shipowner, after deducting the seamen's wages, and a third of the petty average. Those are the charges with which the freight is burdened. The wages are thus saved from contribution, to encourage the easier assent of the crew to the necessary measures of safety, and from a fair consideration of the justice of rewarding their personal [592] exertions by that exemption. This deduction may come to eat up the whole freight where the voyage is very long.¹¹

The freight of the goods sacrificed is paid for by general contribution, and so must contribute. But if in an intermediate port goods are taken in for those which have been thrown overboard, the freight of them is to be deducted from that of the lost goods, else the master will gain by the loss of the owner of the goods sacrificed.¹

In concluding this subject, it may be observed, 1. That the property of the goods abandoned is still with the owner, if they be saved or recovered; and that they are not liable to contribution for any average subsequent to the jettison. And, 2. That the valuation in a policy of insurance ought not in any manner to affect the value for contribution; this valuation having the indemnity of the insured alone in contemplation, according to an express or implied bargain in the insurance contract; while the value for contribution has relation to the actual state of the property, and the benefit conferred by the sacrifice.²

SUBSECTION III.—OF SALVAGE.

This sort of indemnity, like average loss, may come into question either between the shipowners and merchants concerned in a voyage, and those entitled to a recompense for saving the property; or it may occur with insurers in the consideration of partial losses in settling under a policy.

SALVAGE is a reward or recompense given to those by means of whose labour, intrepidity, or perseverance, a ship or goods have been saved from shipwreck, fire, or capture,—the losses to which this sort of property is peculiarly exposed. It forms one of the most natural burdens on property so saved or recovered, and gives at once a remedy in Admiralty IN REM, and at common law by lien;³ and a personal action or claim against the owner to whom the property is restored.⁴

The subject of salvage is not, however, without its difficulties. How to give, on the one hand, such recompense as may fairly reward the labour and intrepidity of the salvors, and encourage their exertions and honesty; and, on the other, to prevent depredations on ships stranded or in danger, and the oppression of excessive exactions in the moment of alarm—is a difficult problem in legislation. It requires the aid of a vigilant officer, possessed of a large and honest judicial discretion. In all the codes of marine jurisprudence we find that this difficulty has been felt; that while provision has been made for the recompense of those by whose means ships or cargoes have been saved from shipwreck, capture, fire, or other impending loss, it has been found necessary, by two sets of regulations, to restrain the oppression which is too frequently practised by those into whose power accident has thrown the unfortunate. These are, 1. Penal laws against depredation; and, 2. Regulations for settling a fair and reasonable rate of salvage.

In England the provisions by statute relative to salvage make a part of certain laws, enacted principally with a view to restrain depredations on stranded and derelict property; laws which were rendered necessary by the slender aid afforded by the English common law in such cases. There are three several cases provided for, which it will be necessary to consider more fully hereafter: 1. The case of stranded ships, where application can be made to a magistrate; 2. The case of persons falling in with ships abandoned; and, 3. The case of [593] persons engaging, at the request of those interested, without the interposition of a magistrate.⁵ Severe regulations are contained in those laws against depredation, and many wise precautions taken against frauds difficult to be restrained in the unprotected or scattered state of property which has suffered shipwreck. The regulations respecting salvage form the encouraging part of those statutes; and they also are framed with humanity and wisdom, for preventing oppression in settling the recompense of salvors.

In Scotland, this matter is left chiefly to the common law. The statute of Queen Anne, indeed, has been held to extend to Scotland;¹ but the other Acts alluded to are confined to England. In Scotland, depute-admirals, and the jurisdiction of the judge ordinary of the shire, are sufficient, in the exercise of our common law, to repress the depredations which are the subject of so many anxious regulations in England.

In commenting further on the subject of salvage, it may be proper to consider, 1. Who are entitled to salvage; 2. For what acts, or in what circumstances, salvage is due; 3. Who is liable for salvage; and, 4. The principles on which the amount is to be ascertained under the common law, and the rules settled in particular cases by statute.²

I. WHO ARE ENTITLED TO SALVAGE.—1. The MASTER and CREW of the ship that is saved have no claim for salvage, however extraordinary their exertions of courage or of labour: for already, by their contract with the owners, their interest and exertions are engaged in the service of the ship and cargo.³ But when their duty as seamen is over (as by capture it is), any exertion subsequently made with success to recover and rescue the ship entitles them to recompense.⁴ One distinction is to be observed between the case of a rescue from an enemy (the crew being discharged from their duty as soon as the capture is effected), and the case of a mutiny quelled, which, however successful, does not discharge the crew. In the former case there is salvage; in the latter there is not.⁵ Another distinction is to be observed between a claim of salvage in a case of successful mutiny, where that claim is made by part of the crew, and where it is made by another vessel coming to the aid of the distressed ship. In the former case there is no claim; in the latter there is the same right as if the ship were rescued from an enemy.⁶

2. The PASSENGERS are so far in a different situation, that although they are bound while on board to labour for the common safety, as persons not on account of the accident coming from a state of safety to a state of danger, but as labouring for their own [594] preservation as well as that of others, yet they are not bound to adhere to the ship; and if a passenger do continue for the purpose of giving aid when he might have left the vessel, and especially if any extraordinary sacrifices be made, or any uncommon exertion of courage, skill, or labour, he will be entitled to recompense as a salvor:⁷ as, where a passenger under-

⁴ The Two Friends, M'Dougall, 1 Rob. Adm. Rep. 271. Here both the captain and crew and passengers had recompense allowed them for rescuing an American ship on a voyage from Philadelphia to London.

In the Beaver, Conner, 3 Rob. Adm. Rep. 292, a British merchant ship having been taken by a French privateer, and all the crew except the master and a boy taken out, the master rose on five Frenchmen who had been put on board, knocked down the prize-master, and seizing his pistols, the only firearms on board, drove the rest of the crew down below, and gained possession of the ship. He then steered towards the English coast, and had nearly perished in a storm, when he got help from an English frigate. They all went on board the frigate, the condition of the ship appearing desperate. But the storm abating, the master again went to his ship, and succeeded in bringing her into port. The ship was worth £6000, and Lord Stowell adjudged a salvage to the master and boy of £1000, in the proportion of £850 to the master and £150 to the boy.

⁵ Governor Raffles, King, 1813, 2 Dod. Adm. Rep. 14. The claim of carpenter and sailors for rising on certain Malays, who had mutinied and overcome the rest of the crew, and for finally rescuing the ship from them, was very reluctantly refused by Lord Stowell.

⁶ Trelawney, Lake, 1802, 4 Rob. Adm. Rep. 223.

⁷ In the case last cited of the Two Friends, Miller, a passenger, had a great share in the rescue; and Lord Stowell said, that 'being of opinion that Miller was in reality a passenger, and not the ship's carpenter, and that his services had been very instrumental in effecting the rescue, the Court took the office of master on the desertion of the proper master, and by skill and labour brought the ship into port, it was held that he was entitled to recompense in the nature of salvage, as having made exertions which he was under no obligation to make, and incurred responsibilities which were not incident to his own proper character. He was held to stand in a different situation from that in which the mate would have stood had he supplied the master's place.¹

3. A PILOT employed to bring the ship into harbour is not entitled to salvage. That there is danger in the occupation of a pilot is true; but having taken up that occupation, he is not entitled to claim as the spontaneous salvors of a ship are entitled; though in the liberal allowance which the Court of Admiralty gives in all cases of danger and distress, 'the safe conduct of a ship into a port under circumstances of extreme danger and personal exertion may exalt a pilotage service into something of a salvage service. And it is held expedient for the general safety of navigation, that persons ready on the water, and fearless of danger, should by liberal reward be encouraged to go out for the assistance of vessels in distress.'²

4. A claim to share as JOINT SALVORS must be supported by proof of an actual necessity, or at least apparent necessity, for the claimants lending their help to the persons already engaged. This is grounded on an equitable consideration of the interest of the merchant on the one hand, and on the other of that of the salvors who have already accomplished the deliverance of the vessel. So, where a third party has interfered with salvors already in the act of saving a wreck, and requiring no aid for that purpose, it will be held officious and unnecessary, unless the necessity shall be shown.³ The proof of the necessity must depend on the circumstances of the case.⁴ Many nice questions have arisen as to cases [595] of joint recapture, and several determinations of the Court of Admiralty of England have thrown great light on the subject. It would appear, 1. That no previous operation on the part of a ship which has not been present at the capture, though it may have had some effect in making the enemy in possession shape the vessel's course so as to fall into the hands of the captors, is sufficient to confer a right to share in the salvage as joint captor.⁵ 2. That a king's ship, being actually in sight at the capture, is entitled to the benefit; the fate of the capture being often determined by the hopelessness of successful defence; and it being, consistently with the duty of a king's ship, the presumption of law that she has the animus capiendi.⁶ The rule is different as to a privateer, and even a revenue ship.⁷ 3. That constructive aid by boats not actually engaged in the capture is not sufficient, unless a case can actually be made out of intimidation from these boats.⁸ 4. That actual co-opera-pronounced that he should be rewarded equally with the master.' And so he had £1250, besides £300 of actual expense in buying over some Danish sailors. 1 Rob. Adm. Rep. 285.

² Lord Stowell, in the Joseph Harvey, Paddock, 1 Rob. Adm. Rep. 306. This was a case in which an attempt was made to convert pilotage duty into an act of salvage, which the Court severely reprehended.

In another case, the Sarah, where a boat went out to the aid of a ship in distress, Lord Stowell explained the policy by which the Court is accustomed to direct itself in adjudging rewards in which the benefit of navigation is concerned. Ib. p. 313, note.

tion by a privateer, either in the recapture or in the chase, will entitle her to salvage along with the king's ship;¹ and even the being engaged in the chase, and continuing to sail in the direction of pursuit, will give right as joint captor, although darkness should have prevented the sight of the capture.²

5. Whether salvage is due to the convoying ship for recapture of one of the fleet under her protection, seems to admit of very considerable doubt. It may certainly operate as an encouragement to negligence in the officer commanding the convoy, who ought to keep a sharp lookout after ships hovering about the convoy. Lord Stowell has held the point as settled in favour of the convoy, and has proceeded on that footing in subsequent cases.³ But in all those cases special regard has been paid to the question, whether there be any neglect on the part of the convoying ship established before the proper tribunal (the Lords of the Admiralty), to defeat the right of the salvors?

6. King's ships may be entitled to salvage for assistance to vessels in distress where their aid has been very splendid and extraordinary. But where such aid is given in the course of duty, and especially without any extraordinary danger or exertion, such claim is not sustained.⁴

7. The master and crew of a vessel which interferes to save, and does save, another, are alone, strictly speaking, the salvors; but a consideration is generally given also to the owners of the vessel which interferes, on account of the risk of damage, or loss of insurance to the vessel, by the crew so engaging themselves.⁵

8. Of the crew of a vessel lending assistance to a ship in distress, those who remain on board their own ships, but who are willing to go in aid, as well as those who actually are selected to go on board the distressed ship, are entitled to salvage.⁶

II. WHAT ACTS ENTITLE TO SALVAGE.—In general, the cases in which salvage is due are, Shipwreck, Recapture, and Derelict.

1. The simplest and plainest case is that in which a magistrate is called upon to give aid and protection against depredation when a ship is stranded, or in danger of it. The evils to vessels stranded, or in danger on the coast, are not merely those of shipwreck. [596] Those evils are often augmented by the depredations of the idle or the profligate who crowd to such scenes; and the Act in Queen Anne's time, already alluded to (which extends to Scotland), regulated the aid to be given, under the direction of certain public officers. By this law, all sheriffs, justices, etc., shall, on application from those in danger of being, or actually being stranded or run on shore, call together as many men as may be necessary, and require aid from king's ships, or those of his subjects in the neighbourhood, under a penalty of £100 on the superior officer who shall refuse to obey the call. The master of the stranded ship is entitled to repel by force all who shall intrude without leave of the officer of customs, etc. And provision is also made for the orderly proceedings of salvors, and for the settling of the salvage.⁷

2. But aid may be sought by those belonging to the ship without the intervention of a public officer; and this, perhaps, is the more frequent case. At common law, those who give aid are entitled to their reward; and it is the province of the Court of Admiralty in Scotland to regulate the rate of salvage, on a due consideration of the danger and exertion, repressing any oppressive promises, which in the moment of anxiety, alarm, and danger, those in hazard may be induced to give. In England, the settlement of the salvage in this case is regulated by a statute, enacted, like the other statutes on this subject, for the suppression of frauds and depredations committed by boatmen and others, but which does not apply to Scotland.¹

3. Persons voluntarily assisting are often the most meritorious salvors, for it is in situations which preclude all regular proceedings that such aid is most necessary. The danger to be avoided in such cases is the interference of improper persons in the absence of the crew, persons whose aid is given more for the sake of depredation than of humanity. The English statute of George II.² on this subject is also a police Act for enforcing the laws against persons stealing or detaining shipwrecked goods, and for the relief of persons suffering losses thereby. It establishes a reward for persons who save ships which have been abandoned, provided they instantly give notice to a public officer. In Scotland this is left to the common law, and falls under the disposal of the Court of Admiralty.

4. The salvage of cables, packages, and other single articles cast overboard or lost, is in England under regulation of the 49 Geo. III. c. 122. In Scotland this is left to common law, by which the salvors are bound to restore the property to the proprietors, or to give it up to the Admiral-Depute for the benefit of the owner or insurers,³ on receiving a fair and reasonable salvage under the cognizance of the Court of Admiralty.

5. The rescue or recapture of vessels or goods lost by hostile attack, whether of the proper enemies of the country, or of pirates, the enemies of the whole mercantile world, entitles those engaged to salvage. The recapture of British ships is settled by statute.⁴ That of neutrals gives salvage only where the capture is in circumstances which would have justified or led to condemnation.⁵

[597] III. WHO IS LIABLE FOR SALVAGE.—The reward must be given by those who receive benefit, and who would have suffered the loss from which the exertions of the salvors have saved them. And so, in a case where, by recapture, both ship and cargo were saved (but in so far as the merchant was concerned, to no better effect than to make him liable for freight in consequence of the ship's arrival, while the goods were not worth the freight), the Court of King's Bench held the shipowners alone to be liable, in respect of the ship and freight.⁶ In one case the private property of an allied sovereign was held free from salvage.⁷

IV. OF THE AMOUNT OF SALVAGE.—The amount of salvage is in some cases fixed by statute; in others, left to the common law and judicial discretion.⁸

1. On RECAPTURE of any ship, boat, or vessel, or goods taken therein, belonging to any of the king's subjects, they are to be restored, at whatever time the original capture shall have taken place, on payment of one-eighth part of the value, if retaken by a king's ship; or if retaken by a privateer or other ship, etc., one-sixth part of the value; or if jointly by king's ship and privateer, such salvage as the judge of the High Court of Admiralty shall award.⁹ There is an exception, however, of ships which shall have been set forth by the enemy,

And persons who merely furnish boats, tackle, etc., are only entitled to hire for their use, not to salvage (the Charlotte, 12 Jur. 568).]

the Admiral. But the Act 12 Queen Anne does not apply to such a case as I have stated above, but only to the case where an application has been made to the magistrate for aid.

while in his possession as ships or vessels of war: these are to be considered as prize. It has been adjudged by Lord Stowell, that the mere act of sending additional men aboard, and forcing the captured ship to act as a privateer, without any commission of war, is not sufficient to bring a ship under the exception.¹ But that eminent judge has held the exception to comprehend the case of a ship which at the time of recapture was acting as a merchant ship, but which in the intermediate period had been fitted out as a privateer.²

It has been well said, that 'the Prize Acts are drawn with no overflowing liberality towards recaptors:' that in forming the first of them, it was justly thought that a greater reward ought to have been held out to recaptors, as an encouragement to exertions of this nature; but that other opinions having prevailed, it is only left to the Court of Admiralty, in cases not within the Act, to exercise its judgment and discretion under the general maritime law.³ It is not enough to make out such a case, that a ship is cut out from a harbour, or from under a battery, instead of being recaptured at sea.⁴ But respecting droits of Admiralty, the Court will exercise their discretion.⁵

2. Rescue of foreign property is not within the Prize Acts, and therefore is left to the discretion of the Court of Admiralty on the general maritime law. It was a case of this sort which opened the discretionary power of the Court to give such a salvage to the master and his boy in the case already quoted,⁶ as the judge thought they eminently deserved.

3. In cases where the accident and the relief are not upon the coast, so as to bring the case within the Acts of Queen Anne or the later Acts, it has been held in England that the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty is untrammelled in considering the quantum [598] meruit. This will hold respecting all cases in Scotland, except those which fall strictly within the statute of Queen Anne; that is to say, where an application is made to a magistrate by those concerned in a ship stranded, or in danger of stranding. And the great principle on which these determinations ought to be conducted, as repeatedly laid down by Lord Stowell, is to give a liberal remuneration, looking not merely to the exact quantum of service performed, but to the general interests of the navigation and commerce of the country, which are greatly protected by exertions of this nature.⁷

⁷ [Ascertainment of Amount of Salvage.—By the Act 17 and 18 Vict. c. 104, secs. 460–5, it is provided that whenever any dispute arises between the owners of a ship, cargo, etc. and the salvors as to the amount of salvage, and they cannot agree as to the settlement of it by arbitration or otherwise, then, (1.) If the sum claimed does not exceed £200, the dispute is to be referred to the arbitration of two justices of the peace, resident, in case of wreck, at or near the place where it is found; or in case of services to a ship, boat, cargo, persons, etc., resident at or near the place where the ship or boat is lying, or the first port into which the ship or boat is brought after the accident. And they may in either case appoint some person conversant with maritime affairs as umpire to decide the point in dispute. Power is conferred on the justices to call to their assistance any person conversant with maritime affairs as assessor (sec. 461). And if any person is aggrieved by the award of the justices or umpire, he may, in England or Ireland, appeal to the respective High Courts of Admiralty, and in Scotland to the Court of Session; but no such appeal is to be allowed unless the sum in dispute exceeds £50, nor unless the appellant, within ten days after the date of the award, gives notice to the justices of his intention to appeal, nor unless he take such proceeding as, according to the practice of the court of appeal, is necessary for an appeal within twenty days of the award (sec. 464). (2.) If the sum claimed exceed £200, the dispute may either of consent be referred to the arbitration of such justices, or, if the parties do not consent, shall, in England and Ireland, be decided by the respective High Courts of Admiralty, and in Scotland by the Court of Session; and it is provided that if the claimants do not recover a greater sum than £200, they shall not, unless the Court certifies that the case was a fit one to be tried in a superior court, recover any costs (sec. 460).

Retention or Lien and Sale.—Whenever any salvage is due in respect of services in assisting any ship, etc., or saving the lives of the persons belonging to the same, or the cargo, the receiver shall detain the ship and cargo, etc. until payment is

4. DERELICT.—In cases of derelict, by the old law a half was given ; by the French law, a third ; by the modern practice in this country, the recompense is discretionary.¹

5. WRECK.—The cases of wreck which fall under the Act of Queen Anne, are in Scotland to be ruled by the provisions of that Act, as those in England are. The intention of this Act, in so far as it provides for the ascertainment of salvage, was, that an easy and economical process should be placed in the power of the parties for settling all disputes on this head without going from the neighbourhood. With this view, in case of a dispute, the parties were authorized to nominate three neighbouring justices of the peace to adjust the quantum of gratuity to be paid to the salvors. When this imperfect remedy is found not to apply, as where the parties cannot agree, recourse must be had to the jurisdiction of the Judge-Admiral. And in general it may be observed, that in England this Act of Queen Anne, and the subsequent Acts of Geo. II. and Geo. III., have not been held to take away the jurisdiction or authority which previously belonged to the Court of Admiralty.²

made, or process has been issued by some competent court for such detention ; and if the salvage is due in respect of any wreck which has not been sold as unclaimed, he shall detain such wreck until payment is made or process issued (sec. 468). If the parties liable to pay the salvage are aware of such detention, then, in cases where the amount is not disputed, and payment thereof is not made within twenty days after the same has become due, or where the amount is disputed but no appeal lies from the first tribunal, and payment is not made within twenty days after the decision of the first tribunal, or where the amount is disputed and an appeal is competent, but is not made within twenty days, the receiver may forthwith sell the ship, cargo, or wreck, etc., or part thereof, and out of the proceeds of the sale pay all expenses, fees, and salvage, and the surplus, if any, to the owners of the property sold, or others entitled to receive it (sec. 469). Whenever salvage is claimed by the commander or crew of any ship, and the salvor agrees to abandon his lien, then, upon the master or person in charge entering into an agreement to abide the decision of the High Court of Admiralty or any Vice-Admiralty Court, and giving security to such amount as may be agreed on, such agreement shall bind the ship, cargo, and freight, and the owners, for the salvage which may be adjudged to be payable, and the salvor shall transmit the agreement and other documents to the Court in which the agreement is to be adjudicated upon (sec. 497). If a salvor elect not to proceed under the Act, he shall have no power to detain the ship, cargo, etc. ; but he may proceed otherwise as if the Act had not been passed (sec. 494).

Payment by Receiver.—When the amount of salvage has been finally ascertained, either by agreement or by the award of the justices or their umpire, but a dispute arises as to the apportionment thereof amongst several claimants, the party liable may, if the amount does not exceed £200, pay the same to the receiver of wrecks of the district, who, if he thinks fit to receive it, shall grant a certificate stating the fact of such payment, and the services in respect of which it is made, which shall be a full discharge to the party paying against the claims of all persons in respect of the services therein mentioned (sec. 466). The receiver shall then proceed to distribute the amount among the persons entitled thereto upon such evidence, and in such proportions as he thinks fit, with power to retain any moneys that may appear to him to be payable to any absent parties ; and this distribution shall be final and conclusive against the actual claimants.]

See 1 and 2 Geo. IV. c. 75.

² [On the subject of wreck there are the following provisions in the Act 17 and 18 Vict. c. 104 :—

(1.) Receivers of Wreck.—The Board of Trade throughout the United Kingdom has the superintendence of all matters relating to wreck, and may, with the consent of the Treasury, appoint any officer of customs, coast-guard, inland revenue, or any other person, to be a receiver of wreck in any district (sec. 439). And no admiral, or other person exercising admiralty jurisdiction, shall interfere with any wreck (sec. 400).

(2.) What to be done by them.—Whenever any ship or boat is stranded or in distress, the receiver of the district is forthwith to proceed to the place, take the command of all persons present, and assign such duties to each person, and issue such directions as he may think fit, with a view to the preservation of the ship, lives of persons, and the cargo ; but he is not to interfere between the master and his crew in matters relating to the management of the ship, unless he is requested so to do by the master (sec. 441). He may, for these purposes, summon such number of men as he thinks necessary to assist him ; require the master or person having the charge of any ship or boat near at hand to give aid with his men, ship, or boats ; demand the use of any cart or horses that may be near at hand (sec. 442), and pass over private property (sec. 446).

All cargo and other articles that may be washed on shore, or otherwise lost or taken from such ship, must be delivered to the receiver ; and any person, whether he is the owner or not, who secretes or keeps possession of, or refuses to deliver them to the receiver, shall incur a penalty not exceeding one hundred pounds, and the receiver may take them by force (sec. 443).

If any person plunders, creates disorder, or obstructs the preservation of the ship, etc., the receiver may cause such person to be apprehended, and use force for the suppression of such plundering, etc. He must, as soon as conveniently may be (or in his absence any justice of the peace), examine upon oath any person belonging to the ship in distress, or any other person as to the name of the ship, the services rendered, and such other matters or circumstances as he

SUBSECTION IV.—OF CONTRACTS OF INSURANCE.

Insurance is a contract by which the insurer or underwriter, in consideration of a sum or premium advanced, undertakes to indemnify the insured against risks or perils to which his property is exposed. It is used as the means of security against the dangers of the elements or enemy, to which ships or goods are liable while at sea; against the danger of fire, to which commodities or houses are continually subject at land; and against the chance of death, and the loss which the insured may sustain by the death of others in whose existence he has a pecuniary interest, or that which his creditors or his family may sustain by his own. It is to the first of these sorts of insurance that our attention is now to be directed. Insurance against fire and life insurances will form the subject of a subsequent chapter.

It is needless to insist on the benefits of a contract by which the insurer, dividing the loss with others, contrives on the average of his dealings to earn large gains, while the insured is secured against the ruin which would crush an individual. But the obvious necessity of some such refuge from individual disaster, amidst the perils of such a trade as ours, and the impracticability of proceeding without this expedient now that it is known, afford unquestionable proofs of the narrow limits of ancient commerce in which insurance was not practised.

The contract of insurance is settled by a written instrument called a policy of insurance, which must be stamped and pay a duty to Government, and in which are specified the premium, the risk, the names of the underwriters or insurers, and the name of the insured.

In England, this contract has been made the subject of two treatises, which stand deservedly high in public estimation.¹ In Scotland we have had no work upon this [599] subject since that of Mr. Millar: his book was published forty years ago,² and during that long period the mercantile law of Scotland has been making rapid strides towards maturity.

The chief design of the following commentaries on this subject is to present, in a concise view of the subject, some important cases determined by the Scottish courts, in many of which the judgments of the House of Lords are now to be held as law in both parts of the island.

I.—CLAIMS ON THE BANKRUPTCY OF THE INSURED.

This claim can have for its object only the premium of insurance. But as in every policy there is a clause in which 'the assurers confess themselves paid the consideration due to us for this assurance by the assured,' it is necessary to look into the history and thinks necessary; which examination is to be taken down in writing, and he is to send one copy to the Board of Trade, and another to the secretary of Lloyd's (sec. 448).

He must also, within forty-eight hours after taking possession of any wreck, cause a description of it, and of any marks by which it is distinguished, to be posted up in the custom-house of the port nearest to the place where the wreck was found or seized; and if the value exceeds twenty pounds, he is to transmit a similar description to the secretary of Lloyd's, who is there to post it up (sec. 452). He is likewise authorized, where any wreck is under the value of £5, or of a perishable nature, or in such a condition that its sale is expedient, to sell the same (sec. 453).

(3.) Unclaimed Wreck.—In the event of no owner establishing a claim to wreck before the expiration of a year from the date at which the same has come into the possession of the receiver, then, if any admiral, vice-admiral, lord of any manor, etc., has given notice to, and has proved to the satisfaction of, the receiver, that he is entitled to wreck at such place, the receiver shall, upon payment of all expenses, fees, and salvage, deliver up possession thereof to such admiral, etc. (sec. 471). But if no owner establishes his claim to wreck within the above period, and if no admiral, etc., other than Her Majesty, is proved to be entitled to it, the receiver shall forthwith sell the same; and after payment of all expenses, and such amount of salvage as the Board of Trade may in each case or by any general rule determine, pay the same into the Exchequer, and the same shall form part of the Consolidated Fund (sec. 475).]

² Elements of the Law relating to Insurances, by John Millar, junior, Esq., advocate, Edinburgh, 1787. Mr. Millar was son to the eminent Professor of Civil Law in the University of Glasgow. [See also Sm. Merc. Law, infra; Addison on Contracts, 6th ed. 492 et seq.]

intention of this clause, as affected by the usage of trade, in order to see by whom a claim for premium can be maintained.

HISTORY AND USE OF THE RECEIPT IN THE POLICY.—The acknowledgment in the policy is said first to have been intended to preclude the plea of want of consideration in an action for loss.¹ Whether it be so or not, is of little consequence. It is certain that now this clause has come to serve as the groundwork of arrangements, according to which the whole business of insurance is managed in Great Britain. This business is conducted not by the principals, but by means of brokers. Those who insure are generally capitalists, who take no active concern, but are ready to undertake any risks which are presented to them, and recommended by their broker. The merchant, on the other hand, cannot waste time, at the critical moment of effecting an insurance, in seeking out persons willing to enter into this contract with him; but he applies to his broker, who has on his list a number of persons ready at a moment's notice to sign or underwrite a policy. The broker is thus the mutual factor of the parties.² They, in their own persons, never come together, and are perhaps unknown to each other; while he, for a certain allowance by way of commission, undertakes the care of completing the contract, so as effectually to bind the parties to each other. The most effectual way of managing this complicated transaction, was to free the principals of direct intercourse, and to make the broker properly the middleman between them: to arrange it so that the relation of debtor and creditor should not subsist directly between the parties themselves, but between the broker and the several parties respectively; he undertaking the risk of recovering the premiums from the insured, and binding himself directly as debtor for the amount of them to the underwriter. According to this arrangement, mutual accounts are kept, in which the broker states in the underwriter's account all the premiums which he is authorized by the underwriter to draw, as already received, and as articles to the underwriter's credit, against which he places all return premiums or sums received for losses (if he be authorized to recover them); and he settles the account periodically with the underwriter. On the other hand, he, in account with the insured, debits him with the unpaid premiums, giving him credit for any return premiums, or for losses which he may be empowered to recover. This arrangement is accomplished by means of that receipt, which is said to have originated from the system of special pleading, but which serves this occasion so well, that it may be doubted whether it was not devised for the purpose. The receipt for the premiums, signed by the underwriter and delivered to the [600] broker, is a power or warrant to him to receive the premiums so acknowledged, as the delivery to a steward of a receipt for rent is a warrant to him to receive the rent from the tenant. On the other hand, the acknowledgment is not effectual to discharge the insured, since it is not delivered to him as his document of discharge; and thus the broker is enabled to state his accounts in the way already explained.

In England, the origin to which the receipt in the policy has been traced did certainly at one time so far prevail, that the receipt in the printed policy, being confessedly contrary to the fact, was not held to bar the underwriter's claim for premiums.³ But by recent cases it is settled that the receipt is conclusive between the parties to prove payment of the premiums, unless where there is fraud on the part of the insured.⁴

² [It is to be observed, however, that he is only their agent for the purpose of effecting an insurance. Accordingly, a communication from the broker to the underwriters stating that an insurance effected by him was a mistake, and desiring that the policy might be cancelled, was held void, and the assured held entitled to recover. Xenos v Wickham, 1 L. R., H. L. Ca. 296, reversing judgment of Exchequer Chamber.]

³ Marshall 341.

⁴ 1 Marshall on Insurance, 3d ed. 341-2.

In Foy v Bell, 3 Taunt. 493, and Mavor v Simeon, ib. 497, note, special juries seem to have been strongly impressed with the notion, that to limit the effect of the receipt, as in a question between the parties to the insurance policy, might endanger the whole system of underwriting, and subvert a most important branch of trade.

Dalzell v Mair, 1808, 1 Campbell 532. Mair was an underwriter in a policy to Dalzell on goods by ship or ships from Berbice to Great Britain. Reid was the broker who effected the policy. The action was by Dalzell, the insured, against

Although the broker be placed in the relation of debtor to the one party and creditor to the other by means of the receipt for the premiums, this is only as factor, his powers being subject to recall while matters are still entire, and while no jus quæsitum has arisen to the insured from the credit conferred on him by possession of the receipt; and so by the recall of the broker's authority, the underwriter may be entitled to claim the unpaid premiums.¹ Bankruptcy of the broker has been held as equivalent to a recall of the man-

Mair, for recovery of the premium, the goods never having been shipped; and the plaintiff gave the policy in evidence, bearing the usual acknowledgment by the underwriters, 'confessing ourselves paid the consideration,' etc. The fact was, that Reid, the broker, was due money to Dalzell, and persuaded him, by way of satisfaction, to accept of policies of insurance underwritten for him at Reid's office. This policy was effected accordingly; and Reid having a running account with Mair, gave him credit for the premiums, but never paid any part of them. Lord Ellenborough said: 'The defendant is bound by the receipt in the policy. If a man acknowledges that he has received a sum of money from a broker, and accredits him with his principal to that amount, he shall not afterwards, as between himself and the principal, be allowed to say that the broker never paid him. It would completely knock up the insurance business if I were to allow this acknowledgment to be impeached. It is well known there are running accounts kept between the insurance broker and the underwriter; and Lord Kenyon held that the former, before paying the premiums to the latter, might maintain an action against the assured to recover the amount of them as for money paid.'

N.B.—It is proper here to observe the circumstance of the effect ascribed to the receipt, of accrediting the broker with the insured, which seems to be the main principle of the decision. [See Sm. Merc. Law, 7th ed. 363.]

Robson v Wilson. Wilson, an insurance broker at Liverpool, sent policies to Stoddart & Co. of Newcastle, to be underwritten. Robson was an underwriter at Sunderland, who underwrote on policies presented by Stoddart & Co., on the terms usual at Newcastle and Sunderland, viz. that the broker accounts once a year with the underwriter for premiums, paying him by his acceptance at three, six, and nine months, deducting £5 on every £105 of the gross premiums, and 5 per cent. more on the net premium, in consideration of which the broker undertakes for payment of those net premiums. On 13th February Robson settled with Stoddart & Co., and got notes for the premiums due him. Stoddart & Co. failed, and a commission was issued, when there remained of the premiums on policies sent to Stoddart & Co., and underwritten by Robson, £79. A secret agreement subsisted between Stoddart & Wilson to share the commission, and Robson claimed right to have his premiums from Wilson, in whose hands they remained unpaid. At the bar, the case was argued on a ground disapproved of by the judges,—namely, on the ground of partnership between the two brokers. On the bench, the decision went on the principle laid down in the text. Lord Kenyon said, that where a factor has received money belonging to the principal, and it becomes blended with his own estate, and cannot be distinguished from it, the principal must come in with the general creditors; but that here the money was clearly distinguishable from the bankrupt's estate, being premiums in respect of policies underwritten by the plaintiff, and remaining in Wilson's hands, to be paid to somebody. Before it is paid, the factor del credere becomes bankrupt. Is it not as clear as the sun that the principal may resort to this money, which is ear-marked and distinguished from the general fund of the bankrupt? No man has any lien upon it; no man has contracted debt on the confidence of its being in the defendant's hands. The case states that it was paid to him, and got into his hands as a premium, in consequence of policies underwritten by the plaintiff. Sir S. Lawrence said: The plaintiff underwrites policies in consequence of orders from the defendant. The premiums for these insurances are not remitted, but still remain in the defendant's hands. Is it not most reasonable and just that he should pay them over to the plaintiff? 15 May 1798.

The above is stated from a report in the hands of the attorney in the case, and which was produced in the Court of Session in a similar case. But I find it also reported by Marshall, p. 301, and it is confirmed by the following opinion of Mr. Baron Wood: 'I take it to be clear, that by the law and practice of England the underwriters are entitled to receive from the assured all such premiums as the broker had not actually received at the time when he became bankrupt; and that it makes no difference whether the broker do or do not receive a premium for guaranteeing the premium to the underwriters. The premiums in the hands of the insured, unpaid, are the property of the underwriters, and can only be sued for in the name of the underwriters—neither the bankrupt nor his assignee could sue for them; and consequently they form no part of the bankrupt's estate to be distributed amongst his creditors. His guaranteeing them may give the underwriter an additional security, but does not deprive him of the remedy the law gives him against the insurer who has not paid over the money to the bankrupts. I do not know of any determination reported in any printed collection directly in point with the present case. The principle will be found in a series of cases in Cook's Bankrupt Law, p. 414. The case of Robson v Wilson was argued before the Court of King's Bench in May 1798, by Mr. Chambre and myself. Mr. Chambre argued that case on the footing of partnership, and I followed the same line of argument in my answer; but the Court decided in favour of the plaintiff upon the principle above stated, viz. that as the premiums had not been paid over by the defendant to the brokers, who had become bankrupt, the plaintiff—the underwriter—was not bound to come in as a creditor under the commission of bankrupt, but was entitled to recover the whole of the premiums against the defendant. This case is not reported; but Mr. Meggison, who was the defendant's attorney, has a note of the judgment of the Court, which I have seen.'

The same doctrine was held in the Court of Session, in

[601] date, so as to entitle the underwriter to claim the premiums directly against the insured, where no interest of the insured as with the accredited broker, or otherwise, interferes.¹ The receipt will have the effect of laying the onus probandi on the underwriter, to show that neither actual payment has taken place, nor such a settlement of accounts between the parties as is equivalent to payment of the premiums.²

The claim, when made by the broker, cannot be met by the receipt on the policy. As between the broker and the insured, the receipt is no evidence of payment of the premium: it is a mere authority entrusted to the broker to recover the premiums from the insured.³

[602] The policy is the proper evidence to be produced in support of the broker's claim for premiums; for which purpose, among others, he is entitled to retain possession of it: nor can the underwriter demand it without indemnifying him.⁴

AMOUNT OF CLAIM.—The premiums in the policy are the measure of the claim. But,

1. This claim will suffer diminution or extinction by the amount of return premiums (if any be under the policy), provided the broker is entrusted with power to settle losses and returns of premium. Special powers, however, are required for that purpose; and the possession of the policy with a receipt, although it confers power to recover premiums, gives no power whatever to settle losses or return premiums. It will undoubtedly be a good answer by the insured to the claim of the underwriters themselves, after the broker's bankruptcy, that return premiums are due to the insured. Return premiums are due: 1. Where the contract is void, as for want of interest, or for illegality.⁵ 2. Where the risk has never been begun.⁶

Bertram v Richmond & Freebairn. Bertram underwrote for Richmond & Freebairn, brokers. The brokers became bankrupt; and the question arose, Whether the underwriters were entitled to get their premiums which remained still unpaid by the assured? or whether the trustee for the brokers and creditors was not entitled to draw those premiums, leaving the underwriters to claim for a dividend on the broker's estate? The Court was unanimous in holding, that although, where a factor has received money belonging to his principal, it becomes blended with his own estate, and cannot be distinguished, yet, when he becomes bankrupt before receiving it, the principal may claim his own money, which never made a part of the factor's estate, but is entirely separate and distinct. 26 Nov. 1802, M. 7122; App. Insur. No. 10, note.

² De Gaminde v Pigou, 1812, 4 Taunt. 246. De Gaminde sent orders to Larrazabel & Co. of London, to insure goods from Alicant to Britain. They applied to Messrs. Wagstaff, insurance brokers, who effected an insurance with Pigou. There were returns of premium by short interest, etc., and a loss upon one of the ships by salvage for capture and recapture. The premium was, as usual, discharged in the policy, though not paid, but only entered in account between Pigou and the broker. The broker debited the London merchants, and they again debited De Gaminde, with whose concern in the transaction, however, Pigou the underwriter was unacquainted. De Gaminde brought his action for the loss. Pigou pleaded a set-off for the premiums; and the question for the opinion of the Court was, Whether this was a good set-off? The verdict had been for the plaintiff, De Gaminde, subject to the opinion of the Court. The Court held that the receipt in the policy was a good answer to the underwriter, as conclusive evidence that the assured has paid the premium, unless the underwriter should show that the state of the relative accounts between assured, broker, and underwriter is such as to take the case out of that ordinary rule. [Sm. Merc. L. 7th ed. 363.]

³ Mr. Campbell, in reporting Dalzell v Mair, takes notice of this distinction (1 Camp. 334, note); and Mr. Justice Park approves of it (p. 38).

⁴ Scott & Gifford v Sea Insur. Co., 1825, 3 S. 467, N. E. 325.

[In concluding the subject of insurance brokerage, it may be noticed, that if the broker underwrite a policy for a larger sum than he is authorized to do by his employer, the underwriter will not be liable to any extent, as the obligation is held not to be susceptible of division. Baines v Ewing, 1 L. R. Ex. 320.]

⁵ See below, as to the Effect of Fraud. See Park 329.

[Under the head of want of interest, over-insurance is a ground for claiming returns of premium. Where the over-insurance arises upon a single policy, all the underwriters, whatever may be the date of their subscriptions, must contribute rateably to the return; and this rule is extended to the case where there are several policies of the same date, because a day is punctum temporis. But when an over-insurance results on a plurality of insurances effected of different dates, those underwriters who were originally liable to pay the whole amount of their subscriptions are entitled to retain their premiums, while the underwriters in subsequent insurances must make a rateable return for over-insurance. Fisk v Masterman, 8 Mees. and W. 165.]

⁶ [The rule is thus stated in a leading case:—(1.) Where the risk has not been run, whether its not having been run was owing to the fault, pleasure, or will of the insured, or to any other cause, the premium shall be returned, because a policy of insurance is a contract of indemnity. (2.) If the risk of the contract of indemnity has once commenced, there shall be no apportionment or return of premium afterwards. Per Lord Mansfield in Tyrie v Fletcher, Cowp. 666.]

3. Where an event has happened on which it was stipulated there should be a return ; as sailing with convoy, arriving safe, etc.¹

2. The claim for premiums, when made by the underwriters against the insured, will be met by the claim for loss if incurred. But this will not be a good answer to the broker's claim ; for he has no authority to settle, nor is he under any obligation to pay for loss, so as to make a concursus debiti et crediti.

3. The insured, or his creditors, will not be entitled, while the risk is undetermined, to retain the premiums, or employ them in making a second insurance ;² and action, or a claim in bankruptcy, will be effectual for the premiums, although the loss is not adjusted, and the settlement of it the subject of litigation.³

There may arise a claim, on the bankruptcy of the insured, for repayment of losses settled in ignorance of circumstances which, if disclosed, would have barred the insurer from recovery under the policy. Such a claim will not be sustained, 1. If the loss was settled in the knowledge of the circumstances ; or, 2. If settled by way of transaction or compromise ; or, 3. If the facts were all known, but the law of the case mistaken.

II.—CLAIMS ON THE BANKRUPTCY OF THE UNDERWRITERS.

On the failure of the underwriters, a claim arises to the insured, either as a present creditor for the amount of the loss, if the risk be determined, or as a contingent creditor to be ranked and have a dividend set apart. In England, no claim could be made in bankruptcy where the risk was still undetermined, until 1779, when the assured in a policy for a valuable consideration was suffered to claim, and, after the loss, admitted to prove and draw dividends, in like manner as if the contingency had taken place before bankruptcy.⁴ By the law of Scotland, a creditor under such a policy might at all times claim either as a contingent or as an actual creditor.

The evidence to support the claim will consist, 1. Of the policy ; and, 2. Of the proofs of the interest, of the loss, and of the fulfilment of all the conditions.

1. Requisites of the Policy.

The policy is a written instrument, containing the only legitimate evidence of [603] the contract.⁵ It requires certain observances which must be correctly complied with. The policy is preceded by a SLIP, which is merely a jotting or short memorandum of the terms, to which the underwriters subscribe their initials, with the sums for which they are willing to engage. But that slip cannot be received in evidence to contradict the policy.⁶ It is ³ Ferrier v Sandeman, 29 June 1809, Fac. Coll. 373. Here an action was in dependence for settlement and payment of the loss ; but the Court, in the action for premiums, held that though in practice premiums are not always paid per advance, yet in law it is held that they ought to be so paid ; and a court of law is bound to give action for them.

⁴ 19 Geo. II. c. 32, sec. 2.

⁵ Liddel & Brunton v Kerr & Spence, 17 Dec. 1811, was a very strong case, where a broker having concealed the name of the insured, whereby the policy was annulled (see below, p. 652, note 1), he was found liable in damages to the insured. He was then advised to bring an action against the underwriters, in which he endeavoured to turn the responsibility on them, on the ground of their having seen the original order to insure, bearing the name of the insured, their having on other occasions accepted premiums on a policy equally defective, and so raised a sort of practice as between them and the broker, and thus having homologated the insurance in this case. The Judge-Admiral held the underwriters liable on these grounds. But the Court of Session were unanimous in reversing that judgment, and holding that, as the policy was null, there was no ground of action against the underwriters, directly or indirectly.

See Mills v Albion Co., 1826, 4 S. 575, N. E. 583. [Add. Cont. 6th ed. 493.]

⁶ In Rogers v M'Carthy, 1800, Park 45, Lord Kenyon, in answer to a special jurymen, who stated that in practice they considered themselves as bound by the slip, though they never signed a policy, said, that whatever obligation there might be in honour and good faith, he certainly would not be bound in law ; for, in order to enforce the claims of nothing more than the proposal of terms preliminary to the contract; and if binding in any sense, it binds only provisionally till the subscription be full.

1. STAMP.—The policy must be stamped in terms of law,¹ otherwise no demand can be made under it; besides a penalty of £500 on the person procuring, the person subscribing the policy, and the broker effecting the insurance.

Parole evidence of the policy when lost is not admissible, if it was on unstamped paper, even though it has been destroyed wrongfully, or has fallen accidentally into the hands of the underwriters. Nor can the want be then supplied; for it is one of the risks to which the want of a stamp exposes a contract, that if it should perish before a stamp be affixed, all remedy by action is gone.²

When an instrument requiring a stamp has once been used, it cannot be altered to another purpose without a new stamp. But by the Act 35 Geo. III. c. 63, sec. 13, insurance policies may, without any additional stamp-duty, be altered after having been underwritten, provided, 1. That it be done before notice of the determination of the risk originally insured; 2. That the premium originally exceed the rate of ten shillings per cent. on the sum insured; 3. That the thing insured remain the property of the original insurers; 4. That the term of insurance shall not be prolonged beyond that permitted by the Act; and, 5. That no additional or further sum be insured by means of such alteration.

Under this provision an alteration of the time of sailing has been permitted without a new stamp.³ An alteration of property is not inferred merely from the mark on the goods [604] being altered; and this, where there is substantially no change of property, requires no new stamp;⁴ but an alteration from 'ship and outfit' to 'ship and goods' was held change of subject.⁵ An alteration of the policy by waiving the warranty of seaworthiness is not an alteration.⁶ The correction of an innocent mistake is no alteration.⁷

the assured in a court of justice, he must produce a stamped policy.

In Marsden v Reid, 3 East 572, where one was desirous of showing that another underwriter had subscribed the slip first, although the defender's name appeared first in the policy, Lord Ellenborough and the Court of King's Bench held that the slip, not being stamped, could not be received in evidence to contradict the written contract between the parties.

But Lord Ellenborough held that the instrument not having been restamped, it was rendered void. His opinion was confirmed by the Court on solemn argument. The contract was held to have been altered, and a new contract made, and it was not considered to be within their power, on seeing an objection of nullity to that their real contract, to resume one which had been abandoned. French v Patten, 1 Camp. 73, 9 East 351.

2. NAME OF THE INSURED.—This is required by statute.² By the 28 Geo. III. c. 56 it is enacted, 'That it shall not be lawful for any person or persons to make or effect, or cause to be made or effected, any policy of insurance upon any ship, etc., without first inserting, or causing to be inserted, in such policy or policies of insurance, the name or names, or the usual style and firm of dealing, of one or more of the persons interested in such insurance.' An alternative is then permitted, that 'instead thereof' there shall be inserted the name, etc., 1. Of the consignor; or, 2. Of the consignee; or, 3. Of the person in Britain receiving the order to insure, and effecting the insurance; or, 4. Of the person who shall give the order to the agent immediately employed to negotiate the policy. And 'every policy of insurance made or underwrote contrary to the true intent and meaning of this Act, shall be null and void to all intents and purposes.' The statutes of the 25th and of the 28th of Geo. III. have both in view a remedy for the use of policies blank in the name of the insured. This was at one time a practice very general in Europe; and in each country, as the evil was felt, it was corrected by special ordinances. In England, policies were extremely loose in their form, and generally blank in the name of the assured. The first remedy was in fire insurances, by 14 Geo. III. c. 48. But marine insurances were excepted from the operation of this Act, and continued blank till 1783, when the universal complaints of underwriters led to the statute of 25 Geo. III. c. 44. This statute contains in the preamble a plain statement of the evil; and this preamble is to be taken as the preamble of both Acts: 'Whereas it has been found by experience, that the making or effecting insurances on ships, etc. in blank, and without specifying therein the name or names of any person or persons for whose use and benefit, or on whose account, such insurances are made or effected, hath been in many respects mischievous and productive of great inconveniences.' This statute seems to have been ill digested in many of its provisions, and to have produced so much inconvenience, especially to foreigners, by the minute observances which it required, that the remedy was as bad as the original evil. It required in particular, either, 1. That the party or parties interested should have their names in the policy; and so, unless there was an exact specification of every minute division of interest and right in the ship or goods [605] insured, the claim for a loss was met by formidable or fatal objections; or, 2. It required the name of an agent; but then it must be as agent of the several persons holding the interest, which made the difficulty as great as if the names of the owners had been inserted. It was with a view not to repeal, but to reform the law, without perplexing merchants with the objectionable provisions, that the statute of the 28th of Geo. III. was passed. The original evil of blank policies was not in any shape meant to be re-established or sanctioned; and the enactment was made as strict as ever in this respect. The difference made was this:—It was deemed not to be necessary to have the minute points of interest and ownership settled in the policy, but sufficient if the policy bore the name of one or more of the persons interested, or the name of the consignor or consignee, or of the agent receiving directions to get insurance done, or of him who, being in Britain, should give directions for an insurance. This seemed to meet all cases: no one was any longer in doubt how to fill up that clause in the policy which the Legislature saw wise reasons for ordering to be filled up. Under this statutory provision, confirmed by a clause in the stamp law of 38 Geo. III., it has been held: 1. That the word agent is not necessary in the policy where the insurance is effected by an agent. 2. That a policy effected by a broker, describing himself as agent, is good.³ 3. That the name of the master in the ² 25 Geo. III. c. 44; 28 Geo. III. c. 56; 35 Geo. III. c. 63, sec. 11.

³ These points fixed by the cases quoted by Mr. Justice

Park, p. 21. [See Symers v Glasgow Marine Insurance Co., 1846, 9 D. 168, where, although the party was called agent, yet, as he was truly a vendee in security, the policy was held good.]

policy, as descriptive of the ship, is not sufficient to support the policy, though the master have an interest; his name not being set down as the person insured. Nor is the name of the broker sufficient, where it is merely in the statement of the office at which the policy was signed.¹

3. The name of the SHIP and MASTER is necessary to identify the subject-matter of the policy: for whether it be on ship, or freight, or goods, the risk attaches itself to a particular bottom. A mere mistake of the ship or captain's name will not prove fatal, if the proof of identity be clear.² The parties, however, may agree to insure a more general risk 'by ship or ships,'³ provided the ship be afterwards identified on which the risk attaches. It is fatal to introduce one name instead of another.⁴ But the rule is not so absolute, that a proof of [606] identity and the absence of fraud will not support the contract; the more especially as, in order to avoid such a danger from mistake, all policies have a clause, 'or by whatever other name the said ship is or shall be called.' The name is not a warranty, but merely a mark of identity. It may be observed, then, that the above decision of the Court of Session would now probably be held too strict.⁵

4. SUBJECT.—The subject of the insurance is the essential part, or sine qua non, of the contract; and must be so stated as to leave no room to question the property that is put in risk, whether ship, or freight, or goods. It is not necessary otherwise to describe the goods, than to afford the means of identifying them, and to prevent the risk from being changed upon the underwriter. It is on this part of the policy, and its accompanying memorandum, that questions of average arise; the memorandum declaring generally that the underwriters shall not be liable, first, For any partial loss, on account of corn, fish, salt, fruit, flour, and seed, but only for general average or total loss on those articles; secondly, For any partial loss under five per cent. on sugar, tobacco, hemp, flax, hides, and skins; or, thirdly, For any partial loss under three per cent. on other goods, or on ship or freight, unless such small loss arise from general average or stranding of the ship.⁶

¹ Mar and Dolbey v Spence & Kerr, 27 Feb. and 17 Dec. 1811. Here a broker who engaged to effect an insurance neglected to fill up in the policy the name of the insured. The Judge-Admiral on the above-mentioned statutes annulled the policy. 10 July 1807, Judge Cay's Notes, vol. E, p. 210. In a course of proceeding already stated, p. 649, note 5, the Court of Session was called on to judge of the question, Whether it was not enough to support the policy that the master was the person to be insured, and that his name was in the policy as master, the ship being described as 'the Atlas, Captain Dolbey?' or whether the broker's name was not sufficient, the policy bearing, 'We, the assurers, have subscribed our names and sums assured in Liddel & Brunton's office, Leith,' they being the brokers, and the names being written in by one of themselves? But the Court was clearly of opinion that neither of these expedients was sufficient to save the policy. Lord President Blair said these names are no more a due compliance with the Act than the name of the printer at the foot who prints the form of the policy. The words of the 28 Geo. III. he held to be so clear as to admit of no argument. The name of Captain Dolbey is inserted merely as master. The name of the broker merely indicates the place where the policy was signed. As to the policy, wisdom, and expediency of the Act, he reminded the Court of the words of Lord Mansfield, as fit to be remembered in all questions on the construction of statutes, in Pray v Edie, on the Act of 25 Geo. III.: 'Whatever doubts I may have in my own breast with respect to the policy and expediency of this law, yet as long as it continues in force I am bound to see it executed according to its meaning; and however I may think that this is not a commendable defence in the underwriter, yet that is a matter for his consideration, and not for mine.' 1 Term. Rep. 314. The Court concurred with the Lord President. See above, p. 649, note 5.

5. PLACE AND TIME.—The commencement and termination of the risk are indispensable requisites in a policy. If the policy be for time, the commencement and termination of the time must be distinctly specified. If a blank be left for the place of departure or destination, the policy will be void for uncertainty. Care must be taken that the place of departure be not described in terms so ambiguous as to expose the contract to the same charge of uncertainty; and so a policy to any port or ports must be made certain by the addition of time.¹ But any port within a given description of coast or of sea is sufficient. Thus, a policy to any port in the Mediterranean, or in the Baltic, extends the contemplation of the parties to every risk within the known or commonly understood limits of that description.²

6. PERILS OF THE VOYAGE.—These are enumerated in a clause so anxious as to include all conceivable risks. But there are some losses which are not included within these words, however comprehensive they may seem; namely, such as are imputable to the owners, master, or mariners, rather than to the perils of the sea. Such are, injuries from bad stowage, exposure to wet, theft, embezzlement, etc.³

7. SUBSCRIPTION.—The policy must be subscribed or underwritten with the names of the several insurers. It is not required to be subscribed according to the formalities of the statutes relative to the subscription of deeds in Scotland; but it is effectual signed with the name simply, accompanied by the addition of the sum for which the underwriter is to be liable. No witnesses are required. Very frequently policies are signed by procurators, acting either under express or tacit delegation. Doubts may be raised concerning the power of the procurator, either by denying his authority entirely, or by alleging a [607] limitation of his powers to particular acts or conditions. It is held in a claim under this, as under other mercantile contracts, that a power of procuration may be effectually conferred by sufferance, as where the same person has subscribed other policies as procurator for the bankrupt, on which he has received premiums, or under which he has settled losses.⁴ It is also held, that where a special limitation in the power is alleged, the onus probandi lies on the person for whom the policy is underwritten.⁵

No proof by parole evidence will alter or control the policy, unless it establish a usage which in mercantile affairs, and when not inconsistent with law, controls the construction of all policies. In proving such usage, opinion is not sufficient. It is from a judge only, and in matter of law, that opinion can be received by a jury; other persons must speak only to facts.⁶

2. Proof of the Interest and Loss.

1. INTEREST.—In claiming for the loss, the claimant is bound to prove his interest. This will be prima facie presumed; and where denied, is to be established—as to the vessel, by the registry; as to the cargo, by bills of lading, or by invoices and correspondence.⁷

⁷ Marshall 718; Park 608, 609; Add. Cont. 495. [See Alston v Campbell & Co., 1779, 2 Pat. 492, as to the interest of a mortgagee. By 31 and 32 Vict. c. 86, policies of marine insurance are made assignable by endorsement in the form given by a schedule to the Act; and the assignee is authorized to sue in his own name, subject to all defences maintainable against the cedent. As a general rule, the interest which an underwriter acquires in the safety of the subject insured is not an interest entitling him to re-insure. Re-assurance, however, is permitted by statute in case of the insolvency, bankruptcy, or death of the insurer. The nature of the interest must be stated in the policy, and the value insured

If the policy is for a mere wager without interest, nothing can be recovered under it. But the insurance of profit on a fishing adventure is not such a policy.¹ Neither is the insurance of future freight objectionable, provided the voyage has actually begun before the loss.

2. LOSSES.—The loss is either TOTAL or PARTIAL. The former consists not solely in the entire destruction of the subject insured, but in such damage as to render it of little or no value to the owner; or to reduce the value to less than the freight; or to frustrate the adventure, the securing of which was the object of the insurance. The latter is a loss or damage not amounting to a total loss.

1. Claims for a TOTAL LOSS must be accompanied by ABANDONMENT, where there is anything remaining actually extant or in hope. Without entering into the speculative question whether the practice of abandonment be quite consistent with the principles of [608] the contract of indemnity by insurance, or the expediency of a practice which is plainly liable to great abuses, the general doctrine as to the description of loss is, that the assured may abandon whenever, by one of the perils insured against, the voyage is lost, or not worth pursuing, or where the object of the adventure is frustrated, or where the subject insured is left in a state which makes it of little value to the owner,—as goods reduced to less worth than the freight, or subjects reduced under half of their value, or so as to require an expense to reinstate them which the insurer will not undertake. But he is not entitled to harass the underwriters, by giving notice to abandon in a case which, in its own nature, is only a partial loss, so as to turn it into a total loss.²

The most important rules relative to abandonment are these:—

1. CAPTURE is prima facie a total loss entitling the insured to abandon. Even arrest of princes, or mere embargo, are also held prima facie to be total losses; the owners from the moment of capture, arrest, or detention, losing their power over the ship and cargo. The owner therefore may instantly abandon, though he is not bound to do so.³

2. If the offer to abandon is accepted, the matter is concluded, the loss total, the abandonment absolute and complete.⁴

3. If the captured or arrested ship or cargo be restored or recaptured between the offer to abandon and the acceptance or action, it has been determined in England that an aban-must not exceed in amount the sum previously insured. 19 Geo. II. c. 37, sec. 4; Sm. Merc. Law, 7th ed. 342.]

The Court of Session, when the case first came before them, thought it so doubtful as to deserve very deliberate consideration, and passed the bill of suspension. On the discussion of the case they unanimously held the insurance effectual.

The opinion of Mr. Bearcroft respecting the English law upon the question was laid before the Court. He said: 'It is perfectly clear to me that this is not a wagering policy within the meaning of the statute, but insurance of profit on a fishing adventure; in order to take the chance of which, the insured has been necessarily put to great expenses in the outfit of the vessel, purchasing proper tackle for whale-fishing, manning, etc. As for the argument on the ground of public policy, I confess I do not feel it. To entitle the adventurer to the bounty, he must comply with the requisition of the statute giving it, as to fitting out, manning the vessel, etc.; and notwithstanding any such insurance as is at all likely to be entered into, it will always be the interest of the insured to get as many fish as he can. The underwriters know the bounties given by law, and it cannot be probable that they will underwrite a policy which will tempt the insured to neglect the adventure in order to come upon them; and of this they have as good means to judge as the insured themselves.

'Upon the whole, I am of opinion that this contract of insurance is legal, and the insured entitled to recover against the underwriters.'

donment is only notice of an election, on the supposition of a fact; that it will depend on the truth of that fact whether it is to continue effectual; and that the underwriters are entitled to settle as for an average loss only.¹ In Scotland a case precisely of the same kind occurred, with this difference, that the underwriters accepted the offer of abandonment. On the general question, a view opposite to that which was finally adopted in the above case was taken, and the insured were held entitled to claim the total loss from the underwriters, they taking the benefit of the recapture.² This case, as viewed in Scotland, presented the same question which had been decided by the Court of King's Bench; and the same opinion which seems first to have occurred to Lord Ellenborough at the trial, though afterwards abandoned, is fully and ably delivered by Lord President Blair as the principle on which the case was decided by the Court of Session. When the cause came into the House of Lords, the true point of this case was ascertained to be such as to leave that general question untouched; namely, the effect of the accepted offer of abandonment. In the course of the discussion of the cause, Lord Chancellor Eldon expressed great doubt on the [609] general doctrine, on which the judgment of the Court of King's Bench and of the Court of Session had so entirely differed.³ But the question has been again carefully reconsidered in England, with the benefit of those doubts, and the same judgment has been given which has been already stated.⁴

Afterwards it was argued accordingly on a special case in King's Bench, when all the judges held the abandonment not to be conclusive.

See also Falkner v Ritchie, 1814, 2 Maule and Sel. 290. [Sm. Merc. L. 7th ed. 390.]

³ In the House of Lords, Lord Chancellor Eldon, after stating the case, with the import of the judgment in England, said: 'On a subject of this importance it was impossible to leave the law in such a state, that what was a good decision in the one country should be bad in the other, where the decisions on this question of mercantile law ought in both countries to be the same; and it was difficult to say that the same principle might not comprehend and determine the whole of the cases in which there existed these minute shades of difference. In deciding this case, their Lordships might affect the decisions of their own courts, and it was therefore proper that the case should be argued in the presence of the judges; and then a question might be put which would settle the principle that would decide all the cases that might occur with the variety of facts to which he had alluded.' After the argument appointed upon this suggestion, the Chancellor said, 'that he had been induced to propose the adoption of this course, principally from having regard to a case (Bainbridge v Neilson, 10 East 329) decided in the Court of King's Bench, and another case mentioned at the bar (Falkner v Ritchie), by which the doctrine in the case of Bainbridge v Neilson, as to the effect of the abandonment, was confirmed.

'Since the time when this case was last mentioned to their Lordships, he had had an opportunity of considering it with great attention, of consulting with his noble friend near him (Lord Redesdale), and of discussing the question with different persons whose judgment was entitled to the greatest respect; and the conclusion to which he had come was this, that without intimating in the least what, if the cases of Bainbridge v Neilson and Falkner v Ritchie had come before their Lordships, would be the judgment of the House of Lords, and protesting against being considered as giving any opinion agreeing or not agreeing with these decisions, it was clear that the present case was out of the principle of these cases. Here it was not made out that the underwriters had any right whatever to refuse to settle as for a total loss: they could not be allowed to say that the loss was not total, after they had admitted that it was, and acquiesced in the abandonment as for a total loss. It was therefore on the effect of the transactions in this particular case, without reference to others, that he thought the decision of the Court of Session right.' Lord Redesdale: 'I concur.' Judgment affirmed.

4. If in consequence of the capture, detention, or arrest, the interest which it is the object of the insurance to protect perish, it is a total loss. Where, in the case of a mercantile adventure, the goods insured are by the detention kept from market, and the voyage is lost, this is sufficient to justify abandonment;¹ but it is more difficult to find what shall be total loss in the case of a ship insured. The loss of the voyage may be the loss of the freight, and is therefore total on a policy for freight. But if the vessel is restored, it is not a total loss.²

5. But the circumstances in which a ship may be placed abroad, in consequence of perils insured against, may be such that it may be necessary to dispose of it. In such case, the master has a power to act for the benefit of all concerned; and the assured may abandon, and claim as for a total loss. This power on the part of the master, however, must be exercised under very severe restraint; and it is of great importance to prevent a partial from being converted into a total loss by the unnecessary abandonment of the voyage. Lord Mansfield at one time laid down the rule too broadly in favour of the master's discretion.³ It has been considerably narrowed since his time;⁴ and it is now requisite to show [610] a case of absolute necessity in order to justify such a proceeding.⁵

6. SHIPWRECK is generally a total loss; and where only the wreck remains, but the ship is gone, it is a case for settling on that footing. But stranding merely is not a total loss, if the vessel can be got off and sent forward on her voyage. Where a ship is insured with one set of underwriters and the freight with another, it has been held a question of great difficulty, in case of an abandonment, what shall be the effect of it as between these several sets of underwriters, if the ship should in the end earn her freight? whether the abandonment of the ship to the underwriters on the ship, carries the freight? or whether the underwriter on the freight has, by virtue of the abandonment to him, right to the freight? This was long a subject of doubt and debate; and Mr. Justice Park, after stating the result of several cases, concludes with saying, that the question must still be considered as open, 'although, as far as opinions may be collected from observations thrown out in the course of argument, the inclination of the Court seems to be in favour of the underwriters on ships.'⁶ A case fit for the trial of the question having occurred in the Court of King's Bench, Lord Ellenborough, Chief Justice, and the present Lord Chief Justice Abbot, and Mr. Justice Holroyd, held that the abandonment of the ship was equivalent to a sale of it, and the right to freight an incident to the ship; and so that the underwriters on the ship are, on abandonment, entitled to recover the freight, when it happens to be earned, against the pretensions of the underwriters on the freight. Mr. Justice Bayley dissented from this opinion, and held that the abandonment of the ship, from the nature of the subject-matter, implies a virtual exception of the freight, where there is a separate insurance and separate abandonment of the freight.⁷

principle of that and of the other decisions is a general one, and it is this: I have a right of action for non-payment of money; the party pays me before action is brought; that takes away my right of action.'

The ship was captured by an American privateer, and thereupon notice of abandonment was given to both sets of underwriters, of the ship and of the freight. Afterwards the vessel was recaptured by a ship of war and brought to London, and by sentence of the Court of Admiralty was, with the cargo, restored on payment of salvage. The ship arrived at Liverpool and delivered her cargo, and earned her freight. The ship was, by agreement with the underwriters on the ship, sold; and Davidson was appointed to receive the proceeds and also the freight for the benefit of all having inter-

7. DEFEAT OF VOYAGE.—It is only in the case of goods or freight insured that total loss can properly be said to arise from the defeating of the object of the voyage. It is now scarcely to be admitted as a doctrine applicable to the case of a ship insured. And a voyage is not defeated by mere retardation, unless the object of the voyage, the purpose of the insurance, be utterly disappointed. Thus, a ship carrying to Quebec a cargo, not of perishable commodities or such as delay would injure, but of copper and iron, having been obliged by disrepair and injury to go into a port in Ireland, where no other means of forwarding the goods that season was to be had, and the delay lost the voyage for the season, it was questioned whether this amounted to a total loss, so as to give the right to abandon. It was held not to be such a loss, on the ground that mere delay and retardation is not a good cause of abandonment.¹ This doctrine was confirmed in a case where, the cargo not being of a perishable nature, but fairly warehoused in an undamaged state, [611] and there being ample means of forwarding it for next season, this was held a partial and not a total loss to authorize abandonment.²

As to the time at which notice is to be given of abandonment, it will be remembered that this is an act which is to throw on the underwriter the whole risk; and that justice therefore requires that he should be apprised as early as possible, in order to take those measures which may be proper for the right administration of his property; while the insured shall not, by delay and hesitation, give himself the chance of benefit, with the power in his hand of throwing the loss on the underwriter. Within the description of a reasonable time for notice, is included the opportunity of fully understanding the condition in which the goods are.³ But the insured has no right to wait for information as to the state of the markets; nor is he to delay the communication till the event of a final survey, when the facts are such as to show manifestly all that is necessary to determine the election.⁴

II. PARTIAL LOSS is, in the language of underwriters, also called PARTICULAR AVERAGE;

rest. Davidson accordingly paid the proceeds of sale to the underwriters on the ship, who paid the loss to the insured. The underwriters on the freight, and those on the ship, claimed the freight from Davidson as holding it for their interest. The judgment was for the underwriters on the ship. This judgment was affirmed in Exchequer Chamber. 2 Brod. and Bing. 379.

This question has not yet occurred to be tried in Scotland; but the judgment in the above case of Robertson, Forsyth, & Co., goes far to determine it in the same way in which it has been adjudged in England.

[The question is now determined by a judgment of the House of Lords in favour of the underwriters on the ship. Stewart v Greenock Marine Insurance Co., 1 Macq. 328. The ship-owners, by this judgment, having been compelled to surrender the freight received by them from the consignees of the cargo, instituted an action against the insurers of freight, alleging that, as the underwriters on ship had been found entitled to the freight, it must be considered as lost to the assured, and consequently recoverable under the policy. It was held, however, by the House of Lords, reversing the decision of the Court, that the action was not maintainable. Scottish Marine Insurance Co. v Turner, 1 Macq. 334; Tudor, Merc. Ca. 187; Sm. Merc. Law, 389.

But where the same person is owner of the ship and cargo, no freight will, upon abandonment, pass to the underwriters on ship (Miller v Woodfall, 8 El. and Bl. 493), because at the time of the casualty there is no freight actually pending. As between the owner and the underwriter, it was held to be immaterial that, under the designation of freight, he had insured with other underwriters the increased value of his goods by reason of their being carried to a more favourable market. Another exception to the rule of Stewart's case is admitted, where the freight is earned by a vessel into which the cargo has been transhipped in consequence of the casualty. Hickie v Rodocanachi, 4 H. and N. 455.]

² Hunt v The Royal Exchange Assurance, 1816, 5 Maule and Selwyn 47. This was an insurance on a cargo of pork and flour for Newfoundland. The loading was taken in at Waterford, and convoy joined at Cork; and damage having been suffered at sea too great to proceed, the ship put back to Cork on 13th November. The ship, on survey, was found not worth repairing, and the hull and materials were sold; and no opportunity of transporting the goods being to be had before spring, the pork and flour were landed and warehoused. On 18th December, the insured, residing at Waterford, wrote to the broker to give notice of abandonment, which was done 22d December. There were two questions: 1. Whether this was not a partial loss only, in which the insured were to act as if not insured, and claim for the loss? and, 2. Whether, at all events, the notice was not too late? On both points the Court of King's Bench adjudged the case for the underwriters. [Sm. Merc. Law, 7th ed. 387.]

though it be, in fact, not an average at all, but a loss which must be borne undivided by that part of the concern on which it lights. The expression Particular Average seems to have arisen among underwriters rather than among lawyers; and to owe its origin rather to the operation of adjusting the loss, than to the effect of it as interesting any one but the owner of the article injured. In this operation of adjustment much practical difficulty occurs; and after a few words as to the description of partial loss, it may not be out of place to discuss the principles on which both partial losses and total are settled and adjusted.

Under the description of partial loss are to be included: 1. Damage to the ship by stranding, or striking on a rock or other obstruction. 2. Damage by collision with other ships where it is accidental. Where occasioned by negligence, it is not a peril of the sea, to be indemnified as partial loss.¹ But unless there be proof of such negligence, the insurer is liable, having right, of course, on paying the loss, to sue the party truly liable.² 3. Damage to boat, masts, sails, rigging, etc. by force of the winds or sea. Although this is often held to be the tear and wear of the voyage, the custom is to consider it as a partial loss on the ship; for the underwriters are liable if it exceed three per cent., either alone, or taken along with other damage.³ 4. Loss by lightning or accidental fire, which is a loss that cannot be the subject of a claim of indemnification against the shipowners.⁴ 5. Losses incurred while the ship is running before the wind, or lying to the sea, are losses by perils of the sea, be-[612] cause there is at such times no command over the ship. 6. Plunder or damage during capture. 7. Damage to a merchant ship by defending her against enemies. This seems to be a partial loss, whether the ship escape, or be captured and afterwards retaken.⁵ 8. Damage occasioned by a press of sail to escape an enemy or a lee-shore. But, 9. The repair of a leak sprung at sea is not partial loss demandable against the insurers. The presumption is, either that this is the working and straining of the ship, which is the tear and wear of the voyage, or an inherent vice. The onus probandi is laid on the insured, to show it to be the direct effect of accident. 10. It has been held that if a ship be bilged by being laid on the shore within the tide-way to repair, it is not a loss by perils of the sea.⁶ But where a ship in the course of her voyage is in a dry harbour, and there suffers damage by peril within the policy, the underwriters are liable.⁷

The PROOFS OF LOSS in matters of insurance are generally very unsatisfactory. Perhaps no rule can be laid down for all cases. But it may generally be observed:—

1. The underwriters are entitled to insist on the best proof which circumstances admit.⁸
2. The log-book, and protests taken on occasion of the loss, are documents expected to be furnished to the underwriters as supplying the information necessary for directing their inquiries. But they are not proofs on which the loss can be rested, unless they become so by the inevitable loss of other evidence. They may be used to contradict the evidence of

vol. E, p. 451. A vessel was insured for £1000 on hull and materials during six months from 1st March to 31st August 1807. Having struck on a rock, she was obliged to go into Christiansand to be repaired. While there, the king of Denmark declared war against Great Britain. This was on 16th August, about a fortnight before the expiration of the insurance. There were several points in the case, but one in particular turned on the defence, that no evidence was produced of the ship having been seized before 31st August, when the policy expired. The Judge-Admiral held the notorious fact of war having been declared, and the presumption that the order contained in that declaration, to seize all British ships, was obeyed, as good evidence of the seizure.

The case having been brought under review of the Court of Session, the judges affirmed the Admiral's judgment, on the ground that the best evidence had been produced which circumstances admitted. 29 June 1809, 15 Fac. Coll. 373.

the master or mate, whose statements they are. The log-book is an essential document to be produced to the underwriters, as a check on the proceedings in the voyage,¹ unless there be evidence of its loss. A protest is not evidence while the master who made it is alive, but may be read to contradict his testimony.² It may also be useful in so far as bearing to be verified by the log-book shown to the judge or notary; it may supply the loss of the log-book.

3. The master, officers, and crew, are good evidence where they have no interest, and are not parties in the cause.³

4. In Scotland the former practice was too loose,—to receive surveys, sentences of condemnation, etc. abroad, properly authenticated; but if challenged, they must now be confirmed and made evidence.

Digression concerning Valuations and the Adjustment of Losses.

The adjustment of losses is perhaps not strictly within the province of a work [613] which professes to discuss only the rules of law. But the information on maritime and mercantile subjects is scanty in Scotland; and it may be useful, in a digest of practical jurisprudence relative to those matters, to give a few of the fundamental maxims by which adjustments are ruled.

Average losses have already been treated of under the contract of Affreightment; and the rules are not different where the underwriter is concerned. But a few points relative to the adjustment of the two descriptions of loss not coming under general average, viz. total and partial losses, may here be considered.

I. ADJUSTMENT OF TOTAL LOSS.—A TOTAL LOSS may happen either under what is called a valued or under an open policy.

1. VALUED POLICY.—In a valued policy, the value of the subject insured is by agreement of the parties stated by anticipation. This is equal to an admission by the underwriters of the amount put in hazard; which, unless challengeable as fraudulent, or exceptionable as a wager, will be held conclusive in the case of a total loss. This proceeds on the principle that, as in the ordinary case, the loss is to be adjusted by the cost on board, and the premium and commission, excluding the mercantile profit which is the object of the expedition, but which is still to be regarded as truly a loss; it is not inequitable, nor to be regarded as a wager policy, that the insured include such profit in the valuation, paying for it an adequate premium. 1. Fraud in the valuation will vitiate the policy, so as to prevent the insured from recovering under it even the actual loss.⁴ 2. To take the case out of the Act respecting wager policies (19 Geo. II. c. 37), it is enough to prove some interest,⁵ and the inquiry will then proceed into the amount of the loss. 3. If the value has been erroneously but honestly stated, it is said that it may be corrected on evidence by the underwriters, but that slight differences will be disregarded.⁶ But the cases quoted below deserve to be attended to before adopting this conclusion, as tending

² Senat v Porter, 7 Term. Rep. 158. See Thomson v Bisset, 3 Murr. 297.

³ Thomson v Bisset, in Jury Court, 3 Murr. 298.

worth £5000. The ship was run away with and carried to the West Indies, where the cargo was disposed of by one whom the insured had sent as supercargo. The plea urged for the plaintiffs was, that there being some goods on board belonging to them, it was a case of short interest. The jury, directed by Lord Chief Justice Mansfield, nonsuited the plaintiff on the ground that, if the intention from the beginning was to cheat the underwriters, the fraud vitiated the contract. to show, that where there is neither fraud, nor wager without interest, the value expressed in the policy is to be recovered in a case of total loss, and not merely a sum equal to the loss.¹

[614] 2. OPEN POLICY.—Where a total loss happens under an open policy, proof must be given by the insured of the amount of the loss. The general rules are: 1. That the ship is to be valued at what she is worth at the port where the voyage commenced, including her stores, outfit, and money advanced to the seamen, together with the premium of insurance.² If the charges of recovery in case of loss are to be added, it must be declared in the policy. The evidence of such value, of course, must vary with the circumstances of each case; but the bills of the cost and of repairs at the time the insurance was made, with those for the furnishings, etc., are the most natural elements in adjusting the value. 2. The total loss on freight is the amount of the interest insured by the policy, in so far as still on board at the time of the loss; and if so stipulated, the charges also of recovery. 3. Total loss on the cargo is to be adjusted at the invoice price, with the addition of all charges, and the premium of insurance, with the broker's commission, and (if inserted in the policy) the charge of recovery in case of loss. This is a matter which has been much disputed;³ but the rule as now laid down is settled in Great Britain.⁴

II. ADJUSTMENT OF PARTIAL LOSS.—PARTIAL LOSSES on ships or on goods present two questions for settlement: 1. Whether they are properly losses which the underwriters are to bear? and, 2. How they are to be adjusted? On goods, the loss arising from internal decay, and the condition of the goods themselves, fall on the underwriters. On the ship, those losses which arise necessarily in the ordinary use of the articles, the wear and tear of the voyage, are not to be repaired by the underwriter.

1. SHIP.—In adjusting a particular average, as it is called, or partial loss on the ship, it is usual to deduct one-third from the new materials and labour, unless the ship or the materials injured were perfectly new.⁵

¹ 1. M'Nair v Coulter, 13 Feb. 1772, 2 Pat. 297. M'Nair insured a ship and cargo from Virginia to Clyde, 'valued at £1000, without further account.' The ship was lost off Bermuda. It afterwards appeared that the information on which the insurance was made was false, the value being not more than a half. The insurance had been ordered by M'Nair's son, who was tried as having wilfully sunk the ship. He was acquitted, but found guilty of having sent fraudulent advice with a view to insurance. There were two questions: 1. Whether this was not to be held as a wager policy? This was decided in the negative by the House of Lords, there being a real interest. 2. Whether, there being an over-insurance, the underwriters were liable for more than the real value? On this question the Court of Session held 'the insured not entitled to recover from the underwriters the £1000 specified in the policy, but only a sum equal to the damage he sustained by the loss of the ship.' But in the House of Lords this judgment was reversed; and it was adjudged 'that the appellant (the insured) is entitled to recover from the respondents (the underwriters) the sums by them severally underwritten, and interest thereof from the date of the decree of the Admiralty Court, with a discount of two per cent. in terms of the policy, and of £23, 7s. as the acknowledged value of what was recovered of the wreck.' Lords' Journals, vol. xxxiii. p. 515.

2. Wilson v Wordie, 1783, M. 7107. Wilson and others insured a prize which had been captured by their privateer, and which, judging from the information received, they valued at £20,000, including 20,700 dollars in specie. The prize was retaken, but not before 4200 dollars had been landed, which was nearly all that was found on board. In Admiralty, and afterwards in the Court of Session, the underwriters pleaded, 1. Concealment or misrepresentation sufficient to annul; 2. Wager, or at least the necessity of abatement to the true value. The Court of Session 'found the underwriters liable in terms of the policy of insurance subscribed by them.'

Millar, in his Elements of Insurance, 261, says that 'very eminent English counsel having been consulted upon the case, they advised the underwriters to acquiesce in the judgment of the Court of Session.' [See Smith v Fleming & Co., 1849, 12 D. 138, where it was held incompetent under a valued policy to go into any inquiry as to the actual value, there being no allegation of fraud.]

⁵ [The rule, as usually stated, is that the underwriter is not entitled to a deduction in respect of the addition made to the value of the ship by the use of new materials, if the loss happens on a first voyage. Fenwick v Robinson, 3 C. and P. 324, per Lord Tenterden. As to what is to be considered a first voyage, see also Pirie v Steele, 8 C. and P. 200, and case of Thompson v Hunter there cited. See Add. Cont. 6th ed. 534.]

2. CARGO.—In adjusting loss on goods there are two methods followed: One is, to take the invoice price, with premium, etc., and deduct the nett proceeds of sale of the damaged goods; another, to compare the amount of sales of the damaged goods with a pro forma account of sales of the same articles, if the cargo had arrived in a sound state.¹ 1. The former of these modes of adjustment is technically called a salvage loss, from some supposed analogy to the sort of loss which, but for exertions made to save the goods, would have been total. The goods saved are called salvage; the difference between their amount, after deducting charges and the original value, is called salvage loss. In this sort of adjustment, the principle of a case of abandonment prevails; the goods being sold on account of the underwriters, the charges being borne by them, and the amount of the sales diminishing the total loss which would otherwise be payable by the underwriters. This is the proper mode [615] of adjustment, where there is a necessity for selling the goods short of the port of destination; for it is not possible to refer to the market of the port of delivery at which the goods have not arrived. 2. Where the goods arrive at their port, the other mode of adjustment, by a comparison of the market price of the sound merchandise with the market price of the damaged, is the only just and proper method to be followed, and it appears to be now universally adopted. The problem is, to ascertain what is to be paid on the goods damaged, in order to indemnify the insured, as upon those damaged goods, for the loss which he has sustained; or for the deterioration which these goods have suffered below the value in the policy, or the invoice price and charges? And the mode proposed furnishes a criterion by which the amount of the deterioration on the damaged goods may be ascertained, without involving the underwriter in the effects of a rising or falling market. The merchant, by the use of this criterion, it has been said, makes the market prices of the sound and damaged commodity serve as the scales in which to weigh the depreciation.² On this question these points have been judicially fixed: First, That the underwriter is not to be subjected to the fluctuation of the market. Secondly, That the loss to be indemnified is that which arises from deterioration of the commodity by sea damage. Thirdly, That the underwriter is not responsible for any loss which may be the consequence of the duties or charges to be paid after the goods have arrived at their place of destination. Fourthly, That as in a total loss the underwriter pays the whole prime cost, with charges on the whole sum in the valued policy; so, if the thing be only a half, or third, or fourth worse by the injury, he pays a half, third, or fourth of the value in the policy; or, in an open policy, of the prime cost. And, Fifthly, That to ascertain this proportion of the prime cost or valuation which is to be paid, it is only necessary to ascertain in what degree the damaged goods are worse than the sound, in consequence of the injury. And this is best done by finding the difference between the gross proceeds and the nett proceeds; or the difference of the price of the sound goods at the port of delivery, as paid by the buyer or consumer, compared with the price to be paid by the buyer or consumer for the damaged goods. This difference gives the ratio or proportion of the prime cost or value in the policy, which is to be made good to the insured.³ This seems to afford a standard of adjustment which will give the same

¹ Stevens' Essay 73. [In the adjustment of partial loss on freight, where the sum insured or the valuation on the policy is less than the value of the interest at risk, the underwriter pays the same proportional part of the loss that the sum insured, or the valuation in the policy, is of the value of the freight: if the sum insured, or the valuation in the policy, equals the value of the interest, then he pays the whole loss (2 Arn. Mar. Ins. 3d ed. 848). Where only part of the full cargo included in the valuation is on board or contracted for at the time of the loss, the underwriter will only be liable as for a partial loss upon the basis of the valuation. Forbes v Aspinall, 13 East 323; Tobin v Harford, 14 C. B. N. S. 528.]

³ These points are fixed by judgments pronounced in England, which deserve to be minutely studied:—

1. Lewis v Rucker, 2 Burr. 1170, in which it was first settled by Lord Mansfield and a special jury, and confirmed by the Court, that the ratio or proportion of loss was to be taken from the comparison of the market price of sound and damaged goods at the port of delivery.

2. Johnson v Sheddon, 2 East 581 (which is commonly called at Lloyd's the Brimstone cause), where a judgment of Mr. Justice Lawrence, in delivering the opinion of the Court, fixes the rule that the gross and not the nett pro-result, whether the markets rise or fall, and whether the charges are heavy or light; and it answers every purpose required, since the object is, not to afford a mercantile indemnity, but indemnity only to the extent of the invoice price and charges.

There are two other questions which deserve attention:—

1. When part of a package is damaged, is the whole package to be sold together, or the sound and the damaged parts to be separated? It seems a safe ground for holding that the goods ought to be separated in the sale, so that each may draw its value, that although there may, on the sound goods, be a consequential loss by the breaking of the assortment, it is not for such losses, but only for the direct or actual damage, that the insurer is liable.

[616] 2. How is a valued policy to be dealt with in case of partial loss? A valuation, it will be recollected, is not merely of the prime cost, but also of the mercantile or expected profits. When this is fixed by the price, yard, pound, etc., the matter is easily arranged; but when valued in the lump, or at so much per bale, chest, etc., there is considerable difficulty. Mr. Justice Park says that the value in the policy can be no guide where the loss is partial,¹ but this has not been adopted; nor has it been held as law, that a valued policy is, in case of partial loss, to be considered as open.² In the case of a valued policy, the valuation in the policy is the agreed standard of value by which the indemnity sought is to be ascertained, the ratio being found by a comparison of the prices of sound and of damaged goods. In the case of an open policy, the invoice price at the loading port, with premiums of insurance and commission, is the standard.³

3. Defences against the Claim of the Insured.

Besides the defences arising from any error or illegality in the policy, there are three classes of defences which will be found to comprehend many essential points of insurance law. These are, 1. Breach of warranty; 2. Concealment or misrepresentation on the part of the insured; and, 3. Deviation from the course of the voyage insured, or alteration of the voyage.

I. BREACH OF WARRANTY.—A warranty is an absolute condition, or, as the English lawyers call it, a condition precedent; and if not true, or not complied with, the insurance is ineffectual. It differs from a representation in this, that the breach of truth in a representation is fatal or otherwise to the insurance, as it happens to be material or immaterial to the risk undertaken. This distinction was pointedly laid down by Lord Chancellor Eldon in the House of Lords.⁴

ceeds are to be taken as the basis of calculation in this question.

[In the adjustment of loss under an open policy on freight, it is also held, in deference to established usage, that the calculation is to be made on the gross amount of the freight. Palmer v Blackburn, 1 Bing. 61.]

valued differently, the assured, if he have recovered upon the smaller valued policy, may, in an action upon another policy, recover the difference (but no more) between the amount received and the value in that policy. Bruce v Jones, 1 H. and C. 769; and see Irving v Richardson, 1 M. and Rob. 153.]

⁴ M'Morran & Co. v The Newcastle Fire Insurance Co., 1815, 3 Dow 255. The question arose in Scotland, on a policy of fire insurance of a cotton mill in the county of Lanark. The insurance was made with the Newcastle Fire Insurance Co. The mill was burnt; and in an action against the insurers, the question was, Whether this mill, which was warranted as in the first class of risks, was not truly of the second class? The Lord Chancellor said: 'If the mill was warranted as of the first class, and was really of the second class, the judgment of the Court of Session was erroneous. For it is a first principle in the law of insurance, on all occasions, that where a representation is material, it must be complied with; if immaterial, that immateriality may be inquired into and

There are not in the Scottish books many important illustrations of the strictness with which warranties are required to be complied with. The rule is held as fixed, and reference may be made to the English books for the doctrine.¹

There are several warranties which thus operate as absolute conditions, of which some are express, some implied. Of the EXPRESS, the conditions are such as these: That the ship is to sail on a particular day;² that she was safe on a particular day; that she is [617] to proceed with convoy; that she is neutral property; and other such conditions as may either be matter of representation, or such as, in order to put a stop to all suspicion of concealment, the insured may agree to make a condition of the contract. The IMPLIED warranties are such as necessarily result from the nature of the contract: as, That the ship is seaworthy; that she shall be navigated with ordinary skill and care; that the voyage is lawful, and so forth.³

The most important warranty, and one of the chief points in the law of insurance, is SEAWORTHINESS.⁴ From the absolute nature of this condition of the insurance, there is no occasion to disclose any previous accident or disrepair as a part of the representation necessary to an effectual insurance; and it has been a great object with courts of law, both for the benefit of commerce and with a view to the preservation of human life, to enforce the necessity of having the ship seaworthy when she sails on her voyage.

In treating of affreightment, something has already been said of seaworthiness, and of the difference between this question in a contract of insurance and in a charter-party. As applicable to insurance, it may be laid down,—

1. That in this, as in all warranties, it signifies nothing whether the insured was himself aware of the ship's condition or not. No ignorance or innocence on the part of the insured will be an answer to the fact that the ship was unfit for the voyage.

2. That, as a part of the same doctrine, the opinion of the carpenters who repair a vessel, however much it may raise or strengthen the presumption that the ship is seaworthy, is not conclusive of the fact of seaworthiness.⁵

shown; but that if there is a warranty, it is part of the contract that the matter is such as it is represented to be. Therefore the materiality or immateriality signifies nothing. The only question is as to the mere fact.' [See De Hahn v Hartley, 1 T. R. 43; Ollive v Booker, 1 Ex. 423.]

¹ The following Scottish cases, however, may be looked into:—

1. Dunmore & Co. v Allan, 1786, M. 7101, where a ship, warranted to sail with convoy, did not sail till several days after, but overtook the convoy, and was a few weeks afterwards separated in a gale and taken. The policy was held bad for non-compliance.

2. Monteith v Cross, 1788, M. 7105, where a ship, insured with a warranty to sail with convoy, instead of proceeding to the rendezvous, remained in a harbour at the distance of several miles, but within signal distance. The fleet sailed, and this ship was kept in harbour by a calm, but joined the fleet three days after, and continued with it for a month, when she was separated in a storm and captured. In an action for the loss, the underwriters were freed on account of non-compliance with the warranty. [See Add. Cont. 6th ed. 498.]

² Denniston & Co. v Lillie, 22 May 1817; affirmed in House of Lords, 5 April 1821, 1 Sh. App. Ca. 22.

⁴ [The discussion in the text must be taken to be confined in its application to voyage-policies. With respect to time-policies, it has been decided by the House of Lords that where a time-policy is effected on a vessel then abroad, there is no implied condition whatever as to seaworthiness. Gibson v Small, 4 H. L. Ca. 353. It is to be taken as settled (per Lord Campbell, ibid. 422) that there is no general exception to this rule in case of a time insurance being effected on a ship about to sail on a voyage; 'but,' said his Lordship, 'I have hesitated more upon the question whether, when a time-policy is effected upon an outward-bound ship lying in a British port where the owner resides, a condition of seaworthiness is to be implied.' Lord Campbell's opinion, however, was against admitting even this exception to a rule which is founded on strong reasons of expediency. It would seem, notwithstanding, that if a ship insured in a time-policy is knowingly sent to sea by the assured in an unseaworthy state, and that his fault in so doing has contributed to the loss of the ship, the assured is not entitled to recover from the underwriters. Thompson v Hopper, El. B. and El. 1054, per Chief Justice Cockburn.]

⁵ Seougal & Co. v Douglas, 29 May 1812. The North Star was an old Dutch prize, employed as a whale-ship, and bought for £1200, including £500 of fishing materials. She was repaired at Leith for a voyage to America: she was not stripped nor opened, so as to enable the carpenters to judge of her internal state; but having received repairs to the amount of £280, she, about a fortnight after sailing, encountered a gale and was obliged to go into Greenock. On a

3. That the presumption, prima facie, is for seaworthiness. But this will be removed when a ship goes down, or becomes innavigable after sailing, without any apparent or adequate cause, especially if this happens soon after leaving the port. The onus probandi in such a case is turned against the insured,¹ who are thus held bound to show such a case as to account for the injury, independently of any unfitness in the ship.²

[618] 4. That any sort of disrepair left in a ship, by which she or the cargo may suffer, is a breach of the warranty of seaworthiness, whether it affect the hull,³ or the rigging, sails, etc.,⁴ or the ground tackling.⁵

5. That a deficiency of force in the crew, or of skill in the master, mate, etc., is want of seaworthiness;⁶ as also is the want of a pilot in the navigation of rivers, firths, etc.; where the master is not familiar with the difficulties as in the ship's own port.⁷ But if a sufficient complement of skilful officers and able seamen has once been put on board, the negligent survey, she was proved to be materially decayed. The underwriters on this account having refused to repair her, the owners did, at the expense of £1426, and then brought their action for this sum. There was some discrepancy of evidence, the Greenock carpenters having made two reports,—the first less, the second more favourable. The insurance was held good. An appeal having been taken to the House of Lords, the judgment was reversed. Lord Eldon held: 1. That it was not necessary to inquire into the honesty of the insurance, that being of no importance to the issue. 2. That the imperfect survey at Leith left room for fatal mistakes. 3. That 'the ship having sailed, and appearing to have been for two or three days in a violent storm, if she be so damaged as that the damage might fairly be considered as the effect of the storm, that is one view of the case. But if damaged in such a manner as, in common probability, she would not be if she had been seaworthy when she sailed on the voyage, the implied warranty is not observed.' Then, going through the evidence, his Lordship said: 'Having considered the whole of this evidence, I never was more clear about anything than that it is proved to be perfectly manifest, to my entire satisfaction, that this vessel was not seaworthy when she sailed, whatever might then have been the opinion of the owners and carpenters who repaired her; and if the cause could have come, and had come here originally, I would have recommended to give costs to the underwriters. But it is not customary to give costs where a decision of the Court below is reversed.' 4 Dow's Rep. 269. [See Baker v Scottish Sea Insurance Co., 1855, 17 D. 417, as to pleading.]

¹ Watson v Clark, 1 Dow 336. The Midsummer Blossom was thirty-five years old. She sailed from England to Honduras. On sailing thence she was thought to be seaworthy; but soon after, without adequate cause, became leaky, and returned, struck, and was lost. The risk insured was 'at and from Honduras to London.' The Judge-Admiral held the ship not to be seaworthy, and adjudged the policy to be void. The Court of Session altered this judgment. The House of Lords reversed, and returned to the judgment of the Judge-Admiral. Lord Eldon 'held it to be a clear and established principle, that if a ship was seaworthy at the commencement of the voyage, though she became otherwise only an hour after, still the warranty was complied with, and the underwriter liable. But when the inability of the ship to perform the voyage became evident in a short time from the commencement of the risk, the presumption was that it was from causes existing before her setting sail on her intended voyage, and that the ship was not then seaworthy; and the onus probandi in such a case rested with the assured, to show that the inability arose from causes subsequent to the commencement of the voyage.' With this Lord Redesdale concurred, and said, 'he had always understood it to be a clear and distinct rule of law, that if a vessel in a short time after leaving the port where the voyage commenced was obliged to return, the presumption was that she had not been seaworthy when the voyage began, and that the onus probandi was thrown on the assured.'

In Potts, Cook, & Potts v Parker, 3 Dow 24, the judgment of the Court of Session was, on the same ground, reversed. Here the insurance had been sustained by the Court of Session. The ship was held by the House of Lords to have become innavigable without any adequate cause, and the proof to satisfy the onus probandi was held insufficient.

² [It must be observed that the warranty of seaworthiness (the most important of the implied warranties) applies strictly to the time of sailing. Accordingly, it was held in a leading case to be no defence to an action on a policy, that the vessel after sailing, and before the accident occurred, was rendered unseaworthy by the wrongful, negligent, and improper (but not barratrous) conduct of the master and mariners in throwing overboard so much of the ballast that the vessel was unable to overcome ordinary perils. Dixon v Sadler, 5 Mees. and W. 405. See Bermon v Woodbridge, Doug. 781. The warranty of efficiency of the master and crew is subject to a corresponding limitation. See the authorities in Tudor, Merc. Ca. 2d ed. 128. The case of Law v Hollingsworth, 7 T. R. 160, in so far as conflicting, is overruled. See 8 Mees. and W. 900, per Tindal, C. J. absence of the crew at the time of the loss, provided some one was left in charge of the ship fit to be entrusted with her, was not held a breach of the warranty.¹

6. That a vessel may be not seaworthy from being overloaded.²

7. That if the want of seaworthiness, arising from justifiable ignorance of the cause of the defect, be discovered, and the fault be remedied while yet there is no harm done, the policy is binding: as when a ship proves to be too heavily laden, and before sailing is relieved of the excess; or sailing with only one anchor, she is supplied with the other before she has occasion to use it. There may, indeed, be delay and deviation occasioned by such want of seaworthiness, which may prove fatal to the policy. But where nothing of this kind happens, or where the underwriters by a memorandum give permission to deviate so far, the plea on seaworthiness is discharged.³

8. That it is not necessary the ship shall be seaworthy for the voyage from the [619] moment the policy attaches to her. While she remains in port, it is sufficient that she is properly fitted for all the dangers of that situation.⁴

II. CONCEALMENT OR MISREPRESENTATION.—It is fatal to the policy if the insured, or those effecting the insurance, have misled the insurers in any fact material to the risk. The points are these: 1. Misrepresentation; 2. False insinuation; and, 3. Concealment.⁵ On ¹ Busk v The Royal Exchange Assurance Co., 1818, 2 Barn. and Ald. 73. Here the ship was accidentally burnt. The ship was Russian; sailed from Amsterdam with an adequate crew; was forced by weather into a Russian port, and there frozen up for the winter. The crew was then paid off, according to the established custom in those ports; and the captain, leaving the ship in the charge of the mate, went to St. Petersburg to settle the ship's accounts. The mate lighted a fire in the cabin, and without having seen it properly extinguished, went on board another ship, where he remained all night. At four in the morning there was an alarm of fire, and the ship was burnt. The chief question was on the effect of the mate's negligence in freeing the underwriters. There was also a plea of breach of implied warranty, as there was no crew on board at the time of the loss. The Court held the implied warranty to have been complied with once, and that the mate himself was sufficient for the watching of the ship. The underwriters were found liable on the express stipulation in the policy against fire, and from which the negligence of the master or mate will not discharge them.

was occasioned by the previous overloading? The jury affirmed the first, and negatived the second question. A new trial was moved on two grounds: 1. That the ship was originally seaworthy; and, 2. That there was a deviation into Ramsgate; the memorandum being, in fact, a new policy, and without a stamp. The Court held, that there was no avoidance of the policy by non-seaworthiness discovered and corrected before the danger; that the memorandum was therefore a mere discharge of the warranty, and the loss not occasioned by the original defect.

See Forshaw v Chabert, 3 Brod. and Bing. 159. The true distinction between this and the above case is pointed out by Mr. Marshall; namely, that in the former the consent to the discharging of part of the cargo at Ramsgate was a waiver of the objection to the unseaworthiness and to the deviation. Marsh. 159.

⁵ [The leading English authority on concealment as a defence to an action on a policy of insurance is Carter v Boehm, 3 Burr. 1905, 1 Smith L. Ca. 490. Insurance on Fort Marlborough (a British factory) against foreign capture, effected by its governor. The weakness of the fort, and the probability of its being taken by the French, and that the insured knew these facts, but had not communicated them, and also the opinion of an insurance broker as to the materiality of the facts not communicated, were offered to be proved. The plaintiff proved that the office of governor was mercantile, not military, and that the fort was never calculated to resist European enemies. Lord Mansfield rejected the evidence tendered by the defendant, and, on motion for a new trial, delivered an elaborate judgment, distinguishing the species facti which an insurer is bound to disclose, from those which, as being either matter of notoriety or matter of opinion, the underwriter is bound to investigate for himself. It is still a controverted question whether the opinion of brokers or

the first of these, few cases are to be expected; or, at least, cases merely of proof, being of little use as precedents. Of the other two classes many illustrations are to be found. In the Scottish cases on this point, however, there is nothing very particular to be observed, either as new in doctrine, or as in any degree departing from the rules laid down by Park and Marshall, and so extensively acted on in English determinations. 1. It is fatal to misstate, though innocently, the day of sailing.¹ 2. It is a misrepresentation to say that a ship is expected to be ready to sail between two days named, when the insured has information that she was actually ready to sail on the first of those days;² or to say that a ship is reported to have sailed, when it is known that she positively has sailed.³ 3. It has been held (though the point has been thought to admit of considerable doubt) that the insured makes a misrepresentation fatal to the policy, if at procuring insurance he says that part of the same risk has been insured already at a certain sum by underwriters likely to have the confidence of those to whom he applies, although, in truth, a higher had been paid. It was held that, although this does not touch any part of the risk, the state of the ship or the condition or nature of the voyage, it induces false confidence.⁴ 4. It is not necessary to give neutral persons of skill is admissible to prove the materiality of facts not communicated. Opposite decisions were given by Lords Tenterden and Denman in different actions arising out of the same contract; the question being, whether the agent in London of an Australian merchant, who was instructed to effect an insurance on goods, but not until thirty days after the arrival of the vessel bringing the instructions, was justified in concealing the condition from the insurance broker. Rickards v Madock, 10 B. and C. 257; Campbell v Rickards, 5 B. and Ad. 840. In another case, where an insurance had been effected for a voyage 'at and from London to St. Thomas, with leave to call at' Madeira and Teneriffe, a letter was communicated to the insurance broker, stating that the vessel would sail next day 'for the Canaries,' and thence to one or more of the West Indian islands,—say Barbadoes, St. Kitt's, and St. Thomas,—and he was desired 'to do the needful with it.' The broker got the policy altered by adding, 'leave to proceed to St. Kitt's and Barbadoes,' but omitted to obtain leave to proceed to any of the Canary Islands. The vessel was lost at the Grand Canary Island. In an action against the broker for negligence in not having procured the proper alterations to be made on the policy, evidence of policy-brokers was admitted to the effect that the alterations made were a sufficient compliance with instructions. The ruling was upheld, on the ground that it was a question of skill what effect the circumstances of the voyage, and especially the circumstance that the original voyage described in the policy comprehended Teneriffe, the most important of the Canary Islands, would operate in the minds of experienced men, in determining whether it was intended that the alteration should include a liberty to touch and stay at the Canaries in general. Chapman v Walton, 10 Bing. 57. In favour of the reception of such evidence, we may also cite (in addition to the analogical support derived from the reception of medical evidence as to materiality in actions on life policies) Elton v Larkins, 5 C. and B. 392; 3 Kent's Com. 284, note (b), ed. 1844; Judge Story in McLanahan v Universal Insurance Co., 1 Peter's Amer. ² Stewart v Morrison. Morrison had letters from Königsberg, that his ship, on 13th September, 'is now quite ready to depart with first fair wind.' Morrison wrote for insurance, saying 'the vessel was expected to be loaded at Königsberg between the 13th and 20th September.' An insurance was also done on this other order: 'Said ship expected to be loaded at Königsberg between the 13th and 20th September.' The ship sailed on 13th, and in two days after was totally lost. The Judge-Admiral dismissed the action, and his judgment was affirmed by the Court of Session. 1779, M. 7080.

³ Kinloch v Duguid, 1813, 17 Fac. Coll. 108. The owners of the Kinloch had a letter from the wharfinger, with the manifest, saying, 'She sailed yesterday morning with a fair wind, and I hope will have a speedy passage.' This letter was written 26th February, and arrived at Dundee 1st March. On 9th March a policy was opened on a letter, saying, 'Commission £1000 on ship Kinloch, valued at £3000, from London to Dundee, reported to have sailed 25th ultimo.' The ship was captured, and in an action for the loss the Judge-Admiral held this to be a misrepresentation which annulled the policy. This judgment was, in the Court of Session, affirmed by Lord Robertson and by the Court.

⁴ Hill v Sibbald & Co., 16 June 1809, 15 Fac. Coll. 308. Hill had insured on his South Sea whaler Redbridge £3600, at twenty-five guineas, to return five guineas on arrival in company with the Britannia. Afterwards he insured £2000 more on part of the voyage, at from 15 to 18 per cent. Two years after sailing, the owner having heard of her safety eight months before, and that she might be expected in about two months, wrote for another insurance to his broker in London, to get £2000 done at Leith, saying, 'I have no objection to give eight guineas, which is the highest premium I have given.' The London broker wrote to Scotland that Hill 'had done as much insurance on the ship as the underwriters here are inclined to take at eight guineas.' Insurance was accordingly done at eight guineas, to the extent of £1750. The ship was captured. The Judge-Admiral held the insurance to have been voided by the representation of the London premiums, and that the pursuers had no right to recover. 13 July 1804. This judgment having been appealed to the Court of Session, Lord President Hope, then Lord Justice-Clerk, held, as Lord information of an accident sustained by the ship previous to the commencement of the [620] risk, as the ship is warranted seaworthy.¹ But if in such a case the necessary repairs are not yet completed, and likely to affect the time of sailing, it then becomes important to disclose the state of the ship, as the ground on which the risk is to be calculated. And in general, all concealment of positive information as to the day of sailing, or of facts which will affect the sailing, will be fatal.² 5. It is important to know whether a ship is to wait for convoy, or to run the voyage; and if, in obtaining insurance, the underwriter is misled into a belief that the ship may sail with convoy, when the resolution has been taken [621] to send her as a running ship, the policy will be bad.³ 6. Where two ships are to co-operate as tenders to each other, this so far changes the risk from the ordinary one of a single ship, that it must be disclosed; unless it be so established as a custom in the line of trade insured, that it must be presumed to be known.⁴ So, where the destination is expressed to a port, Ordinary, that 'this was not a misrepresentation as to any circumstances attending the situation or condition of the ship or nature of the voyage, which could affect the nature of the risk,' and therefore he reversed the Judge-Admiral's sentence. The judges were divided in reviewing this interlocutor of reversal. The majority assented to the view taken by the Lord Ordinary. The minority held it to be substantially an imposition, intended for that purpose, and having the effect of persuading the underwriters here that the better informed underwriters of the south had run the same risk.

The case having been appealed to the House of Lords, the judgment was reversed. Lord Eldon, Chancellor, said: 'It appeared to him to be settled, that if one meaning to effect an insurance exhibits a policy underwritten by a person of skill and judgment, knowing that this would weigh with the other party, and disarm the ordinary prudence exercised in the common transactions of life, and it turned out that this person had not in fact underwritten the policy, or at least had done so on such terms as that he came under no obligation to pay, it appeared to him to be settled that this would vitiate the policy. The courts in this country would say this was a fraud, not on the ground that the misrepresentation affected the nature of the risk, but because it induced a confidence without which the party would not have acted' (2 Dow 263).

Adam & Mathie v Murray, and Bogle v Smith, 1804, M. App. Insur. No. 6; Marshall on Insurance, Appendix, No. 6. Here the ship Concordia received damage in going into Port Morant in Jamaica, and by letters from the master the owners were informed that the ship was so much damaged as to require a survey; and (4th June) on that survey considerable repairs were found necessary. The master some days afterwards (15th June) wrote that the repairs were finished, and that the certificate of her being fit for sea was expected, concluding with a hope that she would be ready to sail with convoy on the 25th July. From the repairs, however, which were found necessary, and some delay in loading, the ship was not ready till the 22d, when she sailed to join convoy, but from bad weather did not reach the rendezvous till three days after the fleet sailed. By various disasters the ship was kept in the West Indies for many months, and at last was unable to proceed without such repairs as would amount to more than her worth. The master's letter arrived on the 4th of August, when the owners insured £200 on the freight, giving to the underwriters this information: 'Our letter of 15th June from the master says our cargo is all ready for us; and if the fleet don't sail till the 25th, I hope we will be able to go with them; but it is talked they will leave this the 20th.' The ship was abandoned to the underwriters, and an action brought, to which the pleas were: 1. Concealment; 2. Want of seaworthiness; 3. An average, not a total loss. The Court of Session held it established that, after the damage, the vessel had been made seaworthy, and that the voyage having been lost, the owners were entitled to abandon; and so the question came to turn on the concealment. The Court sustained the action, and repelled the defences.

² Gillespie v Douglas, 1803, M. 7095. Gillespie & Co. had a letter by the Fanny from New York, saying that 'the Ohio will sail about twelve hours after the Fanny.' Some days after getting this letter they insured £1000 on goods by the Ohio, at and from New York, but saying nothing of the day of sailing. The ship was taken, and the insurance held ineffectual, as the information withheld made this a missing ship.

The case having been appealed to the House of Lords, it was there held that a policy of this sort, though it comprehended the case of a running ship, contemplated that as a case of chance, the risk being taken altogether with the chance of the vessel sailing with convoy; whereas here the alternative was entirely cut off, which made a different sort of risk. The judgment was reversed. 4 Dow 97.

and the real design is to fish off that port, the insurance is bad, unless this be the customary mode of insuring a fishing voyage.¹ 7. The insured is bound, on applying for insurance, to disclose all that he knows or has heard relative to the actual state of the ship, or what leads to direct inference as to her fate.² And it is no justification to support the policy, that the insured did not himself believe what was reported to him. 8. Direct concealment of the actual state of the ship vacates the policy. That even doubtful rumours are to be disclosed, is laid down in the books, and illustrated by many cases.³ 9. Although the order for insurance may have been fairly given, according to the circumstances as known at the time it was [622] sent off, if information material to the risk have come to the knowledge of the insured in such time as to enable him to correct his order before the policy is underwritten, the withholding of that information will be fatal to the insurance.⁴

² Kirby v Smith, 1818, 1 Barn. and Ald. 672. Here Kirby, the owner of the Ocean, insured her from Elsineur to Hull. On 26th July, about six hours after the Ocean sailed, Kirby himself left Elsineur in another ship; and on his arrival (9th August) at Hull, finding the Ocean not arrived, he insured, disclosing nothing of the arrival of the other ship, or of her having sailed after the Ocean. The average voyage is from eight to ten days, though some ships make it in four or five days. The jury found a verdict for the insured. But a new trial was granted on the ground of the concealment of a material fact. Lord Ellenborough said, that 'the fact of the Ocean having sailed six hours before the other ship might have been very material, and might have induced the underwriter to pause before he took the risk.' He was therefore of opinion that it ought to have been communicated to the underwriters. Mr. Justice Bayley held, that the ship having been represented as well at Elsineur on 26th July, from whence the natural conclusion was that she was left there on that day, contrary to the fact, this was a misrepresentation not to be got the better of by the custom that ships do not stay at Elsineur, for this depends on their state and on the weather. Lord Chief Justice Abbot held also that the concealment was material.

Stewart v Dunlop, 8 April 1785, 3 Pat. 14. The ship Peggy, belonging to Stewart, was captured. Another ship, the Henrietta, arrived in Greenock with intelligence of the capture. Mr. Boog, who came in that ship, having met an intimate friend of Stewart, the owner, asked him in a very particular way whether he knew of any insurance done upon the Peggy? This person immediately had a conversation with Stewart's clerk, who, after this conversation, was desired by his master to get an insurance effected, although it did not distinctly appear that he reported the conversation to Stewart. The Court of Session held the insurance bad, and the House of Lords affirmed that sentence.

Kinloch v Campbell, 14 June 1815, 18 Fac. Coll. 421. Here the vessel sailed from London for Dundee, 25th February 1810. Another sailed the same day, and arrived 6th March. And another sailed 2d March, and arrived the 7th; by which last ship information was brought that the master of the Rose of Dundee had, off the Nore, reported that the Kinloch was spoken with on the 28th of February north of Yarmouth. The Kinloch was a schooner-rigged ship; and on 6th March it was stated in the Edinburgh newspapers that a French privateer had on 2d March taken a schooner off the Tees. Three days after this information arrived at Dundee, an insurance was effected at Leith on the Kinloch, 'lost or not lost, at and from London to Dundee; sailed 25th ultimo from London, and no account of her since in any respect in Dundee up to 9th instant.' The Kinloch was, in fact, captured by a French privateer on the 2d March, not far from the Tees. The defence was: 1. Concealment; 2. False warranty of there being no accounts. The judgment of the Admiral was, on the whole, in favour of the insured; but the Court of Session reversed this judgment, to the effect of denying action upon the policy. There was a difference of opinion on the bench, Lord Meadowbank holding that there was nothing here concealed, either with regard to the description of the ship, or the arrival of the other vessel, so as to make her a missing ship, of which the underwriters ought not to have been apprised. But the other judges held that, upon the whole, there was here a combination of circumstances kept out of view, which, if disclosed, would have altered the risk.

⁴ Grieve v Young, 1782, M. 7086. Here Grieve of Eyemouth wrote for an insurance on the Jean, which sailed that afternoon for Alloa. After having sent off the letter, the ship was on the same evening driven back by a storm, and sank about eight next morning, in sight of Grieve himself. The letter ordering the insurance was sent to a post-town, at which it was to be taken up at ten next morning by the London post for Edinburgh, where it arrived at six o'clock in the evening. The Judge-Admiral found it incumbent on Grieve to have sent an express in order to stop the insurance, and therefore dismissed the action. This judgment was brought before the Court of Session, who held that it was not necessary to send an express to Edinburgh, but that there being time to countermand the insurance by the ordinary course of post, this ought to have been done; and on this ground they affirmed the Admiral's judgment.

Scougal v Young, 1798, M. 7091. Scougal wrote on 30th October 1792 to Leith, directing a cargo to be insured from St Petersburg to Leith. On 2d November part of the cargo was damaged; and of this information might have been sent that evening, so as to go by the very next mail to that which carried the order to insure. Scougal did not write by that post. The mails of 30th October and 2d November arrived at the same time, so that the information which ought to have

III. DEVIATION OR ALTERATION.¹—1. Deviation is a voluntary departure, without necessity, from the stipulated or usual course of the voyage. Strictly speaking, deviation takes place during the actual sailing of the ship; and is an alteration of the risk, discharging the subsequent responsibility of the insurers, without requiring any return of premium. Of this doctrine there never has been any doubt. The only points of difficulty are, What shall be held a deviation? and what degree of necessity shall excuse it? And, (1.) It is not the less a deviation that the insured were not privy to it.² (2.) The mere intention to deviate, or an engagement so to do, or instructions to that effect to the master, will not discharge the underwriters if the ship is previously lost, or never has deviated.³ (3.) The deviation actually committed destroys the responsibility, although the ship has returned to her course without any apparent injury or increase of risk. It is not the increase of risk, but the substitution of another risk, that determines the contract.⁴ (4.) Where the ship [623] has liberty to call at a port not named, but generally described as a port in a particular coast or country, it is a deviation if the ship go to such a port out of her usual course.⁵ (5.) Where the deviation is unavoidable, or necessary for the safety of the ship or cargo, or even of a part of the cargo, it will not discharge the underwriters from their responsibility,⁶ been transmitted on the 2d would have corrected the order. He brought an action for the loss; but the Judge-Admiral dismissed it, and the Court of Session affirmed the judgment. [With these cases compare Stone v Aberdeen Marine Insurance Co., 1849, 11 D. 1041.]

² Steevens & Co. v Douglas, 1774, M. 7096. Insurance from Belfast to Greenock and Port-Glasgow. Defence: Goods taken in to be delivered at Stranraer, and, after deviation, wrecked near Girvan. Answer: The insured ignorant of the deviation. Court held it not necessary to vacate a policy, that the assured should be accessory to the deviation; but enough that there was a deviation, or an intention to deviate, partly carried into execution.

This was also a point in the case of Elliot v Wilson. See below, note 4.

N.B.—It is not quite correct to speak of vacating the policy by deviation, for it is still a good policy though the responsibility subsequent to the deviation is discharged. See Park 474; Marshall 184.

⁴ Wilson & Co. v Elliot, 1776, M. 7096. An erroneous judgment on this point by the Court of Session was corrected by the House of Lords. A ship was insured from 'Carron to Hull, with liberty to call at Leith.' The liberty had commonly been more extensive, 'to call as usual,' which included all the ports in the Firth of Forth. The insured, without having been informed by their broker of the alteration, called at Morrison's Haven; and the ship, after returning to her course, was overtaken by a storm and lost. The Court of Session sustained action against the insurers, 'on the ground that Morrison's Haven was so near that it could scarcely be called a deviation, and that the vessel actually returned into her proper course, where the underwriters had in reality suffered no detriment.'

In the House of Lords a different view was taken, the House being of opinion that there was here a wilful deviation; and although ships sailing on the voyage have sometimes been allowed by the terms of a policy underwritten at the same premium to go into Morrison's Haven, that could not avail him, since no permission was given here: that a wilful deviation from the course of the voyage insured is in all cases a determination of the policy, it being immaterial from what cause or at what place a subsequent loss happens; for from the moment of deviation the underwriters are discharged. Elliot v Wilson, 7 Brown's Parl. Cases 459, 2 Pat. 411.

⁵ Robertson v Laird, 1790, M. 7099. An insurance was made from Virginia to Rotterdam, with liberty to call at a port in England. The owner wrote to the broker, that the ship would probably be ordered to discharge at Hull instead of proceeding to Rotterdam, and desiring him to get the policy endorsed with such a permission if agreed to. All the underwriters but one agreed. The ship was cleared for Hull, and in going towards that port was lost. Laird, the non-concurring underwriter, resisted a claim for the loss. The Judge-Admiral decided against Laird. The Court of Session held him liable, on the ground 'that the expression in the policy should be construed to mean any port in England at the discretion of the insured, or of the shipmaster, which would not occasion an unreasonable deviation from the plan of the voyage;' and therefore they refused the bill of suspension.

On an appeal to the House of Lords, this judgment was reversed, and the case remitted for discussion, 20th April 1791.

The cause was discussed before Lord Justice-Clerk M'Queen, who held, 'that a voyage insured from Virginia to Rotterdam, with liberty to call at a port in England, does only entitle the insured to call at such ports on the English coast as lie in the track of the voyage, but not at a port which is so much out of the natural course of the voyage as Hull is;' and therefore he dismissed the action. The Court, in reviewing this judgment, 'held the voyage to be entirely altered, and therefore that the policy was vacated.' 1793, M. 7100.

⁶ Dunlop v Allan, 1785, M. 7097. Goods of Dunlop's were insured from Clyde to St. Christopher's. There were also on board goods belonging to other merchants. St. Christopher's was found in possession of the enemy, but under a capitulation which did not affect Mr. Dunlop's goods, while the others on board would immediately have been seized. The master provided it be pursued in the shortest and most expeditious course; but there must be no deviation from such necessary voyage.¹ (6.) The onus probandi lies on the insurer alleging deviation.² See in Marshall a very ample discussion of the grounds on which a deviation may be justified, under the heads of—Stress of Weather; Want of necessary Repair; the joining of Convoy; the Succouring of Ships in Distress;³ the avoiding of Capture or Detention; the Sickness of the Captain or Crew; and Mutiny.⁴

2. Alteration of the voyage differs from deviation, in being a complete abandonment of the voyage insured, under a resolution to sail upon another. This properly takes place before the voyage insured begins; and the effect of the abandonment is to void the policy either with or without a return of premium. (1.) If the voyage insured be abandoned before the risk have commenced, the policy is void, and, on the one hand, a return of premium may be demanded;⁵ while, on the other, no claim can be maintained against the underwriter for loss, though happening within a course common to both voyages.⁶ (2.) The express determination to alter the voyage is conclusive, although it cannot strictly be said that the new voyage is begun. For there is held to be a difference of risk in time, rapidity of preparation, etc., perhaps inscrutable, but still important, attached to the specific voyage determined on.⁷ (3.) As it is not a deviation where the master is forced by necessity to change his course, neither is it an alteration or abandonment of the voyage insured, that a material change has by necessity taken place in the intermediate voyage.⁸ And, (4.) It is therefore carried the whole to Antigua, intending to take the earliest opportunity of sending Dunlop's to St. Christopher's; but in the meanwhile they were burned in the warehouse. The Judge-Admiral and the Court of Session held the insurance good.

ment of the loss, and received payment accordingly. The action was for restitution of the money thus improperly obtained. In the Court of Admiralty and Court of Session it was held that there was no abandonment of the voyage insured. In the House of Lords the case was viewed in a different light. The Lord Chancellor Eldon, on occasion of first moving the judgment, intimated his doubts of the judgment pronounced here, and said that he wished to confer with a judge whose attention had been much occupied with these subjects. Afterwards, on delivering judgment, his Lordship stated these points: 1. That the consent of the owners at home was not necessary, the captain and agent abroad having taken the arrangement on themselves, with sanction of the owners. 2. That although the cargo was still unloaded, and there was nothing to alter the voyage but mere intention, this intention made a difference of risk, in respect to the preparation for the voyage. And, 3. That the letter intimating the determination to change was an abandonment of the voyage; and that in this the highest authority in Westminster Hall concurred with him. So the judgment was reversed. [The leading English case is Woolridge v Boydell, Doug. Rep. 16; Tudor, Merc. Ca. 109. See, as to the distinction between intention and resolution to deviate, Kingston v Phelps, cited 7 T. R. 165.]

⁸ Driscoll v Passmore, 1 Bos. and Pull. 200. Here a ship was bound on a voyage from Lisbon to Madeira, from Madeira to Saffi on the African coast, in ballast, and thence back to Lisbon with wheat. An insurance was effected on the previous parts of the voyage. The disputed insurance was on freight from Saffi to Lisbon. This had been effected with difficulty, on account of the distance of time for commencement of the risk; but on a representation of the ship being at Madeira, and about to proceed on her voyage, it was done. At Madeira all the crew deserted but two, on a report of Moorish cruisers off Saffi, and refused to rejoin the ship unless the master would proceed to Lisbon. Compelled to do this,

no proof of alteration that, amidst difficult circumstances, the master writes to know what the opinion of the underwriters would be, if a certain course suggested by those difficulties should be followed, and afterwards, at command of the charterers, proceeds.¹

CHAPTER V.

OF CONTRACTS OF INSURANCE AGAINST FIRE, AND UPON LIVES.

THE great principles which rule maritime insurance are applicable also to insurances [625] against fire, and on lives; intended to provide against the accidents to which property on shore, or human life, is subject. In the security against those accidents, most important interests in a pecuniary point of view may be involved.

SECTION I.—INSURANCE AGAINST FIRE.

This is a contract by which, in consideration of a premium, the underwriter undertakes to indemnify the insured against all losses in his house, warehouse, goods, or stock, by means of accidental fire, within a limited period.

This contract, like that of sea insurance, requires a written policy. But circumstances may occur, out of which an engagement may be inferred, sufficient to sustain an action for completing the insurance.²

The claims which may be grounded on this contract arise chiefly on the part of the insured against the underwriters; for the premium is commonly paid by advance,—the transaction not being managed, as marine insurances, by brokers standing as middlemen between the parties, but directly between the insured and the insurance company or underwriters.

The points of importance to be discussed on occasion of a claim by the insured are: 1. The interest; 2. The nature of the loss insured against; 3. The warranties and representation; and, 4. The adjustment of the loss.

I. INTEREST.—Policies of insurance without interest, which are in marine insurance the charterers insisted on his going thence to Saffi, which he did, and was captured on his return from Saffi to Lisbon. A special jury gave a verdict against the underwriters. But the case being new, it underwent a great deal of discussion in the Court of Common Pleas, when the verdict was held good. The judgment proceeded on three grounds: 1. That this was a voyage from Saffi to Lisbon. 2. That the commencement was speculative and executory, upon a representation of the intermediate course of the ship. 3. That the representation was true at the time, though the course was altered by subsequent events. And, 4. That the alteration being from necessity, and so justifiable, the voyage insured was not abandoned, but truly entered upon, in the course of which the ship was lost.

¹ Driscoll v Bovil, 1 Bos. and Pull. 313. This was an insurance on the round voyage mentioned in the above case, from Lisbon to Madeira, from Madeira to Saffi, from Saffi to Lisbon. The only difference, except in the policy, was that, while at Lisbon, the master wrote to the broker that he was waiting the resolution of the charterers, and wishing to know if it would be agreeable to the underwriters that the ship should proceed to complete her voyage. The broker wrote that he thought the policy at an end, and had effected a new one on the voyage from Saffi to Lisbon. The Court approved of a verdict for the insured.

² Christie v North British Insurance Co., 1825, 3 S. 519, N. E. 360. Here an insurance of a wire mill was proposed to the Phoenix Insurance Co. They were willing to take half the risk, but uncertain what premium to propose; and in the meanwhile a proposal was made to the North British to take the rest of the risk. They consented, and were to be regulated as to the premium by the Phoenix; and the insurance was in the meanwhile to be held as good. No premium was fixed by the Phoenix when the mill was burnt. The Phoenix paid their loss; the North British refused; and the Court of Session held, that there being no premium fixed, there was no contract.

objectionable chiefly as a species of gaming, are in fire insurance extremely dangerous, and most anxiously guarded against, as holding out temptation to wilful fire-raising, which necessarily is attended with peril of the most deplorable kind to the whole neighbourhood. At common law, therefore, they are exceptionable; and they are also prohibited by the [626] general words of the statute of the late king.¹ It is not, however, strictly necessary, in order to constitute an insurable interest, that the insured should hold the absolute property of the effects insured. A creditor may have a policy on the house or goods of his debtor, over which he holds a security. A trustee or agent having the custody of goods for sale on commission, may insure them, provided the nature of the property be distinctly specified, and that all the insurances taken together upon the same property shall not exceed the full value of it.²

II. OF THE RISKS AND LOSSES INSURED AGAINST.—These are all ‘losses or damage by fire’ during the term of the policy, to the houses, buildings, furniture, or merchandise insured.

1. There must be actual fire or ignition to entitle the insured to recover; and it is not sufficient that there has been a great and injurious increase of heat, while nothing has taken fire which ought not to be on fire.³

2. In general, there is in the policy an exception of fire occasioned ‘by invasion, foreign enemy, or any military or usurped power whatsoever;’ and in some there is a further exception of ‘riot, tumult, and civil commotion.’ Under these exceptions, it was decided in England: 1. That houses set on fire by a mob assembled riotously on account of the high prices of provisions, were not under the exception of usurped power, which could mean only foreign invasion or internal rebellion, when armies are drawn up against each other, when the laws are silent, and when the firing of towns becomes unavoidable.⁴ 2. That under the words ‘civil commotion,’ such burning of houses as took place in 1780 by the Popish mob is comprehended, so as to free the underwriters.⁵

3. The loss must be a loss within the policy. These policies are on time; and it is commonly provided, that the party applying shall make a deposit for the policy, stamp-duty, and mark, and shall pay the premium to the next quarter-day, and from thence for a year more; that the future payments shall be paid annually, within fifteen days from the day limited in the policy; and that no insurance shall take place till the premiums be actually paid by the insured or his agent. These conditions are expressed in the proposals (which are held to make part of the contract); while in the policy, the day at which the insurance begins, and the day to which it is to continue, are set down, and so from year to year, so long as the insured shall duly pay, and the insurers shall accept, the premium. It would seem, 1. That the insurance commences from the moment of depositing in terms of the articles. 2. That there would be no insurance, though an application had been made and agreed to, unless the stipulated deposit had been made.⁶ 3. That the being allowed credit

No policy shall be valid without inserting the name of the insured; and, 3. No greater sum shall be recovered than the amount of the interest of the insured.

³ Austin v Drewe, 1816, 4 Camp. 360. Here a sugarhouse was insured, in which, for the purposes of the manufacture, heat was communicated to each of the several storeys, eight in number, by a chimney, forming nearly one side of the house, at the top of which there was a register. The neglect to open this register on one occasion caused an excessive heat, which blackened the walls, but did no damage, except by injuring the sugar in different states of preparation. Lord Chief Justice Gibbs directed a verdict for the defendants, which the jury with great reluctance found.

On a motion for a new trial, the Chief Justice said the damage was occasioned by the unskilful management of the machinery, and not by any of those accidents from which the defendants intended to indemnify the plaintiffs; and Lord Chief Justice Dallas said there was nothing on fire which ought not to have been on fire, and the loss was occasioned by carelessness of the plaintiffs. 2 Marsh. 130. with the agent of the insurance company, who again, in his relation to the company, [627] debits himself with the premium as if received, would be equivalent to payment of the premium, so as to make the insurance effectual. 4. That the policy remains in force during the fifteen days. But, 5. That if the fifteen days be allowed to expire without a renewal of the term by payment of the premium, the insurers will not be liable.¹

4. The insurers are liable not only for loss by burning, but for all damage and injury, and reasonable charges attending the removal of articles, though never touched by the fire.

5. It is a more difficult question whether the insurers are liable for the loss of rent, by the destruction of a house tenanted at a rent payable to the insured? or for the rent necessary to be paid for a dwelling-house, to supply the place of that of which the fire has deprived the insured? I insure my house and furniture, for example, at £2000, and perhaps no more than £1500 has been lost by physical destruction. But I must pay £100 for a house to live in until my house is repaired; and this is as manifestly a loss occasioned by the fire as the destruction of my furniture. Am I entitled, then, in estimating my loss, to add to the £1500 the rent of an intermediate residence? Or my house is let to a tenant who pays me £100 of rent; am I entitled to reckon the loss of rent as a part of the amount of my claim? There seems to be reason for including these articles in either case, either by estimating the subject lost as a subject bearing a certain rent to the insurer, or by setting a substantive value on the rent as lost.²

III. WARRANTY AND REPRESENTATION.—It was in a case of insurance against fire that the doctrine of warranties, as contradistinguished from representation, was laid down in the House of Lords, as already referred to.³ A warranty is part of the contract; and if not true, whether material or not, there is no insurance. A representation must be complied with, if material; if immaterial, that may be inquired into and shown.

1. Warranty.—The description of different classes of property according to the risk, as contained in the proposals, forms the subject of an implied warranty on the part of the insured. Where the property is given up as corresponding with the description of a particular class of property, and it truly does not so correspond, the policy is void.⁴

2. Representation.—In this, as in every case of insurance, there must be the most perfect fairness in disclosing every circumstance material to the risk. And even the reasonable grounds of apprehension on the part of the insured must be stated.⁵

IV. OF SETTLING AND ADJUSTING LOSSES.—The loss by fire is scarcely ever a total loss; and the valuation in the policy is rather the fixing of a maximum, beyond which the underwriters are not to be liable, than the conclusive ascertainment of the value to be re- [628] placed. On the occasion of every fire, accordingly, there is an inquiry into the amount of the loss, the insured being bound to give the most satisfactory proofs he can be expected to

was a magistrate, had a watch set all night. In the evening, after the fire was thought to be extinguished, the plaintiff wrote to London for a three months' insurance of £400 on the warehouse near the boatbuilder's, and £3500 on coffee lodged there. The mail was shut; but the master of the packet took the letter to Cuxhaven, and there put it into the post office. The insurance was effected, without any disclosure of what had happened. Early in the morning of the 13th (the second day after) a fire again broke out in the boatbuilder's. The case was tried at Guildhall, before Lord Chief Justice Gibbs, when the jury, acquitting the plaintiff of fraud or dishonest design, held that the circumstance of the fire on the 11th ought to have been communicated to the underwriters, who without this information did not engage on fair grounds with the plaintiff. And accordingly they gave verdict for the defendant; and the Court of Common Pleas refused a rule for a new trial. [Sm. Merc. Law, 7th ed. 411.]

possess of the true amount of the injury. By the printed proposals he is generally required, 1. To give immediate notice of the fire. 2. To deliver in as particular an account of his loss as the case will admit, and to make proof thereof by his oath or affirmation, by books of accounts, and such vouchers as remain. 3. To produce a certificate by ministers and churchwardens, and other respectable persons, of the character and circumstances of the sufferer, and their belief that the damage stated has been suffered by him. These precautions are all good and expedient; and it is a matter in which the public is very materially interested, to repress the temptation to this most dangerous sort of fraud. But, at the same time, it does not seem to be law in Scotland that these are all absolute conditions precedent to the recovery of a loss by fire, so as to have the effect of enabling persons hostilely disposed towards the insured to extinguish his claim for loss. Some ministers or elders might be unwilling, for a violent Dissenter or a Jew, to give testimony to character; or to swear to their credibility respecting a matter of which personally they can know nothing. That the want of those compurgators will raise an unfavourable presumption against the insured is true, so as to require stronger proofs than might otherwise have been sufficient. And this is a legitimate extent to which to carry the condition. But it will at least require exceedingly strong words to make the want of the certificate a discharge of the claim,¹ or to entitle one who has the premium in his pocket to refuse to pay a loss which has fairly taken place.

In a total loss in marine policies, we have seen that there is an abandonment of what may chance to be saved.² In a loss by fire, the settlement is always on the principle of a particular average. Evidence is to be given of the amount of the loss in this case, as well as in a case of partial loss; and the amount of that loss, as nearly as it can be ascertained, is to be paid, without abandonment of what may have been saved from the fire. Thus, a house is entirely burnt down, and nothing left but the materials of the walls, and the area on which it stood; or, if it be a house of one floor, in a large tenement, nothing is left but the mere right of building a storey in any tenement to be erected on the site of that which is burnt. These do not belong to the insurer, nor is the insured bound to abandon them. The loss is estimated on the destructible parts; or the whole value of the house, as it would have sold in the market, is taken, deducting the value of the area, or of the jus quæsitum to a share in the building of a new tenement.

The loss is generally settled by arbitration, and a clause of reference is inserted in many policies. If such reference is carried into effect, the referees will proceed, on such evidence as may be laid before them, to settle the loss; including, as it would seem, such loss as directly arises from the fire, although not occasioned by the touch of fire; reckoning, for example, the loss of rents, either by estimating the destruction of the house, as the loss of a subject bearing a certain rent, or adding substantively the rent forfeited as an article of loss.³

[629] The subject may be insured in several offices. This must be stated by endorsement on the policy, and in case of loss the offices pay proportionally.

ASSIGNMENT OF FIRE POLICIES.—Policies of sea insurance are assignable; but the peculiarity of a fire insurance, the temptations to fraud, the reliance in some degree on the ¹ Yet it was so held at law in Oldham v Bewick, 2 H. Black. 577, note, where it was said the minister of the parish resided out of the parish, and was wholly unacquainted with the character and circumstances of the insured.

Again, the same judgment was given in Routledge v Burrell, 1 H. Black. 254.

And, lastly, in a very strong case, where the minister and churchwardens improperly refused to sign the certificate, this point has been held as settled. Wood v Worsley, 2 H. Black. 574, 6 Term. Rep. 710. It may be observed that the opinions of Lord Loughborough, Mr. Justice Buller, and Mr. Justice Rooke, were against the judgment. Lord Kenyon, and Heath, Ashhurst, Grose, and Lawrence, Justices, were in support of it. [Another condition usually inserted for the protection of assurers, is one declaring the policy void in case of the assured making a fraudulent claim. This condition is strictly enforced by the courts. See M'Kirby v North British Insurance Co., 1858, 20 D. 463. Sm. Merc. L. 7th ed. 413.]

character of the insured, infuse something more of the nature of delectus personæ into this contract. In England, by the rule of the common law, strengthened by this sort of consideration, a policy of fire insurance is not assignable; and where by the terms of the contract it is made transferable under certain conditions, or with certain formalities, these must be strictly complied with.¹ In equity, such a policy is assignable, provided the subject-matter of the insurance be also assigned.²

In Scotland, every pecuniary obligation is assignable; and there is scarcely such a peculiarity in this contract of insurance against fire, as to deny to an assignee the benefit of the policy, unless by the terms of the policy, or of the proposals (which are a part of the contract), the power of assignment is put under particular restraints. In the city of Edinburgh there was established, about a century ago, a company for friendly insurance against fire, consisting of a number of private contributors, who agreed to insure each other. The insurance was not personal, like the modern fire insurance; but the interest, and stock, and benefit, were inseparably annexed to the houses insured as long as the contribution was continued. This sort of insurance, and the right to the share in the society, is transferred with the house; and the value of the stock at last rose so high, that it has long made a considerable addition to the right of property, and as such is paid for in bargains and sales.

On bankruptcy, there can be no doubt that the creditors will be entitled to the full benefit of the policy, provided the premium has been duly paid up.

SECTION II.—INSURANCE ON LIFE.

The uses of insurances on lives are various. They are frequently made a part of the creditors' security in loans of money; but the usual purpose is to provide a fund for creditors, or for a family in case of death. By this contract, the insurer, for a certain premium paid in gross, or periodically, undertakes to pay a certain sum, or an annuity, upon the death of a person whose life is to be insured.³

The important points are: 1. The interest; 2. The warranty; 3. The risks; and, 4. The settling of the loss.

1. INTEREST.—A man may not only insure his own life, for the benefit of heirs or creditors, and assign the benefit of this insurance to others having thus or otherwise an interest in his life; but he may insure the life of another, in which he may be interested. By statute, no insurance on lives can be made without an interest in the life;⁴ and the sum to be recovered is restrained to the amount or value of the interest. A creditor has an insurable interest in his debtor's life, not if the debt be a gaming debt,⁵ but if it be a fair and legitimate debt.⁶

It has been said, that where a creditor has opened a policy on his debtor's life, the interest appears to vanish in proportion to the collateral securities by which the debt may be fortified.⁷ This seems very questionable. So long as a creditor has not received [630] payment, he is entitled to hold by all his securities, each as covering the whole debt; and where an insurance forms one of those securities, he is interested to the extent of the whole debt, although he may have the means of obtaining payment by following another course of proceeding, and taking his remedy upon another security. The case which Mr. Serjeant

Marshall has quoted as an exemplification and proof of his doctrine, does not appear to go so far; and to be more correctly stated by Mr. Justice Park, as establishing only, 'that after the death of the debtor, if his executors pay the debt, the creditor cannot afterwards recover upon the policy, although the debtor died insolvent, and the executors were furnished with the means of payment from another quarter than the estate of their testator.'¹ In that case, the interest had indeed expired by the extinction of the debt;² but while the debt subsists, no plea of want of interest seems pleadable: otherwise, in every case there would be an inquiry into the amount and value of the collateral securities, or even of the dividend to be drawn from the estate of the debtor.

There seems never to have been any doubt that this sort of policy is assignable; and, indeed, without such power the insurance on lives would lose half its usefulness.³ Where the debtor himself has opened a policy on his life, and assigned it in security, there can be no ground for pleading the extinction of the policy by the payment of the debt: for the benefit of the insurance belongs to him whose life is insured, after the burden of the security is extinguished; and he may make it the means of credit on another occasion, or dispose of it by settlement or otherwise. Insurances of this sort, differently from all other insurance, become more valuable the longer they subsist, because the life is running out, and the premium of a new insurance would of course be higher. The reversionary right of the policy, after it has served its purpose as a security, is therefore valuable.⁴

[631] The assignment in sequestration, or under a commission of bankruptcy, carries a policy of life insurance; and if the debtor has secretly disposed of it after his bankruptcy, the person to whom it has been assigned will be bound to return any money drawn under it for the use of the creditors.⁵

² Godsall v Boldero, 9 East 72. This was an action by the coachmaker of the late Mr. Pitt, who, in security of a debt of £500 due by him, held a policy of insurance on his life. The material plea in defence was, that after Mr. Pitt's death, and before the exhibiting of the plaintiff's bill, the debt due to the plaintiffs was paid to them by the executors of Mr. Pitt's will. On the trial, it appeared that Mr. Pitt died insolvent, and that the debt was afterwards paid out of the money allowed by Parliament for payment of his debts. Lord Ellenborough delivered the judgment of the Court.

[After having been treated as an authoritative decision both in this country and in the United States for a long time, during which it was frequently referred to by judges of eminence without disapprobation, the case of Godsall v Boldero was formally overruled by the unanimous decision of six judges sitting in the Exchequer Chamber, in the case of Dalby v India & London Life Assurance Co., 15 C. B. 365. This was a claim by a trustee of one insurance company against another company, in respect of a sub-insurance on the life of the late Duke of Cambridge. It was admitted that the person effecting the insurance had an insurable interest at the time the policy was issued. The question was, whether the loss of that interest vacated the policy. Lord Wensleydale observed: 'The contract commonly called "life assurance," when properly considered, is a mere contract to pay a certain sum of money on the death of a person, in consideration of the due payment of a certain annuity for his life, the amount of the annuity being calculated in the first instance according to the probable duration of the life; and when once fixed, it is constant and invariable. . . . This species of insurance in no way resembles a contract of indemnity.' With regard to the case of Godsall v Boldero, their Lordships were of opinion that, as the point had never been again expressly raised, as it had never come before a court of error, and as the insurance companies had uniformly declined to take advantage of the decision, it could not be regarded as a case which had been accepted as decisive of the question. See the statute 14 Geo. III. c. 48, and the summary of English decisions in Smith, L. Ca. 6th ed. vol. ii. pp. 237 et seq.]

⁵ Schondler v Wace, 1 Camp. 487. Here the bankrupt held a policy on his own life, which after bankruptcy he sold to Wace for a lottery ticket. He died, and Wace received the sum insured. The assignees under the commission brought an action for money had and received; and Lord Ellenborough told the jury that this was a possibility of benefit to which the assignees were entitled, as part of the effects of the bankrupt,—the defendant having a right, however, to deduct so much as the plaintiffs must have laid out in the payment of arrears, etc., had the policy been regularly delivered up by the bankrupt. Verdict accordingly.

[It is to be observed that the trustee takes the policy subject to preferential rights affecting it. Where a policy is held by the insurance company in security of advances, the trustee is entitled to delivery of the policy; but the company may refuse implement of their obligation under it until their

In assigning a policy for the benefit of wife or children, the policy itself is comparatively nothing towards their security, without continued and regular payment of the premium. While the insured continues solvent, the premiums may lawfully be paid by him; but the benefit of the policy may be affected materially by insolvency, since the premiums paid by him subsequently may be held as alienations to the prejudice of creditors.

2. WARRANTY.—The insured is bound, as by a warranty, to the truth of the representation of the age and state of health contained in the declaration made previous to the policy being issued; which is always referred to in the policy, and which is to be taken as a part of it. In this declaration it is stated, that he whose life is to be insured ‘has no disorder tending to the shortening of life;’ but this does not imply that he is free from all complaints, provided he be in a reasonably good state of health, in so far as belongs to the calculation of his probable existence, so that his life is fairly insurable on the common terms.¹ Nor does it seem to be sufficient evidence of the tendency of the disorder to shorten life, that the person had it at a former period, and afterwards died of it, if free from disease at the time of insuring.²

3. THE RISK.—In almost every life policy there are several exceptions, some of them applicable to all cases; others to the case of insurance of one’s own life. The exceptions are: 1. Death abroad or at sea. 2. Entering into naval or military service without the previous consent of the company. 3. Death by suicide. 4. Death by duelling. 5. Death by the hand of justice. The three last are not understood to be excepted where the insurance is on another’s life.³

advances are repaid. Borthwick v Scottish Widows Fund, 1864, 2 Macph. 595. From this case it would appear that the insurance company are not entitled, without the consent of the trustee, to close the transaction by setting off their claim against the surrender value of the policy.]

² Watson v Mainwaring, 4 Taunt. 763. The complaint here was in the bowels. The jury found it neither organic nor excessive, and gave verdict for the insured.

³ [The statement in the text is correct, when limited to claims by creditors or assignees. Amicable Assurance Co. v Bolland, 4 Bligh N. S. 194; Clift v Schwabe, 3 C. B. 437. But it is more doubtful whether the objection will not annul a policy effected by a third party interested. Lord Mansfield, in Ross v Bradshaw (p. 506, d), said, when a man makes insurance upon a life generally, without any representation of the state of the life insured, the insurer takes all the risk, unless there was some fraud in the person insuring, either by suppressing circumstances which he knew, or alleging what was false. But, says Mr. Addison, by the term ‘all the risk,’ is to be understood all the risk to which the life of man is ordinarily exposed, but not unusual and extraordinary risks voluntarily incurred by the life assured; and therefore if the person whose life forms the subject-matter of the insurance wilfully encounters extraordinary hazard (Vyse v Wakefield, 6 M. and W. 442; Wainwright v Bland, 1 Mood. and Rob. 486), if he fights a duel or commits suicide (Clift v Schwabe, 3 C. B. 476; Dormay v Borro-daille, 16 L. J. Ch. 337), or dies by the hand of the public executioner (Amicable Society v Bolland, 4 Bligh N. S. 194), the insurer will be discharged. If the life is insured for one year from the day of the date of the policy, and the death occurs that very day twelvemonth, the insurer will be liable, for ‘from the day of the date excludes the day’ (Holt, C. J., in Sir B. Howard’s case, 2 Salk. 625, Lord Raym. 480). But the word ‘from’ may mean either inclusive or exclusive, according to the apparent intention of the parties, to be gathered from the general context of the written instrument. (Pugh v D. of Leeds, 2 Cowp. 714.) If the amount insured is made payable in case of the death of the party within a certain limited period, and the latter receives his death-wound before the expiration of the term, but does not die until after it has expired, the underwriters will not be liable on the policy (Willes, J., in Lockyer v Offley, 1 T. R. 260). Addison on Contracts, pp. 661–2.]

CHAPTER VI.

OF CLAIMS BY WIVES AND CHILDREN.

OF all the claims which arise on occasion of bankruptcy, those of the wife and children are the most distressing. Not only where those provisions are left to the disposition of the law, but even where the most anxious solicitude has been shown, by special contract, to [632] protect the wife and children from the extravagance of the husband and father, or from the risks of his trade, the law frequently refuses to recognise the claim of those persons, even so far as to acknowledge them as creditors. It is therefore an interesting inquiry, What are the circumstances under which a wife or children may claim in bankruptcy? In this inquiry, after a short introductory view of the legal rights of wives and children, it may be proper to consider, 1. How far wives or children are entitled, on the ground of those legal provisions, to claim as creditors. 2. The claims of wives and children under special contract and obligation.

MARRIAGE has in contemplation the rights of three several parties—the husband, the wife, and the children; and the first effect of it is to raise a community in all things of present use, which are formed into a common fund under the husband's administration, for the use of the family during the marriage, and for rateable division on its dissolution. The husband's right of administration is so uncontrolled, that he may be called not improperly the dominus or proprietor of this common fund, while the marriage subsists. His acquisitions augment the fund, his debts diminish it; and the benefit which the wife and children derive from the one operation, is counterbalanced by what they suffer from the other. The communio bonorum comprehends moveables; bonds personal in particular circumstances; and generally the whole personal estate, with two exceptions: first, of such effects as have been given to the wife, expressly excluding the jus mariti; and, secondly, of paraphernalia, in regard to which the jus mariti is by implication excluded.

The respective shares of the common stock contributed by the husband and wife return, on the dissolution of the marriage, to them or their representatives, if the marriage has been dissolved within year and day, and without a living child.¹

If the marriage have subsisted during year and day, or if a living child have been produced, the common fund, from whatever source derived, is divided into two or into three shares, as children exist or not at the dissolution of the marriage.

The JUS RELICTÆ is the wife's share of the goods in communion. Besides the paraphernalia, and such effects or moneys as may be secured exclusively to the wife, this right extends to half of the common stock, if there be no children alive at the dissolution of the marriage; to one-third, if there be children. To this share the wife is entitled, although she should also have a conventional provision from her husband, provided she has not, in accepting such provision, bound herself to renounce her legal provision.²

The LEGITIM is the share which belongs to the children of the father's free moveable estate at his death; and so, although the father cannot by will divest the children of this right, in which they are quasi creditors, yet they have not a jus crediti to the effect of standing in competition with the debts of their father, which must be paid before the legitim is demandable.

The nature of the interest which the wife and children hold by operation of law in the common fund is such, that this fund is chargeable with all the debts of the husband and father, and that both the present subsistence and the future provision of the wife and children are to come out of the fund, only after the debts are paid.

SECTION I.

CLAIMS BY WIFE OR CHILDREN WHERE THERE IS NO SPECIAL CONTRACT.

There are two situations to be distinguished : one where the marriage has been [633] dissolved within year and day without issue ; another, where the connection has been more permanent, or has produced children. This is a distinction which it is not very easy to justify. It seems to be peculiar to Scotland, but it has been established by long usage ; and although the Court has refused to extend the principle to questions not already settled,² the distinction to a certain extent is now unquestionable.

SUBSECTION I.—OF MARRIAGE DISSOLVING WITHIN YEAR AND DAY WITHOUT ISSUE.

When it happens that the marriage has been dissolved within year and day, and without a living child, the relationship is not by the law regarded as of a character so permanent that the terce or courtesy, the jus relictæ, or the jus mariti, are to have effect. All things return, in this event, as much as possible to their former state. The wife can claim neither terce nor jus relictæ. The husband yields up the possession of his wife's heritage, and is bound to restore to the representatives of the wife (and his estate on his death or insolvency will be liable to the claim) the tocher, and all the wife's moveable funds which he has received on occasion of the marriage, whether by the mere operation of law or by convention and marriage contract.³ The general rule, even as to conventional provisions, is, that they become void on the dissolution of the marriage within the year, and without issue. But, 1. It may be effectually stipulated otherwise ; 2. It is a quæstio voluntatis whether such be truly the intention of the parties.⁴

But, in particular cases, the husband, or his estate, will, in accounting to the wife or her representatives, be entitled to deductions. 1. What has bona fide been consumed of the wife's moveable estate, will be allowed to the husband or his estate.⁵ Yet it is not easy to conceive a practical example of this, if it be true that there is no deduction given for sums by which the tocher has been diminished for the wife's maintenance during the marriage.⁶ 2. Deduction will be allowed of the expense of the wife's marriage clothes, or other debts of hers before marriage, paid by the husband ; and of her funeral.⁷

On the other hand, the wife is entitled to claim the expense of mournings on her husband's death, as being one of the husband's family,⁸ to whom, in decent respect, mournings should be furnished ; and this holds not only where the husband dies solvent, but also [634] against his creditors. For although there is in the Dictionary a short note of a case finding

² Lowther v M'Lain, 1786, M. 435, Hailes 1012. M'Lain of Lochbuy died within a year after his marriage with Miss Lowther, and without issue. There was no tocher, and no marriage contract. She claimed neither terce nor jus relictæ, but aliment against her husband's heir, a distant relation. The Court refused to extend the principle of the customary rule to a case not already subjected to it, and sustained the claim of aliment.

[The distinction in question is abolished by 18 Vict. c. 23, sec. 7 ; and it is declared that the whole rights of the survivor, and of the representatives of the predecessor, shall be the same as if the marriage had subsisted for the period of year and day.]

a claim for widow's mournings not good against the husband's creditors,¹ and Mr. Erskine lays it down that none of these articles can be claimed if the husband have not left a fund sufficient for payment of his onerous debts, this doctrine was afterwards denied, and widow's mournings not only admitted, but held a privileged debt upon the funds of the deceased husband, in a competition with creditors.²

SUBSECTION II.—OF MARRIAGE SUBSISTING FOR A YEAR, OR PRODUCTIVE OF A LIVING CHILD.

In this case the law considers the connection as having taken full effect on the status and rights of the parties. In that situation it is held, that in respect of their rights at law (independently of marriage contract or special contract of separation), a man's wife and children have no title to claim in competition with his creditors; that they follow his fortunes during his life, and are entitled to partake only of that fund of subsistence which his debts may have left him; and after his death they can demand no more than a share of what remains after satisfying his creditors.

1. As to the interest of the WIFE, it is held: 1. That during the husband's life she can make no claim in bankruptcy for an aliment, independently of special contract.³ The common fund under the husband's administration being insolvent, the wife, as a partner, can claim nothing till the creditors be paid; and even where the wife has a land estate, the rents of which are taken by the husband's jus mariti as part of the goods in communion, the wife's aliment is not a burden on that common fund, to the effect of entitling her to claim exemption from the diligence of his creditors for any part of the rents of her own estate.⁴ 2. That if the marriage should be dissolved by the death of the husband, or by divorce, after insolvency, the wife can no more claim her jus relictæ, than she can in the case of his survivance claim an aliment. In both cases her share of the goods in communion has perished. 3. That if the husband, while solvent, shall be divorced for adultery, such dissolution of the marriage gives the wife a right to demand back her tocher; to insist for her conventional provisions, or for her jus relictæ; and to enjoy her terce, or locality, or jointure.⁵ For these claims she will be entitled, on his subsequent insolvency, to rank with other creditors. On the other hand, by dissolution of the marriage in consequence of the divorce of the wife, the husband, and of course his heirs, will be entitled to retain the tocher, and the wife's share of the goods in communion, and to enjoy the benefit of the courtesy. But it may be observed, in the first place, That the divorce being the dissolution of the society, no right afterwards arising to the guilty party can be claimed by the innocent.⁶ Secondly, That it may thus happen that a guilty husband, or his creditors, may be benefited by a share of moveable funds, which ought to belong solely to the innocent wife; and yet there seems no means of escaping from this unhappy consequence. And, thirdly, That the creditors of the husband may be exposed to injury by collusive proceedings for divorce, with a view of conferring on the wife, during the husband's life, what she otherwise could not have [635] insisted in against the creditors of her husband.⁷ 4. That if the wife should die during the husband's solvency, her representatives, whether her children or others, will have a jus crediti, which on his future insolvency will entitle them to compete with his other creditors for her share in the common fund extant at her death. This stands altogether on another footing from that on which the legal claims of the existing widow and children rest. From the moment of the wife's death, the husband is a proper debtor for her share; it remains with him as debtor: so that, though not claimed by the children or representatives of the wife, it will, on the husband becoming afterwards insolvent, entitle them to a dividend on its amount.

² Sheddan v Gibson, 1802, M. 11855. In this case the marriage had subsisted beyond year and day; but that does not seem to be of importance to the question, the claim for mournings to the widow standing on the same footing, whether the marriage has subsisted for a year or during a shorter period.

2. As to the interest of CHILDREN, they have no right whatever to claim as creditors of their father, on account of the legitim. This, at all events, is a provision which does not open till their father's death; and he has it fully in his power, in the meanwhile, to disappoint their spes successionis, the contraction of debt being a legitimate diminution of the fund of which the legitim forms a share. But even where he has died and left effects to be the subject of competition among his creditors, his children are not entitled to claim. They may claim as creditors in the case already observed, where their mother has died during the father's solvency, and left them her heirs; for, in her place, they are proper creditors of their father. But their legitim is not a jus crediti: it is nothing more than a right to share in the free fund left by the father. They cannot compete with creditors for their legitim.

In some degree, upon the same distinction, depends the difference between the claim for aliment of a lawful child and that of an illegitimate one. The mother of a lawful child can claim nothing for its aliment, for they have both combined their fortunes with the bankrupt. But in the case of an illegitimate child, there is a direct obligation on the part of the father towards the mother, to contribute to the support of their child. The mother must otherwise, from her own funds or earnings, maintain the fruit of their illicit intercourse, while she has not by marriage united her fortunes with those of the father of her child. It may be said that the same principle might entitle the mother of a legitimate child, who out of her own peculium has supported that child, to claim the aliment from the husband's estate. But the difference is this, that there is no contract or obligation, as in the other case, that the father shall relieve the mother of this spontaneous or charitable aliment; and that where she maintains the child, she does so on her own account alone, and from no hope of reimbursement out of a fund which is already dissipated.

SECTION II.

CLAIMS BY WIFE OR CHILDREN UNDER SPECIAL CONTRACT.

Such claims may be grounded on the following deeds: 1. A contract of marriage. 2. A contract of separation. 3. A bond of provision.

SUBSECTION I.—CLAIMS UNDER CONTRACTS OF MARRIAGE, AND BONDS OF PROVISION.

The first question that naturally occurs on such a deed, relates to its effect in superseding those provisions which the law itself confers. And, first, As to heritage, the legal [636] provision of terce is superseded by a settlement made and accepted of.¹ But the same rule does not hold as to the courtesy: it must be expressly excluded.² Secondly, As to moveables, express provisions in a marriage contract do not exclude the jus relictæ.³ Another question may arise, in respect to marriage contracts, where the parties were minors at entering into them. A minor is by the law of Scotland capable of marriage; and the marriage, with its legal consequences, will stand good against all challenge on the head of minority and lesion. Redress may on this ground be obtained against special stipulations in a marriage contract, if hurtful to the interests of the minor.⁴ But this will not entitle the party to relief from the effect which would follow as the legal consequence of marriage,¹ nor against a rational and fair contract or settlement.²

Marriage contracts are either antenuptial or postnuptial; and the former stand on a very different footing, relatively to creditors, from the latter.

I. ANTENUPTIAL CONTRACTS OF MARRIAGE.—The great motive to the executing of a contract of marriage, in circumstances in which questions with the husband's creditors are likely to occur, is distrust of the husband, or dread of the risks to which he is exposed. The chief object is to stipulate an exception to that rule of the common law, by which the wife, for herself and her children of the marriage, adopts the fortunes of the husband; and to provide against extravagancy or insolvency, either by an absolute security, which shall exclude creditors, or by constituting a jus crediti which shall entitle the wife or children to rank with other creditors upon the common fund in bankruptcy. The principle on which such contracts are effectual against creditors is, that they are onerous contracts, as forming essential conditions of the marriage; that the wife is held on no other terms to have conveyed, as by marriage she does, all her moveable property in possession or in possibility to the husband, nor even to have made him master of her person; and that the children would not have existed, but on the faith of the provisions made for them. But the onerosity of the consideration is not enough to give to the wife or children the character of creditors. In order that the contract may be effectual against creditors, there must be a real security constituted, or a jus crediti raised, by means of a distinct obligation. No part of conveyancing is more difficult than this. The terms are so various in which such contracts have been conceived, that to frame a marriage contract so as to protect a wife and children against the folly, extravagance, or insolvency of the father, requires much discrimination. The several kinds of provision by which this is attempted to be accomplished, as they appear in competitions of creditors, deserve particular attention; but only a few general cases can be taken notice of in this work.

1. Antenuptial provisions in favour of the WIFE, to come in place of her legal provisions, may be either with real security, or by personal obligation merely. 1. By marriage contract, the wife's terce and jus relictæ may be excluded, and the husband may assign to her particular lands, either for her possession, or to afford her a certain annuity. Where the wife is infeft in lands for her liferent use and possession, her right is a proper liferent; and [637] the lands are called her LOCALITY LANDS.³ Where she has an annuity heritably secured, either by HERITABLE BOND and infeftment, or by an infeftment on a BOND OF ANNUITY, it is called a JOINTURE. Sometimes the husband binds himself to invest, and afterwards, in implement of the contract, does invest, money in land or real security, taken to himself and his wife, in conjunct infeftment, according to the great variety of distinctions already spoken of.⁴ In all those cases, the infeftment in favour of the wife, either proceeding on the contract of marriage or on a separate deed, if not objectionable under the bankrupt statutes, confers on her a real right, which excludes creditors and gives her a preference.⁵ 2. If the husband's titles be not made up, or if any other impediment prevent the completion of the real right under the contract, the wife may by marriage articles be made a creditor, to the effect of ranking with the other creditors, and to the effect of sustaining any deed made in implement of the obligation, which shall not be exposed to objection on the bankrupt statutes. 3. Although it may not be intended that the wife shall have the benefit the husband was secretly insolvent and unable to fulfil the counter provisions.

reciprocal conveyance by marriage contract of the liferent of the husband and of the wife's estates, was found, on the husband dying insolvent, and on a judicial sale of his lands, to give the wife a right to the rents from the husband's death down to the sale, and to the interest of the balance of the price afterwards.

of a real security, or although the husband may not have the means of giving such security, she may still have constituted in her favour a jus crediti, so as to entitle her to rank as a creditor for her eventual liferent after her husband's death, provided the provision be precise and clear. The most usual provision is of a certain yearly sum or annuity, to be paid to the wife on her husband's death, with a renunciation of her legal provisions. This in England makes a contingent debt, depending on the wife's survivance, and cannot therefore be made the ground of an effectual claim in bankruptcy;¹ insomuch that even where the contingency has been purified by the death of the husband after bankruptcy, the courts have found themselves constrained to refuse the claim, as the debt did not arise till the husband's death after bankruptcy, though before distribution.² In Scotland there is no obstruction to the ranking of a contingent debt; and a wife holding a provision importing a jus crediti in her favour, will be ranked along with the other personal creditors for the value of her survivance, so as to have the dividend set aside; the intermediate profits of it to be paid to her husband's creditors, and the dividend itself secured for her use in the event of her survivance. At one time it was contended that, considering the embarrassment under which a wife is placed in doing diligence to secure her jus crediti, she was entitled to a preference or privilege over other creditors; but this was solemnly argued, and a wife found to have no preference but such as she may have established by diligence;³ and such claim of preference was rejected, even with regard to the wife's liferent of the whole or part of the household furniture.⁴

Even in antenuptial contracts, if the husband is at the time insolvent, the provision to the wife will not be sustained beyond the limits of a reasonable and moderate allowance. On this ground, a husband having in his second marriage contract given an exorbitant jointure to his second wife, the Court held it to be restrictable in a question with the heir of the first marriage.⁵ But it would seem that this rule must be restricted to the case of a manifestly exorbitant provision: for a man, though truly insolvent, may appear to be in a situation where the provision made is moderate, and where on that belief the [638] marriage has been contracted. In judging of this matter, the wife's situation and fortune are chiefly to be regarded; but they are by no means to be taken as the sole grounds on which to proceed.⁶

The greatest difficulty is to provide for the wife's subsistence during the husband's survivance in a state of bankruptcy. The only precaution absolutely to be relied on against the insolvency of a husband, and in virtue of which a wife can claim the benefit of a subsistence during the husband's life, is the appropriation of special estates or funds to the use of the wife, with an exclusion of the jus mariti in case of insolvency. Thus, 1. The wife's father may settle on her either heritable or moveable property, with an exclusion of the jus mariti; and this will effectually protect the property, and the rents of it, from the husband's creditors. 2. The father may constitute a trust, and convey to the trustee his property, heritable or moveable, with an exclusion of the jus mariti, in case of the husband's insolvency. And in such a case, even if the wife herself be named as trustee, the creditors of the husband will not be entitled to attach the property as his.⁷ 3. The wife herself may executed a settlement after his daughter's marriage to James Scott, whereby he disposed his whole property to her in trust, for behoof of herself in liferent, for aliment and support of herself and her numerous family of children during her life, and after her death for behoof of her three sons, etc.; and he provided, that in case of James Scott her husband's insolvency, his jus mariti should be debarred and excluded, and his administration of the said estate, heritable and moveable, and of the rents, annualrents, and other produce and profits of the same; and that the same should neither be liable nor subjected to the payment of his debts, implement of his deeds, or before marriage constitute a trust, which will preserve for her use the fund so set apart.¹

4. It seems not incompetent for the husband so to dispose of a part of his estate, as to secure to the wife and family a fund of subsistence effectual against all debts subsequent to the transaction. Thus, in implement of a stipulation in the marriage contract (or while he is solvent), a husband may grant a lease, taking the rents payable to a trustee, who shall bind himself to pay a certain sum to the wife as an alimentary provision, excluding the jus mariti.

5. By antenuptial marriage contract, the jus mariti may be excluded with regard to any particular subject belonging to the wife, although it cannot be excluded per aversionem. Thus, lands may be let and the rents conveyed to the wife, for her and her children's aliment, excluding the jus mariti; or a sum may be set apart, and invested, or lent out on bond, etc. to the wife, excluding the jus mariti; or an annuity may be purchased to the wife for her aliment, with an exception of the jus mariti; or a sum may be secured, or a bond may be taken jointly to the husband and wife, in liferent alienably for her alimentary use, the interest and rents not to be affectable by the husband's debts.² These provisions, however, cannot be effectually made by a postnuptial deed, which not having the character of an onerous contract, the provision, though made during solvency, is revocable as a donation, and is held by the contraction of debts to be revoked.³ But, 6. It is quite incongruous to attempt to give to the husband the command of his funds, and at the same time secure the wife and [639] children against the effect of his insolvency. It is impossible, for instance, to convey or pay over to the husband any debt or sum of money, leaving him in the full administration of it during his solvency, and at the same time effectually to provide that on bankruptcy the jus mariti shall, in relation to such fund, stand excluded.⁴ At least such declaration certainly would not give preference on the general fund, or qualify the right even to the particular sum, unless by the very nature or import of the conveyance it stood limited. If, however, a bond were taken to the husband, as trustee for his wife and children, excluding his jus mariti on insolvency, there seems to be reason for holding that his right would be qualified with that condition. 7. There can be no legal objection against a provision to a wife before marriage, or in the marriage contract, by which, to the extent of a moderate and reasonable aliment, she shall be entitled to rank as a creditor on the estate, to the effect of securing a fund for her aliment. But in order to accomplish this, it would be requisite to bind the husband either to aliment the wife; or failing thereof, to pay to her a certain annuity, or to invest a certain sum sufficient to produce the stipulated aliment; or perhaps to declare, that on failure to aliment the wife, she, or the trustees in the marriage contract, should be entitled to redemand payment of the tocher. 8. It may be important to secure a future provision by means of insurance, when the husband's funds are not sufficient to give direct security. It would seem that an effectual obligation may be constituted, by antenuptial contract of marriage, to pay annually the premium of a life insurance for securing such a provision to the wife; at least to the effect of making the premium affectable by the diligence of his creditors. On Scott's bankruptcy his creditors attached some of the moveable funds which had come from the father; and the Court held, that A. Chessels' heritable subjects, and also his moveables and executry funds, were vested in Helen Chessels, his daughter, in trust, for the purposes mentioned in the deed of settlement, and were not affectable by James Scott or his creditors; and that when James Scott became bankrupt, his right of administration of the said subjects ceased, and that the rents and annualrents that fell due thereafter belonged to Helen Chessels and her children, in terms of A. Chessels' settlement, and were not affectable by James Scott's creditors. Affirmed in the House of Lords, 23 March 1775, 2 Pat. 369.

during the husband's life a debt claimable on the principle of an annuity, so that a dividend may be drawn for it. But no security can be given for the regular payment of the premium, unless the obligation be fortified by heritable bond or other security. If a policy were opened in name of the wife and children, and the premium regularly paid under such antenuptial contract, the benefit of the insurance would certainly not be demandable by the creditors as part of the husband's estate; while a claim would lie for the future premiums at the instance of the wife.

2. Provisions in favour of CHILDREN, by antenuptial contract of marriage, are, on the principle already stated, onerous deeds. But it will depend entirely on the conception of the provisions, whether they shall be effectual to confer a preference, or even to entitle the children to rank as creditors. In relation to the provisions to children, the infinite variety of marriage contracts may be reduced to two classes: one, in which the children have the character merely of heirs of the marriage, with a spes successionis defeasible by onerous deeds only; another, in which they have vested in them the character of proper creditors.

(1.) In the ordinary marriage contract, the children are heirs, not creditors. The common course is, to invest the estate or money to be settled in favour of the husband and wife in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the children to be born in fee; or certain provisions are settled on the children, payable at the first term after the death of the father. In these cases the children are not properly creditors, i.e. they cannot stand in competition against the onerous debts or deeds of the father, though they may reduce gratuitous alienations to their prejudice.¹ 1. A jus crediti, in opposition to a spes successionis, requires the children to be clothed with the character and the right of creditors during the father's life, and is not conferred unless by an obligation to pay during his life, either the principal, or at least the interest.² This doctrine, laid down by our older authorities, has been held as fixed in certain cases to be immediately stated; and in a very recent and very strong case, it has been [640] directly confirmed, and may now be held as settled law.³ 2. It has no effect in conferring a jus crediti on the children, that instead of the husband being simply bound to pay a sum to the children, he engages to provide and secure a sum so payable. 3. When he actually lends out the money, or constitutes a trust, or grants heritable security to the wife, or any other person, in the name of the children, and binds himself in absolute warrandice, he constitutes a fee in the children, which will prevail against creditors.⁴

Although such provisions are not effectual against creditors, it may sometimes be an important question, what effect they shall have against the voluntary acts of the father. And, 1. The father has no right gratuitously to disappoint the heir of the marriage, if the ² See particularly Strachan v Crs. of Strachan, 1754, 5 Brown's Sup. 274.

³ Brown v Govan, 1 Feb. 1820, 20 Fac. Coll. 94. Here a marriage contract was prepared, but not extended nor signed till some months after the marriage, when it was signed, and the wife's tocher paid. By the draft of the contract, the husband bound himself to pay to the child or children to be procreated, at majority or marriage, the sum of £1200, in certain proportions, with the lawful interest of the said sum from the time at which the same shall fall due, and thereafter during the non-payment; and in implement of this obligation, he further conveyed certain subjects to the wife, as trustee for herself and the children, with procuratory and precept. In the testing clause of the deed, awkwardly introduced, and subscribed only by the husband and wife, is a declaration that the £1200 before provided shall not be payable till twelve months after the said R. Lang's decease, notwithstanding any prior declaration to the contrary, and shall only bear interest after that period till paid. Lang failed after the infertment had been taken on the deed; and the children, who were infants, claimed on his sequestrated estate alternatively, first, a preference under the infertment; or, secondly, at least to be admitted as creditors to draw a dividend along with the rest. The Court ordered the question to be heard in presence, and decided against the children, finding, 1. That the declaration in the testing clause was ineffectual to control the expressions in the body of the deed; 2. That the provision not being payable during the father's life, and interest being made to run only from the term subsequent to his death, the children had no jus crediti, but were merely heirs, having a spes successionis defeasible by the contraction of debt; and, 3. That the heritable security, with the warrandice, partook as an accessory of the nature of the principal right, and was not to be held as indicating a jus crediti.

destination be to heirs of the marriage, and the subject be heritable.¹ 2. With consent of the heir of the marriage, the father may gratuitously alter the destination, although it may by possibility happen that the heir may predecease his father.² 3. If the provision be conceived in favour of the children of the marriage; or if, being a moveable estate, it is taken to the heirs of the marriage; the whole children have right, but subject to a reasonable power of distribution by the father.³ 4. If by the marriage contract the right of the heir or children be in any point or respect free from restraint, the father cannot gratuitously burden and restrain it.⁴

(2.) The other class of cases is, where due care is taken to invest the children with a preferable right, or to clothe them at least with the character of creditors. This is to be done by giving to the children a proper right of fee in the land estate,⁵ or by granting to them, or some one for them, an obligation prestable during the father's life. Thus the father's [641] right may be restricted to a mere liferent; or he may bind himself not to contract debt to the prejudice of the children's right; or to infest them at a certain term which may happen during his life; or to pay money at a term which may exist during his life; or to pay interest from a certain term which may be during his life.⁶ In several cases this doctrine has been well settled. In one case the children were held to have a jus crediti, in circumstances where it rather appears that the debt was not due till after the father's death.⁷ But in so far as that case may be held to rest on the above ground, it was expressly disapproved of in the next case that occurred. Here the father had bound himself and his creditors 'to pay to the younger children certain sums, the whole to be divided, in certain events, by such proportions as he should appoint by a writing; or, failing such division, equally.' They were payable to the respective children 'on their marriage or majority, the father being bound to maintain them until one or other of these events should arrive;' but although some of the judges were much influenced by the decision in the case above referred to, the children were, by a great majority, held not entitled to enter into competition with their father's creditors.⁸ In a still later case, the circumstance of the father being bound

Here the words were sufficient to constitute a fee in the children; but in taking infestment on the contract of marriage, the infestment in favour of the children was forgot. In a competition with the father's creditors, the children were held to have a personal right only, and so entitled to rank as creditors merely, without any preference.

⁶ Ersk. iii. 8. 40.

⁷ Henderson's Crs. v his Children, 1759, M. 10179. Here the decision may be reconciled with the doctrine of the other cases, by the circumstance that the judges seem to have held the provision as payable during the father's life. In so far as it was not so held, and yet the children considered as creditors, the decision is not to be relied on.

seemed to be good ground for rejecting the pretensions of the children to rank as creditors; and that this being a single case, decided by a small majority, it could not bind the Court against the true principle. The Justice-Clerk, who was a great lawyer, said that every man being sui rei arbiter, he may bind down his property, but he must do so in very clear terms; and where it is in favour of children nascituri, the obligation must be absolute, unconditional, and to a day—such as can be put in force against himself. But in the case under consideration, the contract was not such as could have been put in force against the father, and therefore the children cannot be held as creditors. Lord Braxfield concurred in this opinion, and, considering the object of the provisions in the contract, he did not find them such as either could or were intended to subject the father during his own life, which always requires strong words. He was clear that it never was intended to give a claim against the father; and therefore that the pretensions of the children to the character of creditors could not be supported. He said he would have been against the judgment in Henderson's case. Lord Eskgrove said that he had drawn up the report of Henderson's case, which was certainly intended to fix the law, but was decided by a small majority. He added that he would in that case have voted with the minority, and that this case is not different. MS. Notes of Mr. Ross, Dean of Faculty. See Strachan's case, supra, p. 685, note 2. to pay interest, was held to make the children creditors.¹ This question may be further illustrated by the cases cited below.²

The principle on which the engagements of the parties to an antenuptial contract of marriage are held onerous, extends to the case of parents providing sums or estates in the marriage contract of their sons or daughters. A provision of this kind by a father will confer an effectual jus crediti, although made payable during the father's life.

II. POSTNUPTIAL CONTRACTS OF MARRIAGE.—These stand in a different situation from antenuptial contracts. In the latter, the provisions to the wife make it an essential condition of the marriage that she shall not follow entirely the fortunes of her husband, but be entitled to rely on those provisions; and the provisions to the children are the [642] conditions on which alone those interested in their future existence have consented to that contract from which they were to spring. In postnuptial contracts the wife and children are already wedded to the condition of their husband and father, and can take nothing against his creditors, unless what he during his solvency can legally give away.³

1. As to the WIFE's provisions under a postnuptial contract, it has been held: 1. That if granted while the husband is solvent, an allowance to her will be effectual to the extent of a moderate provision.⁴ 2. That even if granted after the contraction of debt, and in circumstances which would expose a merely gratuitous deed to challenge, the natural obligation to aliment a wife will sustain the provision to a moderate extent. This, perhaps, does not quite accord with the principle by which this sort of case should be ruled. 3. That where an antenuptial provision has been made, and afterwards a postnuptial, followed by insolvency, the wife may avail herself of the postnuptial provision as in implement of the first one.⁵ 4. A provision to be restricted on the existence of children may occasion a competition between the creditors and the children for the sum arising from the restriction. The rule seems to be, that where the original provision would have been effectual had there been no children, such children as hold a jus crediti are entitled to it; and that the creditors are to be preferred only where the provision is exorbitant.⁶

2. Postnuptial provisions to CHILDREN are, like those to wives, either in implement of

⁴ Lady Campbell v Crs. of Sir James Campbell, 26 July 1744, Kilk. 51. Sir James Campbell, after contracting debts above the value of his estate, married with an antenuptial contract; but some months afterwards granted to his wife a liferent heritable bond of annuity for £100, on which she was infeft. In a question with the creditors, the Court restricted the annuity to £50. 'Some of the Lords were of opinion that when a woman marries without a contract, upon the faith of the legal provision, any postnuptial provision is a gratuitous deed, and as such reducible at the instance of prior creditors; and that, were it otherwise, there were nothing to hinder any man who had married without a contract, after he knew himself insolvent, to settle a provision on his wife preferable to all his personal creditors.' But the opinion which prevailed was, 'That marriage itself is an onerous cause, which yet will not be sufficient to sustain the provision any further than what may be a moderate subsistence; for so far only the husband is under obligation. And as to the case supposed of a husband's settling a provision upon his wife after he knew himself to have become insolvent, even in that case it was thought the provision might be sustained to the effect of a subsistence.' 'But be that as it may,' continues Lord Kilkerran in his report, 'the present case was thought different. As in the supposed case there is more an appearance of fraud than in the present case, where there was no change of the husband's circumstances between the marriage and the time of granting the provision; and as it was not controverted but at the marriage he might have granted a provision; it was thought to be straining too hard to say he could give none thereafter, although no change had happened in his circumstances.' Kilk. 51. ⁵ Sir Rod. M'Kenzie v Monro, 1738, M. 958. In Campbell v Sommervil, 1778, M. 1000, the wife having claimed both provisions, the Court held the liferent right to be, in a question with creditors, a security merely for the previous provision.

the natural obligation of a father, or in fulfilment of a prior obligation. 1. A provision subsequent to debts is not supported by being in implement of the natural obligation. The children can claim only according to the father's ability.¹ 2. It will depend on the [643] nature of the obligation, or its date, whether the provision in implement is onerous. As, in order to vest a child with the character of creditor, the deed must precisely bind the father himself during his life, and not merely give a hope of succession; so, unless the previous deed be of this nature, it will not be held as a just and necessary cause of a specific postnuptial provision. A father, if solvent, may after marriage bestow upon his wife or children the character of creditors, so as to support a conveyance made after insolvency. But the onus probandi of solvency will lie on the claimant.²

The aliment of a natural child is not properly speaking, perhaps, a debt to the child; but a debt arises to the mother of the child, who must maintain it if she is able, and who is entitled to relief against the father for one-half. It would seem, therefore, that this is a debt which would, in a competition of creditors, serve as a justification of any bond or security granted for the child's aliment.³

SUBSECTION II.—CLAIMS IN CONSEQUENCE OF CONTRACTS OR DECREES OF SEPARATION.

SEPARATION is different from divorce. The marriage subsists; and it is doubtful whether the aliment assigned to the wife be in the nature of a debt for which she can rank on the husband's estate.

Separation is either voluntary, by contract between the parties, or judicial. It may also be by decret-arbitral, partaking both of the voluntary and of the judicial character. Considered as a departure from the contract to consort together, and to unite stocks for present use, and as a division in future of the common stock, so as to afford a separate subsistence to the wife, a judicial separation during solvency (which is not revocable at the pleasure of the husband), or a separation by decret-arbitral (which is on the same footing), will effectually give the wife a jus crediti or a preference, according as her aliment may have been secured by real right, or left on the personal obligation of the husband.⁴ Even a voluntary separation, or separation bona gratia, as it is called, has been held to produce the same effect; voluntary contracts of separation, though revocable, not being, like a mere donation, presumed to be revoked by the contraction of debt inconsistent with its subsistence. They can, during the marriage, be revoked only by a return to the married state: for that proper purpose the law allows either party to revoke, but not where they are still to live apart.⁵

¹ Falconer, 1736, Elchies, Aliment, No. 3. It was found that even where a contract of marriage bore an obligation on the father to aliment his daughter till the time stipulated for the payment of her provision, this obligation being only exegetical of his natural obligation, could produce no effect against creditors.

Mr. Erskine expresses the rule in this way: 'Provisions to children already existing are, in the judgment of law, gratuitous, and, of consequence, may be annulled in a competition with creditors if the granter was not solvent.' Ersk. iv. 1. 34. Perhaps it would have been more correct had he said, that 'postnuptial provisions to children are, in the judgment of law, gratuitous,' etc.

² Mausewell's case, 1677, M. 961.

³ Ballantyne v Dunlop, 1814, 17 F. C. 569, where the father seems to have been solvent.

⁴ Brown v M'Gregor, 22 Jan. 1820, 20 Fac. Coll. 56. Here M'Gregor and his wife agreed to a voluntary separation for all the days of their joint lives, unless they shall afterwards agree to live together again, and to refer to arbitration the aliment to be paid for the wife, and the sum for buying furniture, etc. The arbiter, on an inquiry into the husband's circumstances, awarded £80, under condition that, if security were given for £50, the award for £80 should cease. This seems to have been merely a mode of enforcing the giving of security. The £80 were paid for several years, and then an heritable bond for £50 was granted, on which the wife was infert. M'Gregor failed, and a question arose with the creditors, in the shape of an action of reduction by the trustee under the sequestration. Lord Reston, and afterwards Lord Pitmilley, held the bond effectual, and the Court affirmed this judgment.

⁵ See preceding note. See the opinion of the Court in Palmer v Bonnar, 25 Jan. 1810, 15 F. C. 535.

After dissolution of the marriage, the contract may, as a donation, be revoked. Dickson v Hunter, 1827, 5 S. 266, N.

Against creditors these contracts are effectual only if the husband be solvent, and if there be no fraudulent use of this power; for it is a device obvious to be followed by [644] one about to break, in order to provide an effectual livelihood to his wife and children.

CHAPTER VII.

OF CLAIMS OF WARRANTICE.

WARRANTICE is an obligation or engagement accessory to transference, by which the person who transfers undertakes that what is conveyed shall be effectually transferred, and shall not be taken away or evicted by any one having a preferable right.

1. Although there be no express stipulation of warrantice, there is an implied convention, which varies in its force and extent with the nature of the conveyance to which it is accessory. 1. Where a full onerous consideration is given for the conveyance, the granter of the conveyance by implication undertakes absolutely that the transference shall be effectual; and this not merely to the effect of restoring the consideration given, but of indemnifying the grantee in all respects for the loss, who, in reliance on the efficacy of the conveyance, has employed in the purchase of it money which might profitably have been bestowed elsewhere.¹ 2. Where the right has been bestowed gratuitously in donation, or otherwise, the implied obligation is no more than that the granter shall do nothing inconsistent with the grant. 3. There is a middle case, in which the consideration given is not the full and adequate equivalent for an absolute transference, but still is onerous; and here the implied convention is, that whatever may be the uncertainty of the conveyance in other respects, at least no impediment or disappointment shall proceed from any past or future act of the granter.² The subject of transference being conveyed, as it truly is at the time, with all its risks and benefits,³ it follows: First, That loss arising from legislative acts, or legal responsibilities, fall not within the implied engagement.⁴ Secondly, That a debt is not warranted by implication against the debtor's solvency, the implied warrantice here being debitum subesse.⁵ Thirdly, That against rights affecting the subject, arising from vicinity, etc., there is no warrantice without special stipulation.⁶

2. Implied warrantice is superseded by express,⁷ which may be varied infinitely,

¹ So strong has this obligation been held, that where one had granted a disposition with conveyance to a procuratory and precept, as contained in a disposition to himself, and the donee had for ten years neglected to take infestment, which would have given him absolute security,—eviction having taken place by the completing of an heritable bond of the first seller, who had remained all this time unknown,—the disponent was found liable. Downie, 31 Jan. 1815, Fac. In the note to the late edition of Erskine, p. 274, the case of Elphinston in 1663 is stated as contrary to Auchintoul's, on which Erskine relies. But on the effect of a subsisting law it is conformable, although on the effect of a subsequent law a hearing was ordered. Watson's case in 1667 is also said to be opposite, but erroneously; for that merely decided that against a supervenient law warrantice gives no relief, for which Erskine correctly quotes it. Bonar's case in 1683 was a case of special warrantice against all evictions, dangers, perils, and inconveniences whatsoever. according to the agreement of the parties. Occasionally questions arise relative to the [645] deeds to be granted in fulfilment of articles of roup, or other contracts of sale, as to what warrandice shall be specified. This must depend either on the implied warrandice, or on the express stipulation of the contract which is to be implemented by the conveyance; and in order to avoid future disputes, the Court will interfere to direct the express clause which is to be granted.¹ It may, in particular, be a warrandice merely personal; or it may be real.²

The right of action on warrandice arises only on eviction.³ This, however, admits of exceptions: 1. Where the granter has made a second conveyance, which manifestly will be entitled to a preference, an action of warrandice will lie before eviction.⁴ 2. Where the person bound in warrandice is vergens ad inopiam, or real security has become unavailing, action seems to lie to corroborate the warrandice. 3. Where the eviction is saved by the expiration of the right warranted, but a claim still remains for damage or violent profits, action lies on the warrandice.⁵

The claim on eviction extends not merely to the restitution of the price or consideration paid, but to all loss sustained by the grantee, from a defect in his right, to the effect of making good the value of the right at the time of eviction, and repairing the injury suffered by want of it subsequently.⁶

When the claim of eviction is made, the grantee ought to give notice. If he do so, he is not bound judicially to defend the right.⁷ If he do not give notice, he takes the risk of the omission of any relevant defence.⁸

CHAPTER VIII.

OF INTEREST OF MONEY, OF DAMAGES, AND OF PENALTIES.

IN closing this inquiry concerning the nature of personal debts, there are certain claims that may be considered of an accessory nature, the foundation and effect of which it may be proper to explain.

Under this head may be considered: 1. Interest; 2. Damages; and, 3. Penalties.

SECTION I.

OF CLAIMS FOR INTEREST, SIMPLE AND ACCUMULATED.

The most obvious ground of a claim for interest is breach of engagement, in consequence of which the person who is to receive money suffers a loss, or fails to procure an expected and possible gain. Other grounds of a claim for interest arise from positive statute, or from contract, express or implied.

[646] I. OF INTEREST, NOMINE DAMNI.—In observing the difference between a claim for damage on breach of a pecuniary obligation, and a claim for damage on breach of an ordinary contract, it is obvious that the general principle upon which both depend is the same. Wherever one suffers loss by breach of contract, he by whose failure in his engagement the loss comes is bound to indemnify the suffering party; and the difference between DAMAGE in ordinary contracts, and INTEREST in pecuniary obligations, arises from the nature of the injury which the party in those several contracts may be supposed to have in contemplation at entering into the contract, as the inevitable consequence of failure. In contracts of Sale, Hire, Mandate, and others of that class, there are certain immediate consequences of breach of the engagement, which present themselves to the party as inevitably following such breach of contract. If a man engage to furnish to another, as purchaser, an hundred quarters of wheat, and fail in performance, he knows that the difference between the price at which the buyer was to be supplied by the contract, and the price at which he can purchase the corn elsewhere at market, is a direct damage or injury which the seller must repair; and therefore, in all such contracts, the damage forms a jury question, according to the circumstances necessarily incident to the contract. In pecuniary obligations there is not necessarily any particular injury or damage presented to the debtor, which he is to lay his account with as the inevitable consequence of breach of contract; but the evil suffered is the extent of the loss sustained, by not gaining the ordinary legal profits of money, or what is necessary to be paid in order to replace it from another source. This claim for interest on account of damage suffered is not repugnant even to the canon law; and where damage could be shown actually to have arisen from breach of engagement, a claim for it seems to have been allowed under that system. But according to the juster principles of Roman jurisprudence, not only an express breach of contract, but also an inconvenient delay in payment, gave a claim for interest.—Minus solvit qui tardius solvit nam et tempore minus solvitur. Since the prejudice against the taking of interest expired on the Reformation, the law of Scotland has been settled, that breach of contract, or mora in payment, raises this claim without any inquiry into actual damage, and estimating all losses arising from this cause by the same rule, viz. according to the legal rate of interest.¹

1. Interest on this ground is due, 1. On all bonds and obligations for the payment of money on a precise day, if that day should pass without payment.² 2. Where no precise term is fixed, and the day of payment is optional, a judicial or notarial demand raises thenceforward a claim for interest. 3. In debts not of precise obligation, but which are still illiquid, or on which interest is not originally due, the claim to interest lies as from the date of citation,³ or of decree establishing the debt.⁴ But an exception has been admitted in the case of the aliment of a bastard child defrayed by the mother while the father was abroad.⁵ 4. Where there is, by mercantile usage, a particular term of credit fixed, as in the sale of commodities, interest is held to be due from the expiration of the credit. And on the same principle, an underwriter has been held liable for interest on the amount of loss, which by usage ought to be settled within four months of the loss.⁶ A different rule has been [647]

Where interest is due abroad, it is given here, and at the same rate.³ 7. No interest is allowed on expenses of process, unless in very special circumstances.⁴

2. Before the spirit of the canon law had entirely ceased to influence our civil jurisprudence, there were some cases in which it seemed to the Legislature necessary to interpose, and expressly to declare, that breach of engagement, or mora in payment, should ground a claim for interest. These are the chief cases in which our institutional authors say that interest is due ex lege. 1. By several statutes, interest is declared to be due on bills of exchange, inland bills, and promissory notes, from their date in case of not-acceptance, or from the day of falling due if accepted.⁵ 2. Interest is also declared by statute to be due on debts for which the debtor has been denounced rebel, on letters of horning.⁶ And, 3. Interest is exacted on cess, after six months from the term of payment.⁷

II. OF CLAIMS FOR INTEREST ON CONVENTION, EXPRESS OR IMPLIED.—In cases where there has been no breach of contract, and no damage thence arising, interest is sometimes, from the nature of the transaction, and the express or implied agreement of the parties, held to be a part of the bargain. When the taking of interest by contract, reprobated by the canon law, came to be sanctioned, the general rule was hostile to the claim, unless the pactio was express. But in later times the exceptions introduced have been so numerous, that were a rule now to be laid down, it would be more correct, reversing the proposition of the ancient law, to say that interest is due in all cases where money is lent, or where the use of it is taken or retained; unless, from the circumstances of the case, there is ground in equity to hold that interest was not meant to be demanded.

1. EXPRESS STIPULATION OF INTEREST.—This is effectual, provided the rate of interest be restrained within the bounds prescribed by law. It must not in rate exceed five per centum per annum; nor must it be taken by anticipation, except in discounting bills under the custom of trade.⁸

2. IMPLIED CONTRACT.—By implied contract, interest is due, 1. Where one has levied moneys belonging to another, which bore interest in the hands of the former debtor. As, for example, if one who is due £100 assign to his creditor a bond for £200, and the creditor uplift the whole sum, he is held bound, without any express stipulation, to pay interest for what he shall so have received.⁹ So, an executor levying debts due to the deceased, which bore interest in the hands of the original debtor,¹⁰ is held liable for interest if he have taken [648] up the money without necessity; or at all events, from the time at which he ought fishery. She was lost in the Pentland Firth, and on 30th April a requisition was made for settlement of the loss by a bill at four months, as usual. There followed a litigation of nine years; and when the underwriters were at last adjudged to pay the loss, the question arose, whether they were bound to pay interest? The Court held interest due from the time when the loss should have been paid.

to have distributed the fund. 2. Interest is, by implied contract, due on a marriage portion; for it is intended to contribute forthwith to the wife's subsistence, or the expense of the marriage.¹ 3. On the ground also of implied contract, one who pays money for another, in consequence of his mandate, or as his factor or agent, is held entitled to full reimbursement of interest, as well as of the principal sum advanced.² 4. The doctrine is gradually extending, so as to recognise a claim of interest in all cases of loan and debt in which one enjoys the use of money belonging to another.³ 5. An agreement to pay the past interest is also held to imply an obligation for future interests;⁴ and where it has been the course of dealing between the parties to pay interest, an adherence to that course is implied. 6. By implied contract, interest is due on the price or value of any property, to the use and benefit of which the buyer enters, to the deprivation of the seller; and this without any regard to breach of contract or mora, but as the counterpart or consideration for the enjoyment of the fruits and profits.⁵ 7. On the same principle, where money has been used, and interest saved, or profit made by the use, the person reaping the benefit is presumed to have agreed to pay interest for the use.⁶ 8. A trustee or factor, who has money belonging to his principal in his hand, is liable either for full interest, or at least for bank interest, partly from implied contract, partly on the ground of neglect.⁷ And judicial factors are liable for interest upon such rents as they shall recover, or ought to have recovered.⁸ 9. All money obligations, taken to one in liferent and another in fee, imply interest as the sole liferent profit derivable from money so lent. Ersk. iii. 3. 79.⁹

Expenses of process do not bear interest till constituted by decree. But where [649] expense has been unjustly occasioned, the person immediately disbursing that expense may fairly be considered as in the condition of a cautioner for him who in the end is found truly to be debtor for that expense; and whatever he is under the necessity of paying before the close of the litigation, he ought in equity to be entitled to recover with interest. On this principle, interest was found due after a year from the date of the interlocutors finding expenses due.¹⁰ Interest has also been given on any considerable sum of expense necessarily Earl's death, moneys lodged in their hand by him were claimed by his heirs, and they refused to pay interest. The Court held that a factor was not obliged to pay interest instantly from the principal's death; but as soon as he knew how the money was to be disposed of, he was bound to lodge it in a bank. Judgment was given for bank interest from a year after the Earl's death.

N.B.—There seems no equitable ground for such indulgence; for the factor ought to have the money in bank, as the money of the principal, or to pay interest for it at the full rate.

¹⁰ Warner v Cuninghame, 29 May 1813, Fac. Coll. This case is not correctly reported. The Court allowed interest on the advanced years before the date of the judgment, as being truly a part of the actual expense.¹ And where the expense of extracting a decree of the Court of Admiralty had been paid several years before by the party found entitled to expenses, interest was allowed on the sum so paid.²

III. OF THE COMMENCEMENT AND TERMINATION OF INTEREST.—1. The rules for the COMMENCEMENT OF INTEREST are these: 1. Where there is an express agreement concerning the commencement of interest, it rules the case. 2. Otherwise, in the general case, interest runs from the stipulated day of payment. 3. Where the day of payment is optional, interest runs only from the day ascertained by the act declaring the option. So, in bills payable at sight, or so many days after it, the presentment regulates the running of interest; and this is fixed either by a date adjected to the acceptance or by a protest. Or where there is no evidence of the date of presentment, but only of the presentment having taken place, it will be held as of a date as early³ as circumstances render probable. So, a bill payable on demand will bear interest only from the protest,⁴ or citation in an action.⁵ 4. Interest runs upon arrears of cess from the expiration of six months after the term of payment.⁶ 5. Interest runs on money advanced by mandatories, etc., from the date of advance. The Court, by one decision, refused to extend this rule to law agents;⁷ and, by a later decision, found a law agent entitled to interest after a year from the date of the last article.⁸ 6. The price of property bears interest from the time the benefit of possession accrues to the purchaser, the price being a surrogatum for the subject; and while the rents are accruing to the purchaser, the running of interest is not stopped by any attachment, or by want of sufficient titles: it can be stopped only by consignment. 7. It is a frequent stipulation in contracts of partnership, that on the death or bankruptcy of a partner his interest in the stock shall be ascertained as at the date of the last balance; but for the conveniency of the company, and to prevent confusion from a sudden demand, the sum due is made payable at a future term, or sometimes by instalments; and it has been doubted whether interest runs [650] during the time between the date of the balance and the stipulated term of payment. According to the general rule, by which the money becomes the surrogatum of the share of company stock, which is a fund bearing profit, it would appear that, unless where the usage of trade or practice of the parties has made an exception, interest would be due.⁹ 8. Interest on merchants' accounts of furnishings begins on the expiration of the accustomed credit; or if there be no special custom to regulate it, from the date of citation when the money should have been paid. 9. Interest at the legal rate begins to run on sums lent on bottomry from the termination of the voyage. 10. Sums due by underwriters on policies of insurance have been found to bear interest from the time when the loss should have been settled.¹⁰

2. TERMINATION OF INTEREST.—As to the termination of the period during which expense found due by interlocutor in February 1802, and on the expense found due by interlocutor in February 1809, from and after the elapse of a year from the dates of those interlocutors. interest is to be calculated on the claims of creditors, the natural rule is, that interest shall continue to run till the day of payment. But, 1. There is a limitation established by statute where the claim is made against a CAUTIONER: the claim of interest in such a case is restricted to the period of seven years. 2. The rule suffers also a limitation on the peculiar principles of bankrupt law. On BANKRUPTCY, so far as the common fund is concerned, it lies dead in the hands of trustees, or at best bearing bank interest from the moment when the debtor's transactions are stopped; and from the same point of time the currency of interest should stop on the claims of the creditors. But, first, It is only in the law relative to mercantile bankruptcy that this rule has been followed in Scotland: it is enacted, that the trustee, in making up a state of the debts in sequestration, shall 'calculate interest on each up to the date of the first deliverance on the petition for sequestration.'¹ Secondly, The rule is confined, even in mercantile bankruptcy, to the claim as made against the divisible fund: as against the bankrupt himself, in using diligence against his person, as well as against any reversion which may be left of the sequestrated estate after paying the principal sums, with interest to the date of the first deliverance, interest is demandable according to the common rule.² And, thirdly, No provision restraining interest having been made for cases where there is no sequestration, they must be regulated by the rules of common law, in which there is no principle acknowledged that can bar the running of interest down to the very day of payment. It has been understood, indeed, that in judicial sales and ranking, not only are creditors entitled to interest after the bankruptcy, but to interest on the accumulated sum of principal and interest, down to the period when the price of the lands is payable. In distributing moveable funds under actions of multiplepounding, there is no stop to the currency of interest.

While the claims of all the creditors continue unaccumulated, it can very seldom be a matter of any consequence at what period the interest ceases to run against the inadequate fund, since examples are now so exceedingly rare of creditors who are not entitled to [651] interest. There is, however, an advantage to be gained by those who have got their debts accumulated; for the increase by the currency of interest is in a greater ratio than the legal interest.

IV. ACCUMULATION OF PRINCIPAL AND INTEREST.—Although the general rule of law be, that interest shall not be allowed upon interest, there are occasions on which accumulation is lawful. The principles of the doctrine of accumulation seem to be these:—

1. Interest does not, in the general case, ipso jure bear interest. Therefore, however long ARREARS OF INTEREST may have continued unpaid, they cannot without some voluntary or judicial operation be converted into a principal bearing interest. It is not even lawful in a loan to stipulate that, if the interest be not paid, it shall bear interest.³ It may appear

¹ 54 Geo. III. c. 137, sec. 45, also sec. 49.

² By 33 Geo. III. sec. 46, a provision was introduced respecting the surplus of the estate, the justice of which, and the soundness of principle on which it proceeds, were very questionable. Where there is a surplus, the case is no longer under the peculiar principles of bankrupt law. There is no ground for stopping the currency of the interest as against the bankrupt's reversion: it is as if there never had been a bankruptcy. But by the 46th section of the Act it was provided, 'That the surplus of the bankrupt's estate and effects that may remain after payment of his debts, computing interest as aforesaid (i.e. "up to the date of the first deliverance"), and the charges of recovering the estate and distributing the same, shall be paid or made over to him, or to his assignees or successor.' The English law had adopted the true principle, the creditors entitled to interest having right to it out of the reversion, not merely up to the date of the commission, but also to the day of payment. Cullen's Principles of Bankrupt Law 410, and cases there quoted. In the Act of Sederunt passed 14th December 1805, relative to the Act 33 Geo. III., this matter was regulated correctly; and now by the 49th section of the statute of 54 Geo. III. c. 137, sec. 49, the matter is placed upon that footing.

³ Where money is deposited in a bank, bearing interest according to the rule of indefinite payment, a draft generally made on the bank ought to be paid out of the interests that may have grown on the sum deposited, exhausting the deposit only in so far as there is no interest lying in the banker's hand. But bankers give deposit receipts to their customers; and when a sum is wanted, they require the receipt to be produced, and mark the draft on the back of it as a sum paid to account of the principal, by which means they keep in their hand the interest, as a dead fund on which no interest runs. Where, instead of such a receipt, the sum is entered in some degree inconsistent with the rule that interest bears no interest, that in JUDICIAL SALES and ranking the debts have been held as accumulated at the date of the payment of the price. This is not merely by the force of the decree of sale considered as a general adjudication; and yet it seems to be in some degree a mistake in principle to call this an accumulation. The true principle seems to be, that at the term of payment of the price, the dividends proportioned to the claims of each creditor are held as set apart for him, with all their accruing interests.¹ A proper accumulation produces the effect of a new currency of interest on interest, to all intents and purposes, so as even to affect personal funds and postponed creditors; but such accumulation cannot possibly be produced by a sale, which converts the subject into a price. The sole effect of this must be to change the claim and security of the creditor into a right to payment of the dividend corresponding with the full extent of debt then due; so that it operates as an accumulation only relatively to that particular subject.²

2. There is an exception to the above rule wherever the holder of the fund is under an obligation of DUTY TO LAY OUT and accumulate the interests. 1. A trustee is bound thus to lay out and accumulate funds as they arise or come into his hands, and is therefore chargeable with interest on interest periodically, from the time at which interests so arising ought to have been laid out.³ 2. A law agent, acting as a money factor, is bound to the same [652] duty of annual accumulation, in respect to funds entrusted to his management.⁴ 3. One who insists on retaining in his hands a sum placed with him, either as agent or even as debtor, is bound to the same duty of laying out and accumulating the interest annually, having no right to gain by what he retains in mere security.⁵ 4. One who by any fraudulent or illegal act, or breach of duty, withholds money, is bound to account for it with accumulated interest. So a tutor or curator is liable for interest on interest.⁶ So, a person who by a fraudulent transaction had obtained a discharge of a debt, on that transaction being reduced, was held liable for compound interest, by an accumulation every two years.⁷

3. Where a cautioner has been forced to pay a debt, consisting of principal and interest, the whole bears interest to him as a debt against the principal. But this is not properly an accumulation, or an exception to the general rule already laid down. It is in consequence only of the payment by the cautioner that he becomes a proper creditor of the principal debtor; and the amount of his debt is the sum of his advance. This rule was introduced by Act of Sederunt, in cases where the cautioner held a bond for relief of the principal, and in account, and a mere receipt to account is given, that account must be settled, as it would seem, on the principle of indefinite payments.

² Before 1693, the sale of a bankrupt's lands preceded the ranking. By the regulations 1695, art. 26, the ranking is ordered to precede the sale. In sales by apparent heirs, the sale has always preceded the ranking; and now, by the late sequestration statutes, the sale has been ordered to proceed with all possible expedition, whether the ranking be finished or not. Amid those changes disputes arose relative to the period of accumulation: sometimes the date of the decree of sale was contended for; sometimes that of the payment of the price; and sometimes, again, that of the decree of ranking. But it may be considered now as settled that the debts are converted into dividends at the term of payment of the price; the interest accruing on the dividend belonging, of course, to the creditor entitled to such dividend. See Brown v the York

Building Co., 17 Jan. 1792, M. 13339. And this seems to proceed, not on the principle of an actual judicial accumulation, as at the payment of the principal, but simply as a necessary consequence of the right of the creditor attaching to the price, and cutting off a proportional part as belonging to him.

all damage, etc.; and it was required as a condition, that the payment should be made on distress.¹ The modern practice has been, to allow cautioners in all cases to adjudge for principal and interest as accumulated, and bearing interest from the day of payment, even where the cautioner has paid without distress;² and this rule is consistent with the true principle, and there seems so little danger of abuse or collusion (which alone could be the reason of annexing the condition of distress), that no good objection occurs to this relaxation. Where the debt is secured by heritable bond, a cautioner for the regular payment of the interest, paying, and taking assignation to the security, is entitled under the penalty to rank for interest on the interest paid.³

4. By bond of corroboration, or other form of voluntary innovation, the accumulation may be made. This is equivalent to a payment and new loan of the whole sum. This cannot be done, as we have seen, by anticipation; nor can it be effectually accomplished after bankruptcy, under 1696, c. 5, or the late Acts.

5. By judicial proceedings the debt may be accumulated. 1. A decree for debt, however, does not accumulate the principal and interest. It is necessary to proceed to diligence in execution before that can be accomplished.⁴ 2. Denunciation and horning is by [653] 1621, c. 20, declared to have the effect of entitling the creditor to claim interest on the sums in the horning;⁵ and although interest on interest is not expressly mentioned, this is obviously implied, and so the statute has always been understood. The principle is well indicated in the preamble, that the creditor has done all in his power to recover his money; and that if the debtor still evades payment, he keeps the money as a principal sum, and cannot in justice clear himself by afterwards paying no more than he should have paid at first. 3. Adjudication, as an action of execution, terminates in a decree, either adjudging as much of the debtor's estate as should be equivalent to the principal sum, interest, and a fifth part more; or adjudging the debtor's estate, in general, redeemable on payment of the accumulated sum of principal, interest, and expenses: and therefore an adjudication has strictly and properly the effect of an accumulation. 4. The decree of judicial sale, at the instance of an apparent heir, has always been regarded as a general decree of adjudication for the behoof of all the creditors; and the same rule is now extended to the common decree of sale at the instance of creditors.⁶ But it has not yet been settled by Act of Sederunt, as the Court is empowered to do, at what period and in what manner the principal sums and bygone interest of the debts shall be accumulated. Certainly the general adjudication thus implied in the decree of sale, is not in strictness a decree of adjudication to the effect of accumulating the debt; for the debt is not mentioned in it, nor the accumulated sum specified. It is only by inference, and fictione juris, that a decree of sale is regarded as a general adjudication, and this merely for the beneficial purpose of preventing the acquisition of preferences by new diligence, on the part of individual creditors, after the estate has come into a course of liquidation and divi-

⁴ Campbell v E. of Galloway, 1802, M. App. Annualrent, No. 4. In this case there were circumstances which brought it rather under the rule above laid down, justifying a stricter rule of accounting. There was something of a trustee's duty incumbent on the debtor, and something also of an unjust opposition to a demand, suspending the operation of a judgment. Judgment had been given, in December 1789, for payment of a debt with interest. The case was kept depending in the Court of Session and House of Peers till 1794, when the judgment was affirmed. Having returned to the Court of Session on some undecided points, a demand was made to have the principal and interest accumulated; and the question arose, From what period interest should be given by accumulation? The Court was much divided, some judges being inclined to accumulate as at the date of the first decree, others to hold that no accumulation should be authorized. A middle course was taken, and the debt accumulated as at the time when the demand for accumulation was made, and when an interim decree for the principal and past interest might have been given.

⁵ This denunciation must be made at the head burgh of the creditor's residence. It is not enough that it be at the cross of Edinburgh, if the debtor reside beyond the county. Kames' Rem. Dec. 43.

sion.¹ 5. None of the diligences against moveables produce an accumulation; and in multiplepointings, the creditors are ranked for the principal, simple interest, and expense.

SECTION II.

OF CLAIMS FOR DAMAGES.

CLAIMS of damage may arise either from injuries inflicted, as by personal assault, libel, seduction, adultery, etc.; or from breach of contract; or from neglect of the due diligence which law requires in particular situations and contracts. In treating of particular contracts, something has already been said of claims of damage arising from breach of contract and from negligence.²

In questions of damage, the fact forms the chief point of inquiry, whether the injury was committed, or the covenant broken? whether, in consequence, a loss or injury has been occasioned? and what the amount of that loss is? But sometimes the case depends on questions of law of extreme nicety, both where the action is grounded on injury committed, and where it rests on breach of contract. In the latter class of questions particularly, it may be necessary to distinguish between the direct and the remote effects of the [654] disappointment; or between the actual and positive and the negative loss. Without entering upon these distinctions further than already touched upon, one or two observations may here be sufficient.

1. Questions of damages are now, by the recent statutes for regulating the Jury Court, to be sent to that court for determination, when the damage arises from injuries to the person, real or verbal; or from injury to moveables; or to lands where the title is not in question; or from breach of promise of marriage; or on account of seduction or adultery; or on account of delinquency, or quasi delinquency of any kind.³

2. A claim for damages may be made effectual in bankruptcy. Even in England, if the demand in the nature of damages be capable of being liquidated and ascertained at the time of the bankruptcy taking place, so that a creditor can swear to the amount, he may prove it as a debt under the commission. But in many respects, the law of England, in respect to claims of damages in bankruptcy, is so peculiar, and rests on grounds so artificial, that they are not to be resorted to in illustration of the rules of Scottish jurisprudence on this point. The object of the proceedings in bankruptcy with us, is to give to every creditor payment of his debt; and on the distribution of the estate fairly disclosed, to discharge the debtor of every possible claim existing at the time of the bankruptcy, whether liquid or unliquidated, whether presently due or only in future, whether pure or merely contingent. According to this simple and natural view, all claims of damages seem as competent in bankruptcy as ordinary claims of debts are, provided the damage has arisen previous to or in consequence of the bankruptcy. There may undoubtedly be a difficulty in so adjusting the claim as that the creditor shall be able to swear to a precise debt, until by judicial proceedings, compromise, or arbitration, the amount of the damage shall be ascertained. But although this may deprive the creditor of a vote in the deliberations of the creditors, or prevent him from grounding on his unliquidated claim an application for sequestration, it will not, according to the course of Scottish jurisprudence, or the tenor of the sequestration law, deprive him of his right to have his claim liquidated, and proved, and ranked, to the effect of receiving a dividend.

¹ It was accordingly agreed by the judges, in the case of Brown v York Building Co., 1792, M. 13339, that the decree of sale was not to be held as an accumulation of the debts of the several creditors.

² See above, Of Contracts of Sale, pp. 477-8; Of Diligence Prestable, p. 482, etc.

³ 59 Geo. III. c. 35, sec. 1; 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, sec. 28. [But see the provisions of the Court of Session Evidence Act, 1866.]

3. However hard the situation may be out of which a claim of damages arises, the bankruptcy itself is not one of the elements to be taken by a jury in assessing a higher sum of damages. The debt due is properly the amount of the loss suffered; and although, in some cases of damages, the person responsible will be adjudged to pay for the injury according to the measure of his fortune, the mere circumstance of unexpected insolvency ought not, on the one hand, to mitigate the damages; and the consideration of his paying only a dividend ought not, on the other, to be suffered to enlarge the verdict as against the other creditors.¹

SECTION III.

OF PENALTIES.

Penalties are annexed, first, To obligations to perform, or not to perform, a particular act; or, secondly, To money obligations. They are intended in the former case either to enforce, by more than the usual consequences, what the party is anxious to secure; or to stand as liquidated damage where the event anticipated has taken place, and to [655] save the delay and vexation of a judicial inquiry into the amount of loss. In the latter case they are intended to cover interest or expenses in making the debt effectual to confer on the creditor for this purpose the benefit of the security, or of the rapid execution which is stipulated for the principal debt itself.

1. PENALTIES IN CONTRACTS AND OBLIGATIONS AD FACTUM PRÆSTANDUM.—1. Where such penalties are intended as liquidated damages, and especially where there appears to be nothing exorbitant in the stipulation, but a reasonable and fair proportion between the loss and the penalty, a court of justice will not interfere.² Thus, where in a lease an additional rent is stipulated on particular modes of cultivation being adopted, and where no doubt occurs as to the bona fides of the tenant in altering the original mode of cultivation prescribed, the penalty is held an additional rent conventionally proportioned to the different use to be taken of the land.³ So, in the case of a judicial sale, where the loss arising from failure of an offerer to fulfil his engagement cannot easily be ascertained, a court will not disturb the liquidated damage.⁴ 2. But where the penalty is manifestly exorbitant, and a penal forfeiture rather than estimated damage, a court of equity does interfere; the exorbitancy being taken in some sort as a criterion whether it be properly a penalty or conventional damage that has been stipulated. In such cases especially where deviation is accidental or necessary, an inquiry has been admitted into the actual loss as all that can be demanded in equity.⁵ 3. Where the penalty is plainly intended to secure against some possible invasion, although it may be conceived in the shape of an increased rent, the party against whom it is pointed is not entitled to insist on taking the enlarged use, paying the penal sum. It is held necessary, in order to his exercising such power, that a jus quæsitum be plainly stipulated; as, for example, that a tenant shall have it in his power to follow a particular course on paying a certain rent. Unless there be such stipulation, the penalty, though in one sense, and in the case of necessary or actual deviation, a conventional damage, is to be held as truly an instrument of restraint,¹ and the payment of the penalty does not liberate from the performance of the engagement.²

2. PENALTIES IN MONEY OBLIGATIONS.—These are meant to cover interest or expenses, and to give all the security and execution which is competent in relation to the principal debt, for the recovery of those which are future and contingent claims. In bonds and transactions for the loan of money, the borrower has often so much confidence in his prospect of repaying the sum against the day fixed, and so much anxiety to obtain the accommodation, that he is regardless of consequences in fixing the amount of the penalty. He trusts that the event which is to entitle the lender to the penalty will never happen. On the other hand, [656] a lender, anxious to have back his money at the appointed term, thinks that the dread of a demand for the whole penalty will, when the term begins to approach, make his debtor exert himself. But when that failure does come, it would be unjust to permit the creditor to reap so exorbitant an advantage as the recovery of the whole penalty; and it is an important object to take care that no undue advantage be taken of the necessities of debtors. Accordingly, in all countries, a power is vested somewhere for MITIGATING SUCH PENALTIES, and reducing them to the actual or probable amount of the damage. In France the doctrine of mitigation was admitted.³ In England a remedy is to be had in equity. And with us, the Court of Session, as the supreme court of law and equity, has the power of mitigation. On this principle the laws against usury rest, and those laws also which discourage and annul unconscionable bargains for advancing money to heirs in expectancy. On the same principle the restraining of penalties in bonds is to be justified. The earliest case we have in Scotland on this subject was determined on sound principles. It occurred so far back as the middle of the sixteenth century, and conventional penalties were held to be no further exigible by the practice of Scotland than to the amount of the real damage and interest, because they approach too near to usury, and would elude the law.⁴ A penalty in a bond which bore no interest, was on this principle restricted to the interest.⁵ By the old form of the heritable bond, where the debtor was infest only in security of an annual-rent redeemable by payment of the principal sum, interest, and penalty, the penalty was held, in one sense at least, not to be really secured; for although the debtor could not, in competition with other creditors, redeem his land without paying the penalty (or such part of it at least as could legally be claimed), the annual-renter had no preference for his penalty.⁶ But by the present form of the heritable bond all those difficulties are removed.

¹ Muir M'Kenzie v Craigies, 18 June 1811, Fac. Coll.; Wortly M'Kenzie v Gilchrist, 13 Dec. 1811, Fac. Coll. In these two cases a similar decision was pronounced in the two Divisions of the Court.

adjudication or of demand in any other shape, it shall be in the power of the Court to modify and restrict such penalties as not to exceed the expense incurred in making the debt effectual.]

⁵ Sample v Sample, 1622, M. 10033.

⁶ The whole of this doctrine, as applicable to the old heritable bond, will be found in two cases—The Ranking of Cockburn, and Menzies v Denham.

1. As to creditors by real rights, it was in the latter of these cases found, 'that the creditor in an heritable bond for security of his annualrents was only preferable for his principal sum and annualrents, but not for his penalty or termly failzie.' 2 Feb. 1739, M. 10044. But,

2. As to the effect of the clause of reversion (which clearly barred the debtor himself from redeeming without paying the penalties) upon the purchaser of the estate at a judicial sale, the Court found, 1. That the creditor had no action against the buyer, to force him to pay the penalty; and, 2.

The infeftment which is given to the creditor in the lands is 'for further security of the payment of the sums of money, principal, annualrents, and liquidate penalty, and termly failures above mentioned.' So that the real right by infeftment as effectually covers the penalty as it does the principal.¹ In the same way summary diligence proceeds for [657] the penalty to the effect of authorizing a demand for the actual expense: the creditor not being entitled to refuse the principal, interest, and actual expense; the debtor not being entitled to suspension, unless this has been tendered.²

As to the amount of the expense and damage allowed to be claimed under cover of the penalty, these points seem to be fixed: 1. As the legal interest is the proper damage arising from a failure to discharge a pecuniary obligation, where interest was not stipulated, and while yet it was not held to be due without a special contract, the penalty in the first place went to cover the interest.³ 2. All the expense of making the debt effectual is recoverable under the penalty.⁴ So the expense of diligence is clearly included. Even the expense of a litigation, collaterally arising in making effectual the claims, has been admitted.⁵ The expense also of proceedings against a co-obligant has been allowed.⁶ As to the expense of litigation, which has not been allowed in the action itself, there seems to be ground for distinguishing; and, first, If the litigation has been between the creditor and debtor themselves, the refusal of expenses to the creditor in that action seems to exclude his claim under the penalty.⁷ As to the expense of litigation in proceedings where third parties have been concerned, the refusal of expenses in the action is not conclusive against the claim for expense under the penalty.⁸ But although collateral expense has been allowed, it has been refused where the proceeding is not directly under the bond.⁹ 3. Lord Stair, in speaking of the power of the Court of Session to modify and restrict penalties, says: 'These clauses have this effect, that the Lords take slender probation of the true expenses, and do not consider whether they were unnecessary or not, so that they exceed not the sum agreed upon; whereas in other cases they allow no expense but what is necessary and profitable.'¹⁰ 4. Doubts were formerly entertained whether an adjudication on a bond bearing a penalty did not deprive the Court of all power of mitigation. Those doubts were grounded on the principle that an adjudication is, in truth, a sale under

That the buyer had no direct means of forcing the creditor to denude or convey his right till his penalty, or at least expenses, were paid; and this seeming to some of the Court to endanger the efficacy of the laws relating to judicial sales, it was observed that by 1695, c. 6, the buyer might consign the price, which liberates him and disburdens the land. Ranking of Cockburn's Crs., 1700, 2 Fount. 101, M. 1290.

¹ Duff v Chapman, 1755, M. 10046; and see 5 Brown's Sup. 292 for Lord Kilkerran's note. This point was first tried in the Ranking of Jarvieston, where it was objected to a creditor by heritable bond, claiming to be ranked for the expenses incurred, that he had no preference for the penalty to any further extent than the mere expense of the infeftment; all other claims for expense, however good against the debtor, being, in competition, to be considered as claims for future debts not secured by the infeftment. And it was strongly affirmed to be the universal understanding in practice, that such was the law. The Court at first dismissed the claim, 'moved chiefly by the practice alleged by the objector;' but 'finding, upon investigation into rankings, that the practice was not uniform, they decided that the heritable creditors are preferable upon their heritable bonds, to the extent of their necessary expenses, alongst with their principal sums and interests.' Ranking of Jarvieston, 1782, M. 14132. This is now held as settled.

⁹ In the Ranking of Jarvieston (supra), it was found that a creditor by heritable bond, receiving a collateral assignation to certain debts, and being put to considerable expense in prosecuting for them, could not include this expense under his penalty. In the case of Kildonan's creditors, it was found that an heritable creditor having entered into possession, by appointing a factor under the usual clause empowering him so to do, and declaring him liable only for his intromissions, deducting the expenses of levying the rents, and for omissions: he was not entitled, in accounting with the debtor's creditors, to charge a salary to his factor. Crs. of Kildonan v Douglas, Heron, & Co., 1785, M. 14135. reversion. But this opinion of the nature of an adjudication has been given up.¹ And accordingly it has been found that the Court has the power of mitigating penalties in adjudications, as completely as in bonds.² 5. Although it may be said, in one sense, that a creditor by heritable bond is infeft, and holds a real right over the lands in security of the [658] debt, with interest, and the whole of the penalty, and therefore ought to be so ranked, whatever he may be allowed to draw, yet the matter has been otherwise decided. Like an obligation and security in relief, the right of the heritable creditor under the penalty is never held to attach, except so far as expenses are actually incurred.³

PART II.

THE DOCTRINE OF PASSIVE TITLES, OR THE EFFECT OF DEBT AGAINST REPRESENTATIVES.

WE have hitherto considered debts as operating against the original obligant; but they are available also against heirs representing such original debtor, taking his estate, and becoming in consequence liable for his debts, either universally or to a limited extent.

The estate of the debtor, as well as his person, is liable for the performance of his engagements, and may be attached not only during his life, but after his death. The transference of the estate to his heir does not extinguish this liability; but on the contrary, according to the law of Scotland, his heir, taking up the universal right and character of heir, is held, in assuming the benefit, to undertake also the burden, and to become liable for every debt of the proprietor deceased. The extent of this liability should naturally be measured by the value of the estate; but the law of Scotland has carried it to an unlimited extent, discharging the creditors from any necessity of making inquiry into the exact amount of what the heir has so taken, and by a presumption of law holding the estate to be fully adequate to the payment of any debts.⁴ An undertaking, accordingly, to this extent, is ¹ Campbell v Scotland and Jack, 1794, M. 321. There will be occasion afterwards to investigate this more particularly, in treating of the Effects of Payment.

² Purdon Gray v Buchanan. The case occurred in a ranking, but the objection was moved by the heir of the debtor; and in this way it may almost be said that the question was viewed in both lights, as between the debtor himself and the adjudger, and as in a competition. The Lord Ordinary first 'ranked and preferred the adjudger for payment of the accumulated sum contained in his decree of adjudication, and interest thereof from the date of the said decree till payment;' and to this, by their first judgment, the Court adhered. But afterwards, upon considering the important change produced on the common opinion respecting the nature of a general adjudication, by the decision in Campbell and Scotland's case, they 'altered and restricted the adjudication to a security for principal sum, interest, and necessary expenses of adjudication.' 10 July 1800. It is true that afterwards this judgment was altered, but upon a ground quite foreign from the point now under discussion, viz. the effect of certain objections to the adjudication.

It was understood upon the bench, when this decision was pronounced, that the decision was in no shape to affect the method of adjudging, or to prevent a creditor from adjudging for his full penalties, reserving for future consideration to what extent the claim should be mitigated. On the other hand, he may be a loser by dead interest, which the Court will, as in the case of Murray of Stanhope v E. of March, in 1772, think themselves bound in equity to recompense out of the penalty; and, on the other hand, while he regularly receives his interest or holds possession, he may by repeated adjudications give ground for condemning his conduct as oppressive, and so authorize the Court to refuse all claim under the penalty.

³ In the Ranking of Jarvieston, supra, p. 701, an inquiry was ordered into the practice of accountants in ranking creditors by heritable bonds upon the penalties; and the Court, upon considering the result, found, 'That penalties, to the extent of the necessary expenses, have the benefit of the real security upon infestments, such as those founded on: therefore found the creditors in this case preferable for their penalties, to the extent of the necessary expense; but found that the expense laid out in recovering the contents of a collateral security could not be understood as a part of the penalty in the heritable bond.'

⁴ [The principle laid down in the text, that in equity the inferred from the service of the heir, and is called the passive title of an heir, as the right which gives him access to the estate is called his active title. It is on account of this liability that the doctrine which prevails in the laws of other countries is not admitted in Scotland,—namely, that the heir's right is completed by the death of the ancestor; [659] mortuus sasisit vivum. The title of heir must be completed, so as to give to him an opportunity of refusing or of recognising this extensive responsibility, or of taking the proper measures for having it limited and restrained to the true amount of the estate. Without inquiring historically into the progress by which this unlimited or universal liability came to be established as a consequence of the heir's entry, the rules are these: 1. That the heir who enters unconditionally to the succession of his ancestor, is liable without limitation to his debts. But this applies only to the heritable and not to the moveable estate; no such unlimited responsibility arises from taking the moveable succession, except in cases of fraudulent and unchecked intromissions, against which the law guards by a presumption that the funds intromitted with were sufficient for all the debts. 2. That the heir cannot escape from this consequence by varying the form, without changing the substance of the act by which he takes the estate. 3. That he may guard himself and his estate against this unlimited responsibility, by taking measures at once to show the true extent of the estates which he assumes as heir, and to limit his acknowledgment. And, 4. That the law has favoured creditors of the ancestor so far, that diligence by them, used within a certain term, has preference over the creditors of the heir; and that, although the ancestor's title to the estate may not have been feudally completed, his debts will affect it, if, by a certain course of possession as proprietor, a credit has on that footing been established, by which tradesmen and others may be deceived.

The subject may be considered under the following heads:—

1. Of the passive representation of an heir entering by service, or assuming the possession generally.
2. Of limited representation.
3. Of the debts of apparent heirs in possession.

CHAPTER I.

OF PASSIVE REPRESENTATION.

1. WHERE an heir enters as such by SERVICE in any character of universal succession, he is held to recognise a general responsibility, as eadem persona cum defuncto. From all the regular methods of completing the titles of an heir in heritage, whether as heir of line, heir of conquest, or heir male, this effect follows. It is not so, however, as to an heir succeeding by a particular destination, not being hæres alioquin successurus. He is, under a limited responsibility, liable to the extent only of the value of that to which he has succeeded.¹

liability of the heir should be measured by the value of the estate, has been extended by statute to special services. See Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, sec. 47. And in some exceptional cases, even a general service, without inventory or specification, has been held not to render the heir liable by passive representation, as where nothing was taken by the service, or where the title was made up merely for the purpose of conveying over the estate to trustees. See E. of Fife v Duff, 1828, 6 S. 698; Mackay v Campbell's Trs., 1835, 13 S. 246.]

¹ Erskine (iii. 8. 51) disputes this doctrine, against the authority of Dirleton, Stewart, and Bankton; extending it only to the case of an heir nominatim substituted in a bond, or a grantee in a disposition omnium bonorum, to take effect at the death of the granter. But the point is settled by the case of Baird v the E. of Rosebery, 1766, M. 14019, affirmed 3 April 1767. 'In this case,' Lord Monboddo says, 'the Lords determined a very general point of law, viz. that an heir of provision of a particular estate, such as an heir of tailzie, is not by his service universally liable, but only in

The rule does not extend to the MOVEABLE SUCCESSION; the title by which that estate is administered proceeding on an inventory, and being limited to the amount of the inventory.¹

[660] 2. PRÆCEPTIO HÆREDITATIS.—By anticipating the heritable succession, and accepting of a gratuitous conveyance from the ancestor, the heir is held to undertake responsibility for all previous debts. He is held as successor titulo lucrativo post debitum contractum; and his act is considered as præceptio hæreditatis.²

It may be observed, with regard to this passive title, 1. That it does not prevent a prior creditor from seeking his remedy under the Act 1621, c. 18, by which creditors are protected against gratuitous alienations to conjunct and confident persons; and it may be of importance to proceed on this ground, rather than on the passive title, in order to establish a preference over the heir's own creditors.³ 2. That no creditor has the benefit of this passive title, whose debt was not contracted previously to the conveyance being accepted by the heir.⁴ 3. That this not being a representation founded on presumed delict, it transmits against the heirs of the person so taking præceptione.

Where a conveyance is made to the heir under the burden of the granter's debts, it is effectual to posterior creditors as well as prior, to the extent of the property conveyed; but it infers no passive title of which the posterior creditors may avail themselves.⁵

3. GESTIO PRO HÆREDE.—Where the person entitled to succeed as heir proceeds, after the death of the ancestor, without service, to occupy and enjoy the estate, so as no one but an heir is entitled to do, not only is he held to recognise a general liability; but by removing as far as he can, or eluding, all check on the extent of what he receives, he further confirms the right of creditors to look to him for unlimited engagement.⁶ That the doctrine rests partly on the implied acknowledgment of responsibility, is manifest on all those examples of it which preclude the possibility of creditors being defrauded by concealment; as in the conveyance of a subject to a third party, or the consenting to such a conveyance, or the granting of discharges or receipts for debts or rents. That it rests partly on the danger of fraud, appears in those cases where there is uncontrolled intromission with rents, heirship moveables, title-deeds.⁷ This, like all other passive titles, is much relaxed in modern times. And, 1. It is excluded by any right in a third party taking the estate out of the ancestor's person. 2. By any singular title in the heir. 3. If the intromission be inconsiderable, and without any marks of intention to defraud the creditors.⁸ The passive title of gestio pro hærede is not transmissible against the heir of the gestor, who will be liable only in valorem.⁹

valorem, like an heir cum beneficio inventarii. The direct contrary of this was as unanimously decided in the case of Pitrichie, and a petition refused without answers. Lord Pitfour observed the change of our law in this respect, and how much inclined our forefathers were to introduce universal passive titles, as appears from the Act 1695.¹⁰ 5 Brown's Sup. 926. [See Scott v Tawse, 1828, Sh. (Teind Ca.) 163; Farquhar v Hamilton, 1842, 4 D. 600; Sinclair v Dunbar, 1845, 7 D. 1085; Dewar v Burden, 1845, 8 D. 90, 7 Bell App. Ca. 32.]

² There is something obscure in the principle on which this passive title rests. For, 1. It is not universal, giving no ground of action to a creditor of the ancestor, whose debt is posterior to the conveyance. 2. It corresponds with the operation of the Act of 1621, c. 18, in subjecting the heir in valorem to all prior creditors. Yet, 3. It does not stop there, but infers responsibility for prior debts, however inconsiderable the subject thus taken, and whatever the amount of the debts. Stair (iii. 7. 1) places it on the ground of an expedient extension of the Act 1621 in the peculiar case of apparent heirs. Erskine (iii. 8. 88) resolves it into the heir's acknowledgment of the character of heir, which is not perfectly correct, otherwise it would infer a universal passive title. Both of them add this limitation, that the responsibility is only for antecedent debts. Stair (sec. 1) says that the heir's representation is 'with this temperament, that he shall be liable only to the debt contracted before the disposition or right made to him by the defunct.' Erskine (sec. 88) says: 'The effect of the passive title becomes restricted, as if the ancestor had died immediately after executing the right, and so extends to no debts contracted by him afterwards.'

4. The heir will not escape from unlimited responsibility by altering the form [661] while he enjoys the substance of the succession. So, 1. If an APPARENT HEIR, after the ancestor's death, purchase otherwise than at a public judicial sale, he is held to represent his predecessor universally, and to be liable for all his debts and deeds as if served heir.¹ 2. Where rights, or legal diligence affecting the predecessor's estate, are settled on a relation so near to the apparent heir that the heir succeeds; if he shall possess the estate on such rights or diligence, except on lawful purchase at public roup, he shall be held liable as on a passive title, while the rights and diligences shall be available against creditors only so far as it shall be proved that they were purchased for sums of money.² 3. If the heir shall complete his title by adjudication on his own trust bond (which was a mode of evasion of the universal responsibility formerly attempted), he shall be held to represent universally,³ unless the right shall be completed, and possession obtained before the ancestor's death.⁴

5. VITIOUS INTROMISSIONS.—In moveables there is no entry as by service, and no universal responsibility on the part of the executor, whose entry is by inventory in the character of administrator, not of heir. But wherever any one having access to the effects and moveable estate of a person deceased, unwarrantably takes possession of and intermeddles with those funds, the law infers a universal responsibility from the uncontrolled intromission.⁵ It may be observed, 1. That it is not necessary for raising this presumption that the intromitter shall, as in the passive titles in heritage, be entitled to take up the succession. 2. That any probable title of intromission, or circumstances removing the presumption of fraud, and affording fair grounds of scrutiny into the actual state of the succession, are held sufficient to relieve from this penal consequence;⁶ and although the spirit of the law has become much milder, and the form of the presumption is much mitigated even since that rule was laid down, yet wherever there are circumstances of suspicion, or the removal of the natural and reasonable checks on the intromission, the presumption of the law still is enforced.⁷ 3. That, according to the law of penal actions, a demand by the creditors of the defunct, on the footing of this passive title, cannot competently be made against the heirs of the intromitter.⁸

CHAPTER II.

OF LIMITED REPRESENTATION.

THERE are some passive titles which do not extend to a responsibility for the whole debts of the deceased, but to a responsibility bounded by certain limits.

SECTION I.

LIMITED REPRESENTATION PRODUCED BY JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS.

There are two occasions on which representation to a limited extent may be [662] established by adverse proceedings on the part of the creditor.

1. Where an action is raised against the heir of a debtor, and he, acquiescing in the character under which he has been called, states a peremptory defence on the merits of the cause, as payment, discharge, prescription, etc., he is held to incur a passive title to the effect of being liable for that particular debt, but no further.¹

2. Where a creditor has no direct means of attaching the estate of his debtor, the heir not being entered, it is provided by particular statutes² that the creditor may charge the heir to enter, under certification that, if he fail so to do, he shall be considered as liable to the debt of the charger in the same way as if he had entered; so that not only may adjudication proceed, but action may be sued out personally against the heir not renouncing.³

SECTION II.

OF ENTRY AS HEIR CUM BENEFICIO INVENTARII.

It would be a very inexpedient deviation from the rules of justice, to infer against an heir an unlimited responsibility, without any regard to the extent of the succession, were there no remedy to mitigate the harshness of the rule. But the Scottish Legislature, in the statute already referred to, adopted from the Roman law⁴ a regulation enabling the heir to enter cum beneficio inventarii. By this law the Legislature provided,⁵ that on following out particular proceedings, and observing certain precautions for ascertaining the true extent of the succession,⁶ the heir's responsibility should be limited to extend 'so far as the value of the heritage given up in the inventory will extend, and no further.'

[663] The requisites to be observed are: 1. That this privilege shall be claimed, and the inventory given in, recorded and extracted, within the annus deliberandi. 2. That the inventory shall be full, and upon oath, of all lands, houses, etc., which the heir claims as such. 3. That it shall be subscribed before witnesses, duly insert and designed. 4. That it shall be given in to the clerk of the Sheriff Court of the shire where the lands lie; or if there be no lands requiring sasine, to the Sheriff-clerk of the shire where the ancestor died. 5. That the inventory shall be sanctioned, subscribed by the judge, and recorded and extracted.

As to the effect of this statute, and of the heir's entry under its provisions, the following points may be observed: 1. The heir does not thereby vest the estate in his person, strictly speaking, as a trust-estate, or so that the debts of his ancestor are by his act to be held as real burdens on the lands. The heir must indeed account for the value, on the principles

⁵ The second part of the Act 1695, c. 24, is in these words: 'That for hereafter any apparent heir shall have free liberty and access to enter to his predecessor cum beneficio inventarii, or upon inventory as use is in executries and moveables, allowing still to the said apparent heir year and day to deliberate; in which time he may make up the foresaid inventory, which he is to give up upon oath full and particular as to all lands, houses, annualrents, or other heritable rights whatsoever to which the said apparent heir may or pretends to succeed. Which inventory, to be subscribed by him before witnesses, duly insert and designed, shall be given to the clerk of the Sheriff Court of the shire where the defunct's lands and heritage lie. To which inventory the sheriff, etc., with the clerk, shall also subscribe in judgment, and record the same in their registers, and give extracts thereof; and this inventory is to be given in recorded and extracted, as said is, within the said year and day to deliberate.' [For the present mode of completing a title by service with specification annexed, see the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, sec. 49.]

⁶ An heir defending himself on the inventory must show strict compliance with the Act. See M'Kay v Sinclair, 1708, M. 5331. It is sufficient if the inventory be given up and registered within the year, though the service is subsequent. And if any unavoidable obstacle prevent the completing of the inventories within the prescribed time, the Court will authorize them to be registered, reserving all objections. Sir R. M'Kenzie, 1749, M. 5353; Elchies, Heir cum beneficio, No. 5. Bell, 17 Nov. 1818, Fac. Coll. The inventory, however, must be lodged before the heir is served, otherwise he is held to have by his service incurred a representation not to be purged by inventory. Codrington v Johnston's Trs., 11 Feb. 1818, Fac. Coll.; aff. 31 Mar. 1824, 2 Sh. App. Ca. 118.

which regulate a trustee's intromissions (see below). But under a service cum beneficio, as under the ordinary form of service, the heir becomes the absolute proprietor of the land, with only a personal responsibility for his predecessor's debts;¹ the sole difference being, that this responsibility is limited in the one case, universal in the other. A demand against the heir thus served is grounded on his title as heir. The conclusion of the summons is for a personal decree; and the proper tenor of that decree is, 'decerning against him for the debt, reserving to him his objections against full payment.'² 2. If any of the creditors of the predecessor desire to attach the estate, they must proceed by adjudication in the manner hereafter to be explained, and with such limited benefit as the law has assigned to the ancestor's creditors. 3. If a demand be made by a particular creditor, the heir not only may, but is bound to satisfy it, unless there shall appear danger of similar demands to a greater amount than the value of the estate; in which case the heir may raise an action of multiplepinding, calling all the creditors of the ancestor into the field, to have the fund fairly divided. 4. As the heir may pay to the creditor who first makes his demand, other creditors who come afterwards may be excluded by the exhausting of the whole value of the heritage in the inventory; or their demands may be limited to a small dividend from the inadequate residue. And against this the creditors seem to have no other protection than their own vigilance in citing the heir, and so by interpellation compelling him to bring all into the field by a multiplepinding, or by themselves raising a multiplepinding in the heir's name. 5. The heir may sell or voluntarily alienate the estate, to the disappointment of the ancestor's creditors; and against this, as against the other danger which they run, there is no protection but the vigilance of the creditors themselves in using the diligence of inhibition. 6. While the estate remains in the hands of the heir, unexhausted by payment actually made, no preference is acquired by creditors either citing the heir or obtaining decree against him; but the whole estate, or what remains unexhausted and unapplied, is a fund in the heir's hand, on which the creditors are to be ranked preferably, according to the diligence they have used for attaching it; or pari passu if no real diligence have been used.³ The creditors attaching the estate will be preferred accordingly;⁴ and, on the same principle, if the heir have prevented diligence, by granting an heritable security, that security will be available to give preference where there is no collusion or fraud.⁵ The [664] ranking of such security seems to be equivalent to payment in accounting for the fund. It is different from the effect of a mere decree on which no payment has been made. 7. The heir, although he does not hold the estate as vested in him in trust, is yet substantially a trustee, holding a fund equal to the value of the estate, for the benefit of the creditors of the predecessor, and for payment of which both the estate of his ancestor and his own may be attached. Accordingly, he is on the principle of trust bound to account for this fund. And so, first, Meliorations are imputed as part of the trust. Secondly, Whatever indulgence, deduction, or ease he receives in settling with individual creditors, are taken to be for the benefit of the whole.⁶ And, thirdly, The heir must either pay the debt, or assign the subjects in the inventory, and is not entitled to insist on paying only the value.⁷ 8. As the inventory does not present any evidence of the value, but only of the extent of the estate; and, indeed, as the whole is a proceeding of voluntary and not of contentious jurisdiction, and so gives no assurance of correctness; difficulties may arise after the heir has assumed the possession. Thus, 1. If, without taking any precaution to discriminate, he shall improve the estate, it is difficult to say that the right of the creditors shall be restrained to the original unimproved value; and accordingly it has been held that the creditors are entitled to reckon his responsibility at the value of the improved estate.¹ 2. Although the heir may, in a process of cognition, have the value of the estate ascertained, as a rule of liability and payment;² and if the matter should stop there, all future improvements will be held as made by the heir upon his own estate, just as if he had purchased it; yet he cannot compel creditors to acquiesce in this mode of ascertaining the value. They may insist on bringing the estate to a sale.³

² Gordon v Ross, 1741, M. 5352. This reservation is best discussed in a multiplepinding, wherein the heir cum beneficio, condescending on the value of the estate, may show how it has been exhausted, or is subject to competing demands.

SECTION III.

LIMITED RESPONSIBILITY FROM POSSESSION BY APPARENT HEIR, IN CONFERRING ON CREDITORS A RIGHT AGAINST THE NEXT HEIR ENTERING.

It seemed to the Scottish Legislature, while considering the whole of this matter of responsibility by succession to land, that although it might not be expedient to confer the title to land ipso jure, yet, from the possession of the ancestor's estate by an apparent heir, a degree of credit arises, which called for some modification of the ordinary rule that makes land and the heir succeeding to it responsible only for the debts of a proprietor feudally vested. When creditors see a man in possession as owner of an estate for a course of years, they are naturally led, without any particular inquiry into the state of his titles, to trust him as a person of credit and property; and it is hard and unjust that they should be dis-[665] appointed. On this account it was deemed expedient, that wherever such possession should be continued during the space of three years, the next heir completing his title to the land by passing over the person so possessing, should be held responsible for his debts, and bound to fulfil his onerous engagements to the extent of the value of the estate. And provision was so made accordingly,⁴ in another part of the same Act, which has already been commented on.

This is a very imperfect law; and the policy on which it is grounded leads much beyond the remedy actually applied. The points of importance under this Act are these: 1. The remedy is not confined to the case of an estate in which the heir succeeding to the apparent heir connects with the predecessor last infest, for the word infestment is not to be found in the statute. If the next heir complete his title to the estate by service connecting himself with a more remote predecessor than the apparent heir, although that predecessor should have held only a personal right as donee, it would be a case under the Act.⁵ 2. The interjected heir must actually have possessed the subject by himself, or by another under his authority. And so it will not avail his creditors if the estate has been in the possession

² Gray v M'Caul, 1733, M. 5345. This action is declaratory. All the creditors must be called; and the conclusion is, 1. That the worth of the estate shall be ascertained after due inquiry made. 2. That the lands shall be found and declared to belong to the pursuer, and to be free and disburdened of the debts of the predecessor, upon payment to the creditors of the ascertained value. And the proper course is, to have a multiplepinding and exoneration conjoined with the declarator.

⁴ The words of this part of the statute are: 'If any man shall serve himself heir, or by adjudication on his own bond shall succeed, not to his immediate predecessor, but to one remoter, as passing by his father to his goodsire, or the like; then and in that case he shall be liable for the debts and deeds of the person interjected, to whom he was appearand heir, and who was in the possession of the lands and estate to which he is served for the space of three years, and that in so far as may extend to the value of the said lands and estate, and no further, deducing the debts already paid.' 1695, c. 24.

of a judicial factor in sequestration;¹ neither is it enough that he is apparent heir in the fee, and excluded only by the liferenter's possession, which, though to some effects it is held as the fiar's, never is so held but for the fiar's benefit.² But if, as apparent heir, he shall have granted a liferent right, his liferenter's possession would be held as his.³ 3. If the possession, though actual, has been not on apparency, but on a title ostensibly adverse to it, the creditors will not profit by it.⁴ 4. It is only upon the onerous debts and deeds of the interjected heir that a demand can be grounded against the succeeding heir. So a pecuniary debt of the interjected heir; or an obligation in a marriage contract;⁵ or a disposition of lands onerous, and with warrandice, express or implied; or a lease of any part of the lands, will authorize a demand, and the enforcement of the deed against the next heir. But a gratuitous engagement or conveyance, as a simple destination, or a bond of tailzie, will not sustain action under the statute.⁶ 5. The words of the Act require that the heir who is called upon as responsible must enter by service, or by adjudication on a trust-bond, to one more remote than the debtor whose possession on apparency had raised the credit; otherwise there is no action against him. It was therefore held, that where the next heir possessed merely on apparency, without service or adjudication on bond, he was not [666] responsible.⁷ This seems to be so little satisfactory, so far short of the principle of the Act, and to have been so much discountenanced in the House of Lords in one case,⁸ that our lawyers have expressed little confidence in this rule being adhered to.⁹ But in a subsequent case, a judgment was affirmed in the House of Lords, holding the heir who forbears to enter as not liable for this statutory passive title.¹⁰ 6. Where the next heir abstains from entering or adjudging, but gives a bond gratuitous, or for a small consideration, on which the land is adjudged, this has been held equivalent to entry, as under the fair meaning, though not within the words, of the Act.¹¹ 7. The responsibility is personal, but limited to the value of the estate, 'so far as may extend to the value of the said lands and estate, and no further, deducing the debts already paid.'¹² The creditor of the apparent heir, therefore, can attach the estate only by adjudication, after having constituted his debt against the heir who has entered. But here it may be questioned, first, Whether the creditors of the apparent heir have, in pecuniary debts, the preference conferred on the ancestor's creditors by 1661, c. 24? It would rather seem that they have such preference, since there are no words in the Act to exclude them, while the intendment of it is to confer on such creditors, to the value of the estate, the full privilege, as against the heir next entering, to which

And he adds: 'Lord Advocate told me it was upon the general point that, when the next apparent heir, the debtor, was three years in possession, the next apparent heir is liable in the same manner as if the debtor had been infert, if he possesses, whether he passes him by and serves to a remoter predecessor or not; and that the Lords meant to extend the Act 1695 further than we thought we could do, and further than we did in the cases of Lord Banff,' etc. Elchies, voce Minor, No. 12.

they would have been entitled had their debtor completed his titles. The whole purport of the statute of 1661, c. 24, seems consistent with this view of the matter; and it seems to have been the intention of the saving clause introduced into the Act of 1695,¹ to avoid the injustice which, 'as to the time past,' would have arisen from giving a preference to a class of creditors not formerly thought entitled to an action. Secondly, Another question may be raised, Whether adjudication in implement be competent on a conveyance or minute of sale, or other obligation to convey, by the apparent heir three years in possession? If so, the debt of the unentered heir may be made preferable to that of him who has completed his titles, since adjudication in implement is not subject to the pari passu preference of ordinary adjudgers.² But although it seems quite clear, that directly a conveyance by one unentered in the feudal right can give no preference,³ there appears to be no objection to a decree of adjudication in implement after due constitution of the obligation against the entered heir; the statute itself declaring not the debts only, but the deeds of the apparent heir effectual against the heir who enters.⁴ 8. The personal responsibility of the entered heir, [667] if not heir-at-law and representative of the deceased, is of the nature of a subsidiary obligation after the heirs of the deceased have been discussed.⁵ And as a corollary from this rule, if the heir entered shall have paid the debt of the deceased heir without pleading the exception, he will have action of relief against the representatives of that heir if primarily liable, not otherwise.⁶

Where the estate is under a strict entail, which would have prevented the debts of the apparent heir from affecting it though he had been entered and infeft, there can be no passive title under this Act to subject the heir. And although the creditors of an heir of entail infeft, whose debts have been contracted before the tailzie was recorded, may, after it is recorded, adjudge,⁷ it is different where the heir of entail dies in apparenacy, and the entail is not recorded till immediately before the death of the apparent heir: there the creditors of the apparent heir are not entitled to adjudge the estate in the person of the next substitute entering;⁸ the creditors in such personal debts are not in a better situation than the creditors of the next heir himself.

⁶ Ogilvie v Ogilvie, 16 Dec. 1817. Here the relief was denied, because the heir pursuing for relief was himself the primary obligant to complete titles to particular lands, and to denude in implement of a contract of marriage. 'Found that the said obligation, not being of a general nature, but specifically for the settlement of the estate, does attach upon the heir of investiture of that estate; and therefore the heir, etc., attempting to take the said estate by passing by, etc., is not entitled to relief from the heir of line or general representative of John Ogilvie.' ⁸ An entailed estate was long possessed without the entail being recorded. At last it was recorded during the possession of an apparent heir. After his death, the next substitute made up titles under the entail. The creditors of some of the prior substitutes, who had been infeft while the entail stood unrecorded, adjudged; and the creditors of him who had possessed as apparent heir adjudged also. These last adjudgers were objected to, and the objection sustained. Graham v Graham's Heirs, 1795, Fac. Coll. 396; Bell, Oct. Ca. 162. [See Russell v Russell, 1852, 15 D. 192.]

BOOK IV.

OF PREFERENCES BY SECURITIES, VOLUNTARY OR JUDICIAL, OVER THE HERITABLE ESTATE.

PREFERENCES arise either, 1. From SECURITIES constituted by voluntary grant or by [669] legal diligence, or resulting from possession, or resting on some right of exclusion ; or, 2. From PRIVILEGES conferred on particular claims from motives of humanity, or by special statute. Preferences of the former and chief class depend on the principle that the creditor holds a real right in the property over which his security extends. This real right arises by express constitution or by tacit implication, savouring of the nature of property on the one hand, or of a right of mere possession and retention on the other, but being in either case defeasible by payment of the debt in security of which it is held. And this real right of property or of possession forms the jus in re, in contradistinction to the jus ad rem held by personal creditors.

Property is in Scotland divided into HERITABLE and MOVEABLE, corresponding nearly with the distinction of property in English law into REAL and PERSONAL. The former comprehends lands, and all rights and profits arising from or annexed to land, which are of a permanent and immoveable nature ; the latter comprehends moveables.

There is a subdivision of heritable property into feudal property, and property simply heritable. The former is constituted, transferred, and burdened by the forms of the feudal law ; the latter, by forms in almost all respects similar to those by which moveables are transferred.

In this Fourth Book it may be proper to consider : 1. SECURITIES constituted over the FEUDAL ESTATE ; and, 2. SECURITIES over the estate simply HERITABLE.

In the Fifth Book will be discussed : 1. SECURITIES over the MOVEABLE estate ; 2. SECURITIES by way of EXCLUSION ; and, 3. PRIVILEGED DEBTS.

Although the severities of the feudal system, its oppressive casualties, and its forfeitures, have now scarcely a place in the law of Scotland, the system of conveyancing respecting land remains as completely and strictly feudal as if that peculiar institution still existed in all its original strength.

The superior is regarded by the law as the proprietor of the land from whom the [670] vassal holds his right, but the right of the vassal is the great and truly valuable interest in the land. The former is called DOMINIUM DIRECTUM, the latter DOMINIUM UTILE.

1. In transferring the dominium utile, the owner of land must either substitute the acquirer in his own place as vassal of his superior, or constitute an inferior vassalage to be holden of himself, reserving an intermediate superiority in his own person. Every conveyance of land must be completed by sasine,¹ which is the only badge of real right in feudal subjects by the law of Scotland, and that sasine must be recorded in a public register within a certain number of days, that it may be seen and examined by all persons interested.

Such sasine proceeds on the warrant or precept of the feudal proprietor,—either when a proprietor conveys his land to be held of himself as superior, or when he resigns his lands into his superior's hands by resignation in favorem for the purpose of being given out anew to the purchaser. He may also convey his land with a precept to be held of his own superior, provided that superior shall confirm his charter and sasine. Where the superior himself is the purchaser, the real right is conveyed, not by a proper sasine, but by what is held as such,—namely, by resigning the lands into the superior's own hands. This (called resignation ad remanentiam) operates as a discharge of the dominium utile by which the superior's right under his paramount sasine stood limited, and so is equivalent to a sasine in favour of the superior of the dominium utile.

Sasine is thus, in all cases, the only legitimate method of completing voluntary conveyances to feudal subjects. And all burdens and securities on such subjects, having the nature of real rights, are nothing else than partial, temporary, or conditional transferences. It may generally, therefore, be said that the whole law respecting the completion of real VOLUNTARY securities on land is expressed in this one proposition, That the security requires to its completion a sasine duly recorded.

2. This rule, as applicable to JUDICIAL securities, must be taken with a certain qualification. In consideration of the difficulty which creditors sometimes experience in forcing the debtor or his superior to give sasine voluntarily, and of the risk of the exclusion of some creditors by the more rapid or more favoured proceedings of others, the Legislature was induced to indulge creditors in this situation, so far as to hold a charge against the superior to be equivalent to sasine in questions with other creditors doing diligence. But still, although such charge is sufficient to establish a preference over the personal creditors, and creditors adjudging, it has no effect in competition with sasine on a voluntary security. To that case the rule above laid down still applies.

CHAPTER I.

OF VOLUNTARY SECURITIES ON THE FEUDAL ESTATE.

THE principles on which all voluntary securities upon land, for debt, depend are: 1. That the real right of the creditor, or jus in re, is constituted by the feudal form of sasine. 2. That the security or burden must precisely appear in the record. Before proceeding to examine the several grounds of preference by voluntary security, a short view of the history of the several securities may be useful.

1. The WADSET, in its original form, was a conveyance of land in impignoration to the [671] creditor for payment of money lent. The right of the creditor was secured by sasine: he entered into possession or drew the rents, and his right was at an end only when the total sum of advance was repaid. This form of security, though little in use now, was once the most common of all; for, amidst all its inconveniences, it had this advantage, that under cover of it, more easily than under that of any other security, the canonical prohibitions against the taking of interest could be eluded. At first, the right of the wadsetter or creditor was that of a proprietor, qualified by a condition of redemption declared in the deed. Afterwards, the conveyance to the creditor, and the condition of reversion to the debtor, were expressed in separate deeds; and then the creditor became in appearance an absolute proprietor of the debtor's lands, but liable to a personal right of redemption in favour of the debtor. This personal right, when conceived in favour of the debtor and his assignees, could be assigned by the debtor; and the right of the assignee was completed by intimation to the creditor: or the right of redemption could be renounced in favour of the creditor himself, and then his right became absolute:¹ or if the debtor required a further advance, and if the creditor was willing to make it, a partial renunciation to that extent of the right of reversion (which obtained the strange name of an eik, or addition to the reversion) enlarged the creditor's security so as to include the new debt. But as in the wadset the creditor's right was ex facie absolute, and the right of reversion merely personal, it became necessary to secure the reversers, or proprietors, and their heirs, assignees, and creditors, against the possibility of a bad use being made of the apparently absolute right which was held by the wadsetter or lender, and to secure strangers against the secret claims of the reversers or borrowers. These two objects were accomplished by the statutes 1469, c. 27, and 1617, c. 16, declaring reversions to be real rights, effectual against singular successors, and ordering them to be recorded for publication. Gradually, from this time, the wadset came again to be expressed in one deed; and when this security is used at the present day, it is executed in the form of a contract.

2. INFETMENT OF ANNUALRENT.—This was another very ancient mode of borrowing money upon land. It gave the security of a right to an irredeemable annuity payable from the land. Neither this form of security nor the RENT-CHARGE (which was little else than this, deprived of its feudal form of sasine) were, strictly speaking, securities for debt, since they were proper purchases of an irredeemable and annual payment from land. But they were, with the wadset, the only forms once in use for this purpose. Approaches were gradually made, however, to the modern form of heritable security. Even prior to the abolition of the canon law, conveyancers ventured to introduce into their annualrent rights a clause of redemption, which converted them into impignoraions of a rent, as the wadset was an impignoraion of the land itself. And after the Reformation, the deed was furnished with a counterpart to this clause of redemption, viz. a power of requisition by the lender. The next step of the progress was to introduce, instead of the power of redemption and requisition, a proper personal bond to accompany the annualrent right, and by operation of which the principal sum might be recovered.

3. HERITABLE BOND.—By degrees the infetment of annualrent was converted into the form of an heritable bond, in which the debtor not only bound himself personally to repay the money, as in a common bond—and in further security sold, alienated, and disposed to the creditors an annualrent corresponding to the legal interest of the debt, payable forth of the lands—but also the lands themselves in security of the principal sum, interest, and [672] penalty, and accompanied and completed those rights by sasine. By this form the creditor holds a real security for the sum of debt actually due at the date of infetment, and for the interest as it arises; and he has a power of entering into possession or recovering the rents. If he do enter to the possession, he is obliged to account for the sums which he receives; and his security is extinguished in proportion to the amount of his intromissions or payments; subsisting only for the balance.

4. HERITABLE BOND AND DISPOSITION IN SECURITY.—An improvement was made in the above form of security, by adding a clause of disposition under reversion, selling, alienating, and disposing the lands, heritably, but redeemably, and under reversion. And the sasine by which this was completed is accompanied by a power or mandate, authorizing the creditor to sell the lands by public auction after certain notices and precautions.²

¹ So at least Hope held (Minor Practics, tit. 6, sec. 2), though Stair held otherwise, and that resignation was necessary. Stair ii. 10. 13.

² [Securities in this form are now wholly regulated by the VOL. I.

Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, which see. It may here be noticed that a debtor, after granting an effectual heritable security over his estate, cannot thereafter give a preferable right to another by the device of assigning an

5. ABSOLUTE DISPOSITION WITH BACKBOND.—The application of the above forms of security to loans of money, or to debts formerly subsisting, is obvious. But occasions arose when something else was necessary. Men in need of occasional supplies of cash, and who at the same time preferred the borrowing of money to the sale of their land, required a form of security, under which one having the command of money should engage to make occasional advances, or to relieve a debtor from such pressing debts as he might at any time be called upon to pay. Of the above forms of security, none seemed fit to be applied on such an occasion except the wadset; but in its proper shape of a mutual contract, or even of an absolute conveyance, qualified by a bond of reversion, made real under the statutes 1469 and 1617, even this form of security was ill adapted for such an occasion: for the wadset can become a cover for a future debt only by an 'eik to the reversion,' recorded, and made real, in terms of law. But the separation of the disposition and right of reversion showed the possibility of using the form of an absolute disposition, qualified by a personal backbond; the absolute right being thus established in the creditor, so that no one deriving right through the debtor could have a claim for restitution until the debt should be paid up to the creditor. But it will not appear surprising that such a security should not have been adopted into common use, when it is considered how unwilling any proprietor must be to grant an absolute conveyance of his estate, by which he must cease to appear in the world as proprietor of it, and (being unprotected by the Acts 1469 and 1617) must leave it in his creditor's power to convey his estate away from him for ever.

6. SECURITIES FOR RELIEF OF SUMS AND ENGAGEMENTS.—In this difficulty lawyers and conveyancers set themselves to accommodate the old forms of security to the wishes of their employers. 1. They made the wadset to cover future debts, by taking it at once for sums 'advanced or to be advanced.' 2. The annualrent right, being the purchase of a rent redeemable on payment of the purchase money, was not so easily converted into a security for future debt; but it was made to serve the purpose, by a declaration (as Dallas informs us) that all other debts and engagements should be settled by the debtor before the power of redemption should be open to him. 3. To bend the form of the heritable bond to this new use, for which it was not originally calculated, other means were taken. As a security for a precise sum, this form is limited by the actual extent of what is due at the giving of the sasine, since there can be no security where there is no debt. It must, of course, be extinguished by payment or intromission, and cannot be tacitly revived. But as such a security was always thought competent for a cautionary engagement, or obligation of relief, the heritable right was given in security, and for relief of all sums, debts, engagements, and 'cautionaries.' This appears to have been a common security towards [673] the end of the seventeenth century.¹ These securities in relief were stopped in their effect as covers to future debts by the intervention of infestment in favour of another creditor.² But even with this qualification such securities were pregnant with mischief as instruments of fraud. By means of them a debtor could evade the provisions of the Act 1621, enacted for providing against conveyances to the prejudice of the diligence of creditors. He had only to grant a deed, such as either of those now described, while yet diligence had not begun against him; and when diligence began, his disponee paid off favourite creditors; neither the debtor himself nor the creditors being entitled to have the land restored without accounting to him for all the money he had paid on account of the debtor. As it was obvious also, that in all cases under a deed of this kind for security of the relief of all sums and engagements, the favourite creditors of bankrupts might receive payment of their debts with perfect safety to the trustee employed, it was, in order to avoid this, enacted by the Legislature (1696, c. 5), that 'because infestments for relief, not only of debts already con-earlier deed of security in which he had acquired an interest by assignment or retrocession. Love v Storie, 1863, 2 Macph. 22.]

tracted, but of debts to be contracted for hereafter, are often found to be the occasion and cover of fraud; all dispositions or other rights that shall be granted for hereafter, for relief or security of debts to be contracted for the future, shall be of no force as to any such debts that shall be found to be contracted after the sasine or infeftment following on the said disposition or right; but prejudice to the validity of the said disposition or right as to other points, as accords.'

7. SECURITIES FOR CASH-CREDITS.—The necessity of devising some means by which it might be possible to give security for future advances and cash-credits, led to a provision in the statute of 33 Geo. III. c. 74, and in the late Sequestration Act, 54 Geo. III. c. 137, permitting securities of this sort under certain conditions. The preamble of this part of the statute, after reciting the clause of the Act 1696, c. 5, relative to securities for future debts, proceeds thus: 'But it would tend not only to the benefit of commerce, but also of agriculture and manufactures, if securities by infeftment for the payment or relief of future balances arising upon cash accounts or credits, or of sums paid on such cash accounts or credits, were made an exception from the rule laid down in the said recited clause.' On this statement of the views of the Legislature, it is enacted, 1. That persons possessed of lands or other heritable subjects, and desirous to pledge them in security of sums paid or balances arising upon cash accounts or credits, although posterior to the date of the infeftment, may grant heritable securities accordingly on their lands or other heritable estate, with procuratory and precept for infefting any bank or banker, or other person who shall agree to give them such cash accounts or credits; and, 2. That securities may in the same way be granted by way of relief to any person who may become bound with the granter for payment of such sums or balances. But it is made an absolute condition on which the efficacy of the security is to depend, that the principal and interest which may become due upon the said cash accounts or credits shall be limited to a certain definite sum, to be specified in the security; the said definite sum not exceeding the amount of the principal sum, and three years' interest thereon at the rate of five per cent.¹

SECTION I.

OF THE COMPLETION OF HERITABLE SECURITIES BY RECORDED SASINE.

No real right in security constituted by act of the debtor over his feudal estate [674] is effectual, unless completed by sasine duly recorded.² The recorded instrument is thus the badge and criterion of preference among creditors. This doctrine may be considered, 1. In relation to ordinary estates in land; 2. In relation to burgage property.

SUBSECTION I.—OF THE INSTRUMENT OF SASINE.

Sasine is the symbolical tradition of the land, or other feudal subject, by the granter's bailie to the attorney of the grantee, in fulfilment of a conveyance by charter, disposition, heritable bond, etc.

² Under the term sasine, in the proposition stated thus generally, I include an instrument of resignation ad remanentiam in the special case of a conveyance in favour of the feudal superior. The act of resignation is truly the sasine or redelivery of the land to the superior; the instrument is the sole evidence of it, and it requires to be recorded precisely as an instrument of sasine is recorded. [By 8 and 9 Vict. c. 35, the ceremony of giving sasine was abolished, and the form of the instrument much simplified. This Act occupies an anomalous position in the statute book. It is neither repealed nor consolidated with the other conveyancing statutes, but is printed as an appendix to the Titles to Land Consolidation Act. Now that it has been made competent to record conveyances of every description, it is not likely that sasine will ever be resorted to in practice.]

It must be given on the ground itself;¹ on any part of the estate conveyed, if it all lie contiguous and is contained in one charter. If not contiguous, or if held by different tenures, or if the titles be from different superiors, or if the subjects be represented by different symbols, sasine must be given by successive deliveries on the several parcels respectively and successively; unless by a charter from the Crown the subjects have been combined in a clause of union, or unless they make part of a barony.²

The only proof of the sasine is a written instrument narrating the act; stating the reading and publishing of the precept; the ceremony of delivering the symbols to the attorney, in perfect consistency with the warrant or precept; enumerating and describing the subjects, with the evidence on which they are included in the sasine; naming the person to whom sasine is given, and deducing the title by which he acquires right to the precept, if he should not be the person in whose favour it was originally granted. The ceremony takes place in presence of a notary and two witnesses, who all sign the instrument in testimony of the facts narrated in it.³

A few of the important points in the law of sasine, as affected by recent decisions, may here be stated:—1. The sasine must in discontinuous or separate subjects be taken successively on each parcel. But it does not seem to be fatal to the sasine should this not be stated in the instrument, provided the expression be not inconsistent with the requisite acts, and provided there is not evidence of the successive acts having been neglected.⁴ 2. The lands must be described and identified as those referred to in the precept. Sometimes the [675] precept is conceived in terms so general as to convey no distinct evidence of authority to give sasine in any particular subject; and in such a case the instrument must prove that the notary produced and read the evidence which identified the lands.⁵ 3. The sasine must be given to a person named and designed;⁶ either the person named in the precept, or one who by production and publication of the proper titles is proved to be in the right of the precept.⁷ 4. The notary's holograph docquet must not only bear his attestation by the words vidi, scivi, et audiui of the several facts set forth, but specially state his personal presence at the ceremony.⁸ It must also describe the instrument correctly; and so, when the instrument consists of more than one sheet, the pages must be correctly stated.⁹ But

¹ Resignation ad remanentiam is a personal act of reinvestment, and may be made anywhere in the personal presence of the superior, or of a commissioner appointed to act for him.

The words of the instrument were, 'Sasinam, etc. omnium et singularum prædict. terrarum, etc. tradidit, etc. per terræ et lapidis pro dict. terris traditionem.' The usual terms are a compearance on the lands respectively and successively; and that these things were so done 'on the grounds of the said lands respectively and successively.' The objection was taken that there was no special and successive delivery of sasine proved by the instrument; but it was repelled.

Hepburn Belches v Stewart, 21 Jan. 1815, 18 Fac. Coll. 165, confirming the above.

Lord Kames reports an opinion of the Court (implied in both the above cases), 'That a precept to give infeftment in lands described in general to belong to the granter of the precept, is a sufficient warrant to give infeftment in every particular thereof, which, by production of the granter's infeftment, is vouched to come under the general description.' Trs. of Graham's Crs. v Hyslop, M. 50.

Sasine here was given to John Gillies, manager, and one of the partners of the Dalnotter Ironworks, belonging to Murdoch, Gordon, Gillies, & Co., and the other members of the said company. It was held a good sasine to Gillies, but not to the other partners.

⁹ See D. of Roxburgh v Hall, 1741, M. 14332; and Clark v Waddell, 1752, M. 14333. Act of Sederunt, 17th Jan. 1756.

when it is on one sheet, the number of the pages in the docquet is not necessary to be stated.¹ 5. The instrument must truly describe, so as to identify it, the warrant on which it proceeds.² 6. Errors in the sasine, if manifestly mere mistakes and innocent, are not held fatal.³ 7. Erasures of the name of the lands are fatal.⁴

The subject may be concluded with this observation, that it has been laid down as a principle ruling such cases, 'That where it appears ex facie of the instrument that the thing was done, and that sasine was in reality given, blunders or mistakes in extending the instrument ought not to annul the sasine.'⁵ But this doctrine is not to be too much relied on. An instrument required as a solemnity is not within the reach of that constructive power which a court of justice is called upon to exercise in questions upon contracts or wills, where the granter's intention must, if possible, be discovered and made effectual. If judges are allowed to supply the defects of solemnities and instruments, it unfixes the whole system, and renders property uncertain.⁶

SUBSECTION II.—OF THE RECORDING OF THE SASINE.⁷

Sasine has no effect in competition with third parties holding an unexceptionable [676] right to the land, unless it shall have been recorded in a register appointed for the purpose, within sixty days from the date of the instrument. And by the Act of 54 Geo. III. c. 137, sec. 12, the date of the registration is held in all questions on the bankrupt statute of 1696, c. 5, to be the date of the security. Recording is thus an important point in the law of securities, and on the laws relating to it depends that publication by which the credit of landed men in Scotland may be estimated with great correctness.

Without entering upon any disquisition concerning the advantages and evils of this system, it may be observed, 1. That the records do not present a complete view of every imperfection that may exist in the debtor's right; 2. That they have become intricate and difficult to be consulted, so as much to augment the danger of relying on the information which they supply; and, 3. That this difficulty is daily increasing, by the splitting down of estates into portions in the creation of securities over particular farms: for one who borrows money, and foresees the chance of a future necessity to borrow more, aware that it is not easy to procure a loan on a secondary security over his lands, confines the first transaction to a portion of his estate, so as to leave him at liberty to make a similar transaction on another portion. If the sasines of any county in Scotland for the last ten years be compared with the number of sasines in the same county for a similar period half a century ago, the increasing complexity of the records will very strikingly appear.

The registers were first instituted by unprinted statutes, which had for their object the prevention of forgery, more than publication to third parties, and which do not seem to have been much in observance.⁸ A statute which was passed in 1617 gave them their permanent constitution, as publications of burdens on land, and of conveyances. By that

⁷ [By the Heritable Securities Acts, 8 and 9 Vict. c. 31, and 10 and 11 Vict. c. 50, it was made competent to record the security itself instead of expeding an instrument of sasine upon it. The principle having been since extended to conveyances of every description, sasines are rarely if ever resorted to in practice. On the subject of this section, reference is made to the provisions of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, regulating the registration of conveyances. See secs. 15-19.]

statute it was required that every sasine, in order to have effect against third parties, should be recorded within sixty days of its date.¹

Prior to these Acts, the preference depended on the infeftment being either public, from the superior, or completed by actual possession, till which it was held latent. The natural effect of the Act 1617, c. 16, should have been to take away all those distinctions, by affording the means of knowing at once from the record what sasines existed. But the Act did not at first produce its full effect, and the distinction of public and private infeftments still subsisted. The system of registration, however, was gradually improving; and the first check on the partiality or negligence of keepers of records was imposed by the regulations 1672, c. 16, which ordered a minute-book to be kept of the presentment of sasines for registration, to be compared quarterly with the record.² But a better remedy was proposed by Lord Stair, and embodied in the Act of Sederunt 15th July 1692, viz. that the presenter of the sasine should see the minute immediately written out and signed by himself and the keeper. This was offered, as Lord Stair says, by the Lords to the Legislature, and adopted by 1693, c. 14.³ These improvements having corrected most of the evils attending the imperfect state of the registers, the Legislature now thought it safe to alter expressly the former law as to public and base infeftments, and to place the preference of sasines entirely on the priority of their registration. This was done by 1693, c. 13.⁴

By 1686, c. 19, the certificate of the clerk on the back of the sasine had been declared

Similar regulations were, by 1681, c. 11, introduced in the case of sasines of burgage tenements; only, instead of the county records, the town-clerks are ordered to keep records on purpose. See below, p. 722.

² 1672, c. 16. 'There was,' says Fountainhall, 'a proposal and overture made to this Parliament (1681) anent the minute-books of hornings, inhibitions, infeftments, etc., that they should be printed and sold off, and be authentic, that a man for twelve pence might know from year to year what encumbrances any land or estate were under; and if they were not to be found in that minute, then they were not to make faith. But this was propaling, denuding, and discovering too much the weakness of the nobility and some of the gentry's estates, and so was found inconvenient.' 1 Fount. 156.

sufficient for the security of the party, in evidence of the registration. But this was, on the suggestion of Lord Stair,¹ corrected by 1696, c. 18, which declares the whole effect of sasines, as against third parties, to depend upon their being 'duly booked and insert in the register.'²

Under these statutes, the requisite of registration includes three particulars: 1. The entry in the minute-book of the presentment, with a general description of the sasine and of the lands, and a reference to the part of the record where the copy of the sasine is to be found; 2. The transcript in the record; and, 3. The certificate on the back of the sasine, containing also reference to the pages of the record where the sasine is to be found.

The minute-book ascertains precisely the day on which the sasine is presented for [678] recording; and that is ordered to be the date also on which the sasine is to be actually recorded; or rather, sasines are required to be recorded according to the order of the entry in that book. If this had been enforced by declaring the entry in the minute-book to be the criterion of preference, provided the sasine itself were either in the hands of the keeper of the record, or transcribed in the register, the system would have answered its purpose. But it is enforced only by penalties directed against the keeper, namely deprivation, and a declaration that he shall be responsible for damages. It may happen, however, that either the sasine may not be recorded within the sixty days, or it may not be recorded at all, or it may be postponed to a sasine presented subsequently. The rules are:—

1. The date of presentment, according to the minute-book, is to be held the date of recording, in a question whether the sasine has been recorded within the sixty days; and in such case it affords no objection that the actual transcription has not taken place within the sixty days.³ The certificate of registration on the back of the sasine correctly bears the date of presentment; and by that certificate, if truly bearing the date of presenting as in the minute-book, questions on the Act 1696, c. 5, will, under the late statute,⁴ probably be determined, provided the sasine be in the hands of the keeper of the record, or transcribed in the register.⁵

2. In order to have effect against third parties, the sasine must be actually transcribed into the register. It would have been in all respects better had the instrument been deposited in the Register House, and a transcript given out to the party; and many questions would thus have been avoided of a very distressing kind. The rules respecting this the actual recording of the instrument are: 1. That it must be fully transcribed; not entered by abbreviation and reference, but verbatim;⁶ and particularly it is required by Act of

² 1696, c. 18, proceeds on the preamble, 'That unless seisms and other writs and diligences appointed to be registrate be booked, and insert in the respective registers appointed for that effect, the lieges cannot be certiorate thereof, which is the great use and effect of their registration.' Therefore 'no seisin, or other writ or diligence appointed to be registrate, shall be of any force or effect against any but the granters and their heirs, unless it be duly booked and insert in the register.'

Sir A. M'Kenzie v M'Leod, 1768, M. 8800. In consequence of a very clear proof of the general practice and understanding, the minute of presentment was in these cases held to be the true date of the registration. These were election cases; and by 16 Geo. II. c. 11, sec. 10, it is enacted that no person can be enrolled as a freeholder in a county, unless his sasine has been recorded a year before the enrolment. Votes were objected to on this clause, the minute of presentment being beyond the year, but the sasine having been recorded within it. The Court held the minute of presentment to be sufficient.

E. of Fife v Gordon, 1774, M. 8850; same case, 5 Brown 589.

⁴ 54 Geo. II. c. 137, sec. 12.

⁵ Dunbar v Sutherland, 1790, M. 8799. This was an election question. A sasine had been duly marked by the keeper as recorded of a date beyond the year, but it was not actually transcribed in the record for a few days, which brought that act within the year. No minute-book was kept in that county (Caithness); and the Court, moved by the evil which otherwise would be produced to the whole county, held the registration as of the date of the certificate.

Gray v Hope, 1790, M. 8796, where, in a sasine, as transcribed in the record itself, the lands of Drumbowie having been omitted, the sasine was, in an election case, held null as to those lands.

Stewart v E. of Fife, 1827, 5 S. 383, N. E. 356, was an election question, in which the objection was similar to the above. Part of the lands in the qualification were omitted in recording the sasine, and it was held ineffectual.

Sederunt that the notary's docquet shall be verbatim transcribed.¹ 2. That clerical errors in transcribing essential parts of the instrument are fatal.² 3. That although the record [679] may be allowed to be corrected within the sixty days, this cannot be done after the expiration of that term.³

3. A competition may arise between a sasine first transcribed, though last presented, and a sasine which by the minute-book is proved to have been first presented, though last transcribed. A question has occurred in election law which has some influence on such a contest,—namely, Whether a sasine, transcribed into the register out of the order which it bore in the minute-book, be duly recorded? The two divisions of the Court pronounced different judgments.⁴ The determination in the latter case quoted below seems preferable. Both the date of presenting, indeed, and the order of recording, are best ascertained by the minute of presentation; which, as bearing a distinct reference to the place of the volume in which the transcript is to be found, admits not in any degree of the danger supposed to exist, that, on examining the record, one might not be able to find the sasine, and so be entitled to hold none to be in the record. The judges were careful, however, to reserve the question entire as in a competition; and were such a question to arise, the point must be held as unsettled. It might be of some importance in the argument to observe that there is one case in which the minute-book is unquestionably the criterion,—namely, where neither of the sasines is yet entered in the register. The sasine first in date, but last presented, would by this criterion be preferred. It is a matter which well deserves to be settled by the Legislature. And there seems to be little doubt that, according to the true spirit of the law, it ought to be enacted, that the entry in the minute-book should be the date of the registration, provided the sasine be actually inserted in the record before the principal sasine is redelivered to the party, with an entry in the minute-book of the page of the record on returning the sasine to the party. In this way, those who search the record would find either the sasine itself in the hands of the keeper, or the record of it in the book. In absence of any legislative remedy, it may be observed, 1. That the declared intention of the Legislature was to secure the recording of sasines in the precise order of their presentment, 'that purchasers and creditors might know with whom they might safely contract.' 2. That they declare the negligence of keepers to be detrimental, in so far as, by not inserting sasines in the 'order of their being presented, none could know by inspection of the registers what writs appointed to be registered were in the hands of the keepers of the registers, and thereby could not securely bargain.' And, 3. That it is to remedy those evils, and afford the means of 'securely bargaining,' that the minute-book, expressing not only the day, but the hour, is appointed; and that it is ordered 'that the writs shall be registered exactly conform to the order of the said minute-book.' There can be no doubt, therefore,

² M'Queen v Nairne, 1823, 2 S. 637, N. E. 539. The omission of 'primo' in the date made the sasine bear date in 1820 instead of 1821. It was held fatal, although the date was correctly entered in the minute-book.

Denniston v Spiers, 1824, 3 S. 285, N. E. 200. The error here was only in the year of the king's reign; but it was held fatal, although the year of our Lord was correctly transcribed.

³ Dundas v Denniston, 1824, 3 S. 400, N. E. 281.

N.B.—The case of Tait, 1822, 1 S. 241, N. E. 229, was held to have been decided per incuriam, and it was declared not to be a precedent hereafter.

⁴ In the case of Drummond v Sir A. Ramsay, 24 June 1809, F. C., the sasine was presented on 25th September, omitted to be entered of that date in the minute-book, but immediately entered in the record. On 4th October the omission in the minute-book was observed, and an entry made of that date, and the date of the record and certificate erased to correspond. The great question was, Whether it was duly recorded, as it stood out of its order in the record? The Court (Second Division), judging on the election statute, held that the inserting of the sasine in the record, out of the order of the minute-book, was fatal to the claim of enrolment. The present Lord President Hope, Lord Glenlee, and Lord Newton, concurred in this opinion. It was opposed by the late Lord Meadowbank.

In the case of Adam v Duthie, 19 June 1810, F. C., the same question was determined the other way by the First Division; the late Lord President Blair, and a majority of the judges, holding the minute-book to give the true date of recording, and the transcription into the record book to be of no importance, provided it was duly referred to in the minute of presentation, so as to be found in the record by those wishing to examine it.

that the Legislature intended the minute-book to be the regulator of the order of preference by priority. At the same time, it must be admitted that there are no legislative words [680] on which to ground a judgment in favour of a sasine last registered, though first in the minute-book. If the Act 1693, c. 14, had declared a sasine recorded out of the order of the minute-book to be null in competition, this might have authorized judgment in favour of the sasine recorded last, if first presented. But there neither are such words, nor anything equivalent to them;¹ and courts of law are left to determine the question on the construction of the statute 1693, c. 13, which declares the priority of registration to be the criterion of preference.

4. When the competition has arisen prior to the presenting of any of the sasines for registration, the preference is determined by the priority of date of the sasine.

5. A sasine not recorded within the sixty days is, by the statute 1617, declared to make no faith in judgment, by way of action or exception, in prejudice of a third party who has acquired a perfect and lawful right to the lands and heritages; but (without) prejudice to use the said writs against the party maker thereof, and his heirs and successors.² It follows, 1. That the sasine is effectual against the granter and his heirs,³ and ineffectual only in competition with a perfect and lawful right; and, 2. That it is good against all having only personal rights to the lands.⁴

How far that will affect the power of taking a second sasine on the precept, shall be discussed hereafter.⁵

SUBSECTION III.—OF SASINES IN BURGAGE SUBJECTS.

Conveyances or securities of burgage subjects must be completed by a recorded sasine. The burgh itself, as a corporation, holds of the Crown by a tenure which requires no renewal;⁶ and each tenement in the burgh also holds in burgage of the Crown, the magistrates being by the charter merely the Crown's commissioners, in receiving resignations and renewing the burgage holdings of the proprietors.⁷

1. SASINE.—The right is conveyed, or a security granted, only by a deed containing a procuratory of resignation, on which the subject being resigned in the hands of the magistrates, 'as in those of His Majesty, immediate lawful superiors thereof,' sasine is forthwith given by the magistrates. The symbol is staff and baton, and not earth and stone.⁸ [681] The resignation must be renewed, and sasine given by a magistrate;⁹ and the instrument is extended by the clerk of the burgh.

2. RECORDING.—Clerks of burghs acting as notaries in the infeftments of heirs, dis-

those having a perfect and full right. See Durie 197; also Durie 61, and the cases there referred to.

Another example of the rule is given in Rowan v Colvil, 1638, M. 13546, where a competition arose between an unrecorded infeftment in a mill, cum astrictis multuris, and a posterior infeftment in land, with a clause cum molendinis et multuris. The Court sustained the unrecorded infeftment against the disponee, who had no right to the mill.

ponees, and creditors, in burgage subjects, had, by the regularity with which they entered the sasines in their books, given so much credit to their records, that in the Act 1617, c. 16, establishing the recording of sasines in the records of the shire, an exception was made of burgage subjects. But errors and omissions crept in, which, after an attempt to correct them by Act of Sederunt, 22d February 1681, the Legislature, by 1681, c. 11, provided against, by requiring that sasines on subjects holding burgage should be recorded within sixty days from their date, in books to be kept by the town-clerk, under the penalty of the conveyance being held null.¹

If the subject is to be held burgage, the sasine must be recorded in the books of the burgh.² But where the holding is in feu, the registration ought to be in the county record.³ The difficulty in these cases is, to determine whether the holding be burgage or feu. In the two cases first above quoted, the subject was to be held for payment of a feu-duty, but bearing the common burdens of scot and lot, personal suit and presence in the courts of the burgh. In the last, the lands did not hold burgage. In constituting securities over burgage subjects, sometimes an heritable bond is granted, to be held, not in burgage, but in feu of the granter. Such a security, it would seem, must be recorded in the register of the county, not in the burgh record. But in the doubt which still hangs over this subject, it would be advisable to record the sasine in both ways.

SUBSECTION IV.—OF THE PREFERENCE OF SASINES AS DEPENDING ON THE NATURE OF THE PRECEPT, THE STATE OF THE TITLES, ETC.

The right created may be either under a precept for holding base, or under a precept for a public holding, or under an alternative precept.

1. Where the right proceeds on a conveyance, in sale or in security, granted directly by the debtor, to be held BASE of himself, and completed by sasine duly recorded, the warrant of infeftment is a precept of sasine to be held de me. And what has already been said is sufficient to explain the criterion of preference.

2. Where the claimant's right proceeds on a conveyance to be held of the granter's superior only, it is called a PUBLIC holding. The warrant for infeftment is a procuratory of resignation, or a precept for sasine to be held à me de superiore meo: generally the deed contains both. And the grantee may proceed in one of two ways: Either, 1. He may, on the procuratory of resignation, have the lands resigned into the hands of the granter's superior, in order that a new charter may be granted to the disponent. Such charter is called a Charter of Resignation, and is completed by a sasine duly recorded. Preference here depends on the [682] registration of the sasine.⁴ Or, 2. The grantee may take sasine on the precept à me, and apply for a Charter of Confirmation, which ratifies that sasine, and makes it equally effectual as if taken on a legitimate precept. This effect takes place not merely as from the date of the charter, but as from the date of the sasine itself: and so the registration of the sasine thus taken will regulate the preference of the right.⁵ It will, however, be observed,

² Burnet v Drummond, 5 July 1711, Forb. 517. Here Burnet was infeft in an annualrent out of some tenements and burgh acres in Culross, on a precept of sasine in an heritable bond, to be held of Sands, the proprietor of the subjects. The sasine was recorded in the town court books. Sands became bankrupt, and in a competition of his creditors this infeftment was objected to as null. But the Lords sustained the infeftment.

Dixon v Lowther, 1823, 2 S. 176, N. E. 158.

⁴ It was formerly a subject of much controversy, whether by mere resignation the vassal was so entirely divested of his right, that no future right granted by him could be available, though first completed by infeftment? See Leges Burg. c. 117; Balfour's Practicks, p. 158. Dirleton, in his Latin tract on Resignation, which he discusses in five questions, contends strenuously for the total extinction of the resigner's power. Craig, Hope, Stair, and Stewart give to the opposite opinion the weight of their great authority, and at last it was settled by a solemn decision that the resignation has no such effect. Sir W. Purves v Strachan, 1677, M. 6890.

⁵ See Hope, Min. Pract. tit. 5; Stair ii. 3. 28 et seq.; Ersk. ii. 7.

that the sasine in this case is ineffectual till confirmed; since it proceeds on a precept for a public holding merely, which the superior alone can effectually authorize.¹ It follows from this, First, That if anything occur, between the date of the sasine and the charter of confirmation, to prevent the superior from exercising his power of confirming, the sasine will remain ineffectual. This is called a Mid-impediment. As, for example, if the former proprietor have granted to another person a conveyance, on the procuratory of which that person has resigned, and obtained a charter of resignation, on which sasine has followed, the right will be completely transferred, and the superior's confirmation of the other conveyance will be unavailing. Or, if two public rights have been granted to different persons, and sasines have been taken on each, the sasine first confirmed is preferable, because the superior's power is thereby exhausted; and so, as between those two sasines, the criterion of preference is not the registration of the sasines, but the date of the confirmation. Secondly, If the former proprietor, after a conveyance on which public infeftment is taken, but before confirmation, shall grant a base right on which sasine shall be taken, the confirmation will render valid the public sasine, but under burden of the base right constituted in the meanwhile.² But it is no mid-impediment, that the person who obtains confirmation is made aware (even by the warrandice in his own conveyance) of the existence of a prior security.³

3. Where the right is granted with an alternative holding à me vel de me, and sasine follows, it is held to be in the first instance a base right, effectual from the date of the sasine; and afterwards, on confirmation, it becomes a public right.⁴ This is the common form of conveyances and securities. Of old, a double conveyance was granted, one for the purpose of holding base, the other for the purpose of holding public; and two precepts accompanied them. The two conveyances were afterwards combined, presenting in the clause containing an obligation to infeft by two manners of holding the vestige of the ancient form. And in the progress of improvement, instead of two precepts, one expressed in terms indefinite was introduced, fit to be used as the warrant either of sasine to be held base, or of a sasine to be held of the superior. But it is carefully to be observed, that a sasine taken on this indefinite precept is not always capable of the alternative construction above explained. 1. However indefinite the expression of the precept, a sasine taken on it will be only a public sasine, and utterly ineffectual till confirmation, if the deed contain no [683] alternative holding.⁵ And, 2. The alternative nature of the precept is to be judged of by the obligation to infeft.⁶

4. Where the conveyance is from a vassal to his superior, it is accomplished by resignation ad remanentiam. The resignation operates as a restoration of the superior's sasine to its full original extent, as before the vassal's right was constituted. There is no occasion, therefore, for a new sasine. The instrument of resignation completes the superior's right; but as there is no sasine, and the records must be satisfied, this instrument of resignation

Here the obligation to infeft was only to be held 'from me, of and under my lawful superiors,' etc. There was a procuratory of resignation and also a precept of sasine indefinite, and commencing thus: 'attour to the end the said H. W. may be immediately infeft,' etc. At first there was some doubt whether this intention of an immediate infeftment which could be effectual only if base, was not enough to characterize the precept as alternative. But the Court at last held the obligation to infeft as conclusive.

Peebles v Watson, 1825, 4 S. 290, N. E. 293. Here there was no obligation to infeft de me, but 'to infeft by two infeftments and manners of holding, and that either by resignation or confirmation.' The want of the obligation to infeft to hold de me, and the distinguishing words 'confirmation or resignation,' applicable only to public holding, were held to characterize the sasine as only public, and ineffectual till confirmation.

M'Nair v M'Nair & Brunton, 1827, 5 S. 372, N. E. 345. Here the same characteristic expressions of the manner of completing the right by confirmation or resignation were again held conclusive of the character of a public right.

must be recorded, as the sasine is in ordinary cases; and it is by the date of registration of the instrument of resignation that the preference is fixed.¹

SECTION II.

OF SECURITIES AND CONVEYANCES IN COMPETITION.

Rights in security may be reduced to two classes: one comprehending those in which the real right depends on a sasine in the claimant's person; the other comprehending those in which the real right depends on a sasine in the person of another.

SECTION I.—RIGHTS IN SECURITY, DEPENDING ON SASINE IN THE CLAIMANT.

I. SUPERIOR FOR HIS DUTIES AND CASUALTIES.—The superior is secured in his duties and casualties by his own charter and sasine; and the vassal's right is held under condition of payment of the feudal duties contained in the reddendo.

1. The DUTIES form a debitum fundi preferable to all the vassal's creditors, and may by POINDING OF THE GROUND be made effectual against the vassal and all singular successors in the land.² They are entitled to a preference over all rights granted by the vassal; and this secures the arrears of feu-duty due at the time of the competition. In bankruptcy, the preference is given in the course of judicial sale or sequestration, on the footing that [684] the title of the purchaser cannot be completed without complying with this condition.³

2. But it is not merely for the arrears and current feu-duties that the superior has a preference. His non-entry and relief duties, and composition for singular successors, as already explained,⁴ sometimes constitute claims of great importance; and for these his security is equally complete.

II. SECURITIES FOR DEBT ON FEUDAL AND BURGAGE SUBJECTS.—These have been already enumerated, and it will not be necessary to add much to what has been said.

An indirect effect is produced by one of the securities stated above, which ought to be taken notice of. The security by disposition absolute, but subject to redemption, either in terms of a backbond or other form of acknowledgment, or according to the confidential understanding of the parties, is the proper form of security for covering future advances (unless under the late statutes respecting securities for cash accounts), and for securing obligations in relief. And it is accordingly the form in which banks generally take their securities for cash-credits. But the point to be now marked is, the effect of this security as going beyond the extent of the original transaction, to cover subsequent advances or engagements. It once was matter of controversy whether the creditor was entitled to withhold a reconveyance till payment, not only of the original loan, but of all subsequent advances. But this is now settled in favour of the creditor. The doctrine, indeed, may be laid down generally, that in all cases where one holds an absolute conveyance of property, whether heritable or moveable, under a personal obligation to restore it on payment of certain debts,

² The summons of poinding the ground concludes, 1. For letters to poind and apprise the goods, etc., under the restriction that the goods of tenants shall not be taken to the value of more than a term's rent; and, 2. For apprising of the ground-right and property of the lands to the value of the remainder, to the effect of extinguishing the vassal's right and vesting the same in the superior by consolidation, but redeemably. Stair iv. 23. 5; Ersk. iv. 1. 11 et seq.

³ The superior has a personal claim for his feu-duties on the contract, as well as a real right as for a debitum fundi.

it will subsist as a good security, not only to cover a specific debt; but, under a general stipulation in the backbond to restore on payment of all advances, it will be effectual to cover every sum advanced previous to the demand of a reconveyance, and this not only against creditors, but against purchasers also. Against general creditors the demand of a reconveyance may effectually be resisted, even without any such general stipulation, till they or the debtor shall have paid every debt which shall have arisen subsequently. The holder is not bound to denude till he is satisfied and relieved of those debts.¹ In particular, a security, by absolute conveyance to land, where not restricted by a backbond recorded or produced in judgment, has been sustained to cover all debts due to the donee.² After such recording or production in judgment, the security is held to lose all power of further extension, and to remain stationary as at that moment.³

It is a more difficult question, What shall be the effect of a disposition in security, [685] conceived in terms of full conveyance, but expressly in security of a certain transaction, where the precise amount cannot be ascertained; as, for example, in relief of what may be deficient and requisite to be paid of a composition? It is a rule in all rights in security, that the debt for which they are granted shall be specific in amount, and in the name of the creditor.⁴ And the question here is, Whether the words of absolute conveyance have the effect of raising an exception to that rule, as in the case of an absolute disposition? The most unchallengeable security in such a case, undoubtedly, is an absolute conveyance, with a backbond recorded. But it does not appear to be hurtful to the effect of the absolute conveyance, that the deed should also set forth the nature of the transaction.

² Riddel v Crs. of Niblie, 1782, M. 1154. Here Jamieson had disposed his lands absolutely to Niblie, who granted a backbond declaring the infetment to be in security of certain debts of Jamieson in the person of Niblie, and for such debts as Niblie should afterwards transact with Jamieson's creditors. An objection was taken on stat. 1696, c. 5, to the infetment, as for relief or security of debts to be contracted. The Court repelled this objection, in respect that the disposition was absolute; and the great doctrine was laid down, that the donee having become creditor on the faith of his absolute right, could not be called on by the disponent or his creditors to denude, unless upon satisfaction for all the debts standing in his person.

Keith v Maxwell of Terraughty (below, note 3). Lord Justice-Clerk Macqueen and Lord President Campbell both said in this case, that to impeach the decision in Niblie's case would be an injury to the country.

Bartlet v Buchanan, 27 Nov. 1812, F. C. On the above principle, debts by personal bond were sustained as comprehended under the absolute infetment to the effect of diminishing the terce. [In Lindsay v Davidson, 1853, 15 D. 583, a creditor in possession under an absolute disposition without backbond was held entitled to resist an interdict by the trustee for the debtor's creditors, the object of which was to disturb his possession, although he admitted that his right was truly a security.]

³ Keith v Maxwell, 1795, Bell Oct. Ca. 234. Sym conveyed his lands to Maxwell, who granted a backbond, declaring this to be a security for a debt of £6000 due to Constable, for whom Maxwell was trustee. This backbond was not recorded, but a reduction of the security was brought on Sym becoming bankrupt, and the backbond was produced in that action. The security was not reduced. Then Maxwell, the donee, became cautioner for Sym in a cash-account with Sir William Forbes & Co.; and Sym gave a bond of relief, with a declaration that the infetment should subsist as a security for his relief, and that he should not be bound to denude till fully relieved. A challenge of this new security was raised by Sym's creditors; and Lord Justice-Clerk Macqueen at first sustained the security, holding that the original conveyance, being an absolute disposition which did not fall under the Act 1696 (respecting securities for future debts), subsists till Maxwell is relieved of his engagements for Mr. Sym, whether prior or posterior to the date of the infetment. He thus applied the general rule of Niblie's case without discrimination. But afterwards he, as well as the rest of the Court, concurred in a distinction pointed out by Lord President Campbell, grounded on the production in judgment of the backbond by Maxwell to Sym, whereby the absolute conveyance came to be restricted to a mere security for the £6000, and stood so restricted on the records of the Court. But in making this distinction both these eminent judges expressed their full approbation of the rule adopted in Niblie's case as law. [See also Gardyne v Royal Bank, 1 Macq. 358, reversing 13 D. 912; Darroch v Ranken, 1855, 17 D. 935. ⁴ See below, p. 730.

The right conferred is universal; the condition is a fair one, though the amount of the burden is necessarily indefinite.¹

SECTION II.—RIGHTS IN SECURITY, DEPENDING ON SASINE IN ANOTHER PERSON.

In sales, conveyances, and settlements of land, it is frequent to reserve burdens on the right of the disponee, or powers to raise debts against the estate. The former are called RESERVED BURDENS; the latter are known by the name of FACULTIES TO BURDEN, and have already been sufficiently discussed.²

In entering on the modes of constituting securities by reservation, and their effect in competition with other real rights, it may be observed, that if the question arise before the right of the disponee is completed by infestment, the burden and claim of preference, constituted or reserved, will be equally effectual against the disponee and his creditors as if both rights were completed by sasine. A personal right to lands is qualified by the conditions which it contains; and the creditors of the disponee never can complete the feudal right, as coming in place of the disponee, without also completing at the same time the real burden.³

[686] Burdens by reservation are conceived either in favour of the disposer, or person who grants the conveyance; or in favour of a third party. The former may be more strictly, perhaps, called RESERVED BURDENS; but both sorts of burdens are designated by this term, without discrimination,—the debt in both being reserved, or excepted, from the right to be acquired by the disponee.

I.—MODE OF CONSTITUTING A RESERVED BURDEN.

A real burden is created by reservation, when, in terms appropriate, a specific sum is declared, in a disposition or settlement, to be a burden on the right of the disponee, and when this condition enters the infestment and is recorded. The ordinary case is of a conveyance to be completed by infestment, either on a precept de me for holding base; or on a procuratory for resignation in favour and for new infestment to the disponee; or on a precept à me de superiore meo, with confirmation: and in those cases no doubt has ever been moved, except in relation to the expression of the condition. But it is also competent to create a real burden where the conveyance is by a vassal to a superior, and the transference is completed, not by sasine, but by resignation ad remanentiam; for although resignation ad remanentiam be in one sense a mode of extinguishing, not of creating a feudal right, yet where it is an act of conveyance consented to by the superior, it is truly, in the sense of law, an infestment qualified by its conditions.⁴

In constituting, in favour either of the disposer or of a third party, a burden on the

¹ Outram, Trustee for Evan's Crs., v Dryden, 16 May 1816, F. C. The deed there narrated a composition which Evans had engaged to pay, the engagement of the disponees as cautioners for the deficiency, whatever it might be; and on this narrative a shop in Leith was disposed in simple terms, with a power to sell it, qualified by an obligation to account, and after relieving themselves to pay the balance to Evans. This form of security was objected to as for an indefinite debt, and on that point reported to the Court by Lord Reston on memorials; but the Court did not listen to the objection.

to the creditors of the disponer; for the feudal right never was taken out of his person, and Mrs. Lamont was an adjudger, entitled to come in only pari passu with his creditors, though preferable to those of the disponer. On examining the papers, I do not find that any question was stirred as to the creditors of Lachlan, the disposer.

⁴ Wilson v Frazer, 1822, 1 S. 316, N. E. 292. Here, in the procuratory of resignation ad remanentiam, it was declared 'that the lands were resigned with and under the real lien and burden of £11,000, etc., and with and under the several provisions and declarations before written.' The procuratory was executed, and the instrument of resignation recorded, and the burden was held good. Affirmed 15 April 1824, 2 S. App. Ca. 162.

right of the disponee, so as to give to the security the force of a real right, these rules must be observed :—

I. The Reserved Burden must be conceived as a Real, not as a Personal Debt.—It must be expressly declared a burden on the infertment or lands themselves; the strongest expressions, directed to the disponee merely, not being sufficient,¹ and the law rather inclining to freedom from such burdens.

1. Where the disponer is declared liable for or burdened with the debt, it is held that, although the conveyance be declared ‘to be granted and accepted of under that condition,’ or although the deed be expressed to be ‘under the conditions following, appointed to be engrossed in the infertments,’ the debts will form no real burden. The older decisions had rather tended to give to the expression of such condition and declaration the effect of real burdens; but the later determinations have denied to them this effect, and fixed that ‘in a clause by which singular successors are to be affected, there must be no room for ambiguity: the inclination to impose a burden on the land by reservation must be expressed in the most explicit, precise, and perspicuous manner.’²

2. It does not seem to be enough to constitute a real burden, that the lands are [687] disposed in trust, and that one of the purposes is the payment of debt.³ There is no established phraseology, no voces signatæ, for constituting such a burden. It is sufficient that the words declaring the burden shall be directed against the lands themselves, and so as to M’Intyre v Masterton, 1824, 2 S. 664, N. E. 559. Here the words were similar to those used in Martin’s case, and the Court decided on that precedent; and ‘in respect that, although the lands in question are conveyed under the burden of the payment of the sum of money therein mentioned, and now claimed by the pursuers, yet the same are not distinctly and expressly declared a real burden on the lands.’

The previous cases also are worthy of notice.

Ballantyne, Nov. 1685, Pres. Falc. No. 101; Countess of Rothes v French, 1698, M. 10288; Allan v Cameron’s Crs., 1780, M. 10265, aff. 2 Pat. 572.

Stewart v Home, 1792, M. 4649. Here the Court delivered a clear opinion, that the obligation, conceived personally, was not changed by its being engrossed in the sasine. In this case, the entail was granted to and in favour of Dr. George Stewart, etc., with and under the provisions, conditions, etc., that the said George Stewart and his foresaids shall be burdened with and obliged to pay the whole just and lawful debts, etc. The Lord Ordinary held, that ‘whatever annuities or debts are mentioned in the entail, as a burden on the estate entailed, must restrict the claim of terce.’ Lord Justice-Clerk Macqueen agreed to this principle, but it did not apply to the case. The heir is burdened with the debts, but the lands are not. A purchaser or adjudger would take the lands free. The burden is laid on the disponee and his heirs. The engrossing in the infertment will not alter the words, or their legal import. Decisions have settled this doctrine. Lord Dreghorn said that it is not a mere questio voluntatis whether a burden be real. It must be imposed in a certain way, and by the use of fixed terms. The disposer seems here to have intended to burden the lands, but he has not done it. The case of Cameron affords an example of a burden intended, but held ineffectual, in a very hard case. Lord President Campbell agreed to that doctrine. All that is engrossed in the infertment is that Dr. Stewart shall be burdened. An adjudger would take these lands free from any burden. It was also observed, that in so far as the debts were indefinite, there was another objection to the security. Baron Hume’s Session Papers, and notes.

It may be observed that, in some of these cases, there were debts both of an indefinite and general description, and of a specific nature. We shall immediately see that the indefinite nature of the debt affords an effectual bar to its being considered as real; but the above cases, as applicable to the definite burdens imposed on the disponee, establish that something more than a personal obligation on the disponee is necessary.

In the case of Forresters, 28 Jan. 1798, a settlement was made, ‘with and under the burden of payment of the legacies and provisions following, which I bind and oblige my heirs and said disponees and executors to pay.’ This was held to make no real burden.

In the case of Colquhoun, 28 Feb. 1797, the deed burdened the disponer with the payment of the following sums of money. It was held no real burden.

³ In the Ranking of Redcastle, a question arose on the effect of a trust-deed executed for the purpose of discharging debts contained in a signed list, which was ordered to be recorded along with the infertment. To the case, as it decided the effect of such a list so recorded in removing the objection of indefinite security, we shall attend hereafter (see below, p. 729). But eminent judges took occasion to say that, supposing the security in other respects unobjectionable, the words did not seem sufficient to constitute a real burden. The conveyance was to Sir Hector M’Kenzie and John Tait, and their assignees in trust, in order that they might levy the rents, etc., and sell, etc., for the uses and purposes, etc. for payment of the debts in the list. Lord President Campbell held these clauses not to be fitly framed for making the debts real. Lord Eskgrove concurred with this opinion. Chalmers, etc. v Crs. of M’Kenzie of Redcastle, 15 Feb. 1791, Baron Hume’s Session Papers, and 3 Pat. 417.

leave no room for doubt. In settling this point it has not been held that there is any good distinction between a conveyance of lands 'under the burden of debt,' and 'under the burden of payment of debt.' Either of the expressions is sufficient, provided in other respects the burden be well constituted.¹

3. Where, in a disposition and infeftment, a burden is imposed, by providing that a sum [688] shall be paid by the disponee, and that 'in case it should not be paid the right shall be void,' it is held a real burden.²

4. As personal conditions, however strongly expressed, are ineffectual to make a real burden, much less can the strongest declaration in a backbond, the disposition being ex facie absolute, constitute such a right.³

II. The Debt must in the Dispositive Clause of the Deed be properly expressed as a Burden on the Lands.—The Court held in one case the burden to be real, although in the dispositive clause it was clearly expressed as a personal debt only.⁴ But the general rule which regulates the construction and effect of conveyances mainly by the dispositive, is not to be considered as shaken by that decision, which has always been held questionable. It may be laid down, 1. That if the dispositive clause be perfectly clear in its expression, it will regulate the nature of the right, and scarcely can be controlled or qualified by any other clause or indication in the deed.⁵ 2. That if there be ambiguity in the dispositive, but nothing inconsistent with the indication from the other clauses, the burden may be held real or otherwise, as the general strain of the deed and words of the precept of sasine point out.

III. The Burden must also be so expressed and incorporated in the Sasine, in order to be

In the following cases, touching the above distinction, there were other points involved, which were corrected by the course of decisions in the note, p. 727, note 2.

Innes of Coxton's Crs. v Duff of Dipple, 1719, M. 10244, Rob. 355. 'A disposition was granted to Innes of Coxton, with and under the burden of the payment of the disposer's debts, cum et sub onere solutionis omnium legitimorum debitorum.' The disponee expedes a charter containing all these burdens thus expressed; but, without being infeft, he sold the lands, and the purchaser was infeft upon the assigned precept. The debts were found real burdens.

Crs. of Prestonhall v the Donator of Fraserdale's Escheat, 24 Dec. 1719, Rob. 372. Lord Prestonhall, in his entail, provided and declared, that Hugh Master of Lovat's fee of the entailed lands, and Alexander M'Kenzie's liferent, 'shall be affected and stand burdened with the payment of all the tailzier's lawful debts.' This was found a real burden.

In both these cases the decision was overturned in the House of Lords on another principle, viz. the inefficacy of all indefinite burdens on land. 1 April 1721. In the Dict. vol. ii. p. 67, there is no notice of the reversal. The judgments on appeal have been published in Robertson's Reports of Cases on appeal from Scotland, 355 and 372.

Crs. of Smith v his Brothers and Sisters, 10 Jan. 1738, Dict. vol. ii. p. 67. The disposition here bore: 'As also, these presents are granted with the express burden of the payment of 8000 merks Scots, which the said James Smith, by acceptance hereof, binds and obliges him, etc., thankfully to content and pay to John, Gilbert, etc., my younger children, equally among them.' The Court decided that the above clause makes the provision real. Lord Elchies says: 'The Lords found that, by the conception of the clause, the debt was a real burden, albeit expressed with the burden of the payment. Arniston was much against this part, but it carried by a great majority.' Elchies' Notes, p. 329.

The same in the case of Sir R. Murray's Children v E. of March, Notes, p. 329; voce in Ms. Real Burden. Mr. Morrison has classed it under Personal and Real.

Mr. Erskine's conclusion from these cases, so far as regards the expression of the burden, is: 'That where a deed is expressly granted, (1) with the burden of a determinate sum therein mentioned, or (2) with the burden of the payment of that sum, or (3) where there is a clause declaring the right void, if payment be not made against a precise day therein specified, the burden is accounted real.' Ersk. ii. 3. 49.

² Cumming v Johnston, 1666, M. 10234. [The author afterwards saw reason to doubt the accuracy of the doctrine as stated in the text, and suggested that the case put was rather that of a suspensive condition than a real burden. Shaw's Bell, p. 920; Baird's Trs. v Mitchell, 8 D. 464.]

³ Fleming, 15 June 1795.

effectual as a real security against the creditors of the disponee infest.¹ In one case already referred to,² the Court decided that the burdening clause affected the lands in preference to the creditors of the disponee's son, although the condition did not enter into the sasine, 'otherwise than by a general reference to the provisions in the disposition, its warrant.' In this decision the creditors acquiesced; but Mr. Erskine justly remarks³ that this is a [689] doctrine not only contrary to some former decisions, but also irreconcilable with the rule, that all burdens must be discoverable by creditors and purchasers. In later cases,⁴ accordingly, the question has been settled the other way.

³ Ersk. iii. 3. 51.

This report is not quite so satisfactory as it might have been, since the distinction is not properly marked between the question respecting the indefinite amount of the debts (which the strictest scrutiny, even into the heritable bonds, could not have removed), and the question respecting the vagueness of the reference in the sasine.

Broughton v Gordon, 1739, M. 10247; Elchies, Personal and Real, No. 2; 5 Brown's Sup. 665. 'A father having disposed his estate to his eldest son in his contract of marriage, with the burden of his debts in general, as contained in a list or inventory therein referred to, the general burdening clause was also engrossed in the procuratory of resignation, and the list registered in the books of Council and Session. It was notwithstanding found, that the particular debts not being expressed in the contract, nor the list registered in the register of sasines and reversions, the said clauses in the contract and procuratory of resignation did not render these debts real burdens upon the lands conveyed by the father to the son.'

Lord Elchies says: 'The Lords found the children's provisions, though contained in that list, were not real burdens, chiefly because the list of debts and provisions was neither inserted in the disposition nor registered in the register of sasines, but only in the books of Session.'

Lord Elchies in his Notes says: 'I was in the Outer House when the cause was advised, and I am told the Lords pretty unanimously found the children's provisions not real burdens. I am also told the grounds were two: 1st, That the disposition was not with burden of these debts, but with the burden of the payment of debt; and this was Arniston's opinion; but the majority were not of that opinion. The 2d was, That the list of debts was not insert in græmio of the disposition, nor registered in the register of sasines, but only in the books of Session. This deserves to be well considered.' Notes, p. 329.

The ratio decidendi given in this case seems to imply, that if the list had been recorded in the register of sasines, even separately, the debts would have been held real burdens. The reverse, however, was decided in the case of Chalmers v the Crs. of M'Kenzie of Redcastle. See below, in this note.

Douglas of Dornock, 1765, 5 Br. Sup. 906. A trust-deed was granted, but there was no list of debts recorded. Lord Kennet held, that as the trust-disposition and infestment does not mention the names of the creditors, nor the sums, nor the total amount, but only disposes to the trustee for behoof of the disponent and his creditors, with directions to apply rents and prices to debts in a list subscribed, this did not create any real lien. On a hearing in presence, the Court found that the creditors had no preference on the disposition. Stated in the Sess. Paper in case of Chalmers v Crs. of Redcastle.

Chalmers v Crs. of Redcastle, 1791, Baron Hume's Sess. Pap. and 3 Pat. 417. M'Kenzie of Redcastle conveyed his estate, in trust, for the payment of his debts, as enumerated in a separate list subscribed by him, relative to the disposition, which was ordered by the deed to be registered along with the infestment, and which was entered on record accordingly. The trustees accepted and acted; but afterwards they divested themselves, and redispensed with and under burden of the debts for payment of which the trust was made. Lord Justice-Clerk Macqueen, 'in respect the trust-right contains a power to the trustees to give up the same, and as they did not carry the trust into execution, but gave it up, and that the lands have been sold by authority of this Court, sustains the objection to the trust-disposition, and finds that the trust creditors have no right to claim under the same.' When the case came before the Court, it was held that the creditors in the list had no real security, and were not in a situation different from the general body, on the ground that the list made no part of the sasine itself, but was only referred to in that instrument; and that the separate registration was no sufficient incorporation of the burden, so as to qualify the feudal right with the debts in the list. The judgment was in these words: 'In respect that the debts were not rendered real burdens on the lands by the trust-right, and in respect that the trust-right has been given up and abandoned.'

Place v Trs. of M'Nab, 1821, Hume 544. The circumstances were these:—M'Nab of M'Nab disposed his estate, under 'burden of the payment of the whole just and lawful debts, both heritable and moveable, due by me at the date hereof; of which debts, so far as known, etc., a list has been made up and subscribed by me as relative hereto, amounting to £30,922, 13s. 8d.' Then they are declared to be a real burden, and appointed to be engrossed in the infestment. Sub-

IV. Both in the Disposition and in the Sasine the Burden must be SPECIFIC, in the Amount and in the Creditor's Name.—This requisite has two objects: 1. That creditors may know the precise amount of the burden; and, 2. That they may know whether it be paid or extinguished. In the case of Coxton, and in that of Lord Prestonhall's creditors,¹ the burdens were at first found to be real, although indefinite; but those decisions were both reversed in the House of Lords, on the principle that no perpetual unknown encumbrance can be admitted upon lands.² In 1730 the question occurred again in the Court of Session, for the first time after the reversal of the former decision, and was argued by our ablest lawyers; but the Court avoided a decision of the general point,³ and it was not till 1734 that the matter was held to be settled in the Court of Session. This was in a case mentioned shortly by Mr. Erskine,⁴ where it was held that no indefinite or unknown burden can be created on land. And this doctrine has, in many cases since that time, been held as a settled rule of law.⁵ But admitting the general principle, it was much doubted whether a conveyance, creating a burden of the granter's debts, as contained in a particular list, was effectual to constitute a real burden; and in two remarkable cases, in one of which the amount was stated in the sasine, it has been held that there is no real burden in such a case.⁶

In creating reserved burdens, it is the common practice, besides a reservation in the conveyance, to take a separate bond from the disponee, mentioning in the disposition that it has been granted.⁷ It has been held that the assignee of such a bond, although the real burden was not mentioned in the bond or in the assignation, has the legitimate title to discharge the burden.⁸ On such bond adjudication may be raised; and it may contain a power of sale, to give to the holder of the reserved burden a more active species of security than the real burden confers.

II.—NATURE AND EFFECT OF THE RIGHT.

[691] 1. The security depends on the disponee's sasine. There may seem to be some room for a distinction in this respect between burdens reserved in conveyances, where the burden is in favour of the disponent himself, and where it is in favour of a third person. Where a person selling land allows a part of the price to remain a debt in the hands of the joined to the disposition, and recorded along with it, was the list containing the names and sums. The sasine bore, 'under the burdens, provisions, and declarations, faculty and reservation before specified, and no otherwise.' M'Nab afterwards executed a trust-deed under which his trustees sold his land; and the purchaser, in order to clear his title, suspended the payment of the price until it should be decided whether the debts in the list were made real burdens. The case was, at the desire of the parties, reported to the Inner House; and the Court held the debts not effectually constituted as a real burden on the estate, and refused the bill.

by me, with the burden of all my just and lawful debts, contracted, or to be hereafter contracted, by me.' The affairs of Samuel M'Lellan having gone into disorder, a competition arose between his creditors and those of the disponent (both sets of creditors having led adjudications against the estate). The creditors of the disponent contended for a preference under the above clause of burden, but the Court found the burden not real upon the lands, and preferred the creditors of the disponee.

purchaser, secured as a burden in favour of the seller; or where, in a settlement or other conveyance, the maker of the deed reserves his own liferent, or an annuity to himself, it has sometimes been held that the original infestment constitutes the security.¹ But there is no true distinction to be taken between reserved burdens in favour of the disponent, and in favour of a third party. The principle on which the preference in either case depends is the same, and the forms of assignation and modes of rendering the security available for payment similar.² A burden constituted according to the requisites already fully explained, forms a condition of the disponee's right, and so qualifies it, that in all questions with purchasers or creditors, deriving their titles from the disponee, the debt thus secured is preferable. The transference of the real security to a new creditor is not (as in the common heritable bond) completed by sasine. A simple assignation intimated to the holder of the burdened infestment is sufficient to transfer the right of the debt, and is followed by the real lien as an accessory. Lord Stair considers an infestment so burdened as a wadset, only differing as to the effect of the right held by the creditor, in so far as relates to the active right of possession.³ But he, at the same time, holds the right of the creditor transmissible by assignation, either voluntary or judicial, by arrestment and decree of forthcoming. In practice, a simple assignation, intimated to the debtor, is held sufficient, though frequently the assignation is registered in the register of sasines and reversions.⁴ The registration does not, however, appear to be necessary in order to complete the right. Were a [692] competition to arise between the first assignation intimated, and a second subsequently recorded, there does not appear to be any ground for holding that the latter would be preferred. A general service transmits the burden to the heir of the creditor.⁵

2. To make the security effectual in producing payment, the creditor in the reserved burden has no means of entering into possession, or title to raise action of mails and

² In this argument, the analogy of a liferent reserved, taken as an illustration of the right of the granter of a reserved burden, is apt to mislead. The liferenter's sasine may well subsist without incongruity along with that of the fiar: for it is the very same right which the liferenter originally held; to be exercised in the same way; and limited only as to endurance, and as to those powers of which the exercise might evacuate the fee. But the right of a creditor is quite different in nature from that enjoyed under the original infestment. It is a mere pledge or right in security, depending for its existence on the debt. A general service has been held a sufficient title to authorize a discharge of such a burden. Cuthbertson v Barr, 1806, M. App. Serv. and Conf. No. 2.

⁴ Miller v Brown, 1820, Hume 540. Robert Lyle disposed to his son, John Lyle, certain heritable subjects, under the burden, inter alia, of paying to his sister Margaret Lyle £100. By the disposition this sum was declared to be a real burden on the property, and it was engrossed in John Lyle's infestment accordingly. Margaret Lyle, in 1801, assigned the £100 to James Cameron, in security of a debt due by her; and Cameron intimated the assignation to John, the debtor, and also recorded the assignation in the register of sasines. In 1804, Mr. Brown purchased from John Lyle part of the subjects, Margaret Lyle having previously granted a discharge and renunciation of the real burden, without taking any notice of the previous transference to Cameron. Brown paid the full price, and there seemed no reason to doubt that he was ignorant of Cameron's right. Miller, after some intermediate transactions, which are here immaterial, acquired Cameron's right, upon which a decree of adjudication in absence against Brown had been taken; and brought a process of mails and duties in the Sheriff Court against Brown's tenants, with the view of recovering the amount of Margaret's provision. The cause was advocated by Brown, who at the same time brought a reduction of the decree of adjudication in absence. Lord Gillies found, that the assignation by Margaret to Cameron, though effectual to convey the personal right to the debt, was not effectual to convey the heritable right; and that this right was effectually discharged by Margaret's subsequent discharge and renunciation. He therefore reduced the decree of adjudication in absence, and dismissed the action of mails and duties. But on advising a reclaiming petition (in which the principles established in the case of Cuthbertson were founded on) and answers, the Court unanimously found, 'That the real burden or security created over the subject in question in the person of Margaret Lyle, not being clothed by infestment in her person, nor capable of it, could be validly transferred by her and her husband, by the disposition and assignation in favour of James Cameron, duly intimated and recorded in the register of sasines; and that such disposition and assignation is effectual, and preferable to the discharge and renunciation founded on by the respondent; and therefore alter the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against,' etc. A reclaiming petition was refused, with answers.

Although the recording of the assignation is taken notice of in this judgment, it does not appear to have been relied on as making an essential part of the case. It is mentioned only as the fact of the case happened to be so.

duties.¹ But he has these remedies: 1. Poinding of the ground, the nature of which has already been explained;² and, 2. Adjudication, not subject to the law of pari passu preference.³ The lands burdened, when sold to another, continue still charged with the debt. The purchaser is not personally a debtor to the creditor in the burden; the lands may be adjudged for the debt.

3. As to the ranking of debts secured by real burdens, these points seem to be fixed: 1. That, in competition with the creditors of the disponer, the creditor whose debt is reserved as a real burden is preferable, whether the disponent be infert or not.⁴ Before sasine, his debt is a condition of the personal right; after sasine, it is a charge on the feudal right. 2. That where the creditor is a third party, he is preferable to all posterior debts of the disponent, from the date of the sasine in the disponent's favour, although the disponent may have given heritable securities to the posterior creditors.⁵ 3. That it is probable this [693] difference would be made between the creditors of the disponent and those of the disponent: That in a competition with the former, the preference of the creditor whose debt was declared real would depend on the date of the disponent's sasine; since the disponent is not divested, and his estate, therefore, is still liable to the diligence of his creditors till infertment in favour of the disponent: in a competition with the latter, the preference might be held complete, although no sasine were taken; on the principle already explained, that the debt is a qualification of the disponent's right, whether still personal or made real by infertment. 4. That among themselves, creditors, whose debts are made real burdens, are preferable according to the diligences which stand in their person,⁶ if the fund reserved turn out inadequate. And the proper diligence for affecting the debt seems to be adjudication, notwithstanding what Lord Stair has said in a passage already quoted.⁷

² See above, p. 724, note 2. Stair iv. 23. 5; Ersk. iv. 1. 11. Lord Kilkerran says, where a disposition is granted with the burden of this or that particular debt, although the creditor in that debt has an infertment, yet the practice is for poinding of the ground to proceed in such debts. Kilk. 445.

burden of a sum, it makes that sum a real burden, whereupon the fee may be apprizd or adjudged; and the apprizing or adjudication thereon will be preferred as of the same date with the infertment burdened,' etc. See also Hope's Min. Prac. tit. 11, secs. 1 and 3; Ersk. ii. 3. 49.

⁵ Barclay v Gemmill, 1731, M. 10245. Here, a father having disposed his estate with the burden of 5000 merks to his creditors, conform to bonds in their favour, after sasine in the disponent's favour he granted infertment of annualrent upon the lands disposed to several of his creditors, and a competition arose between them and a creditor under the real burden. The two points were pleaded: 1st, That the disponent, being completely denuded by the disponent's infertment, could do nothing in burdening the estate anew; 2d, That whatever his power might be, in so far as the amount stipulated was not exhausted, the debts existing before the disposition were made real burdens, and consequently preferable to all posterior debts, even when followed by infertment. The Court found, that no debt posterior to the disposition could come in competition with the debts prior to the same.

⁷ See above, and correct Stair's doctrine by the decision in the preceding note.

SECTION III.—PREFERENCES DEPENDING ON CONDITIONS IN REAL OR IN PERSONAL RIGHTS TO LAND.

One very important example of this kind of security has just been considered in Burdens by Reservation. But others occur in practice, the nature and operation of which it is of importance to mark.

1. In contracts of feu for the purpose of building, it is no unfrequent transaction by the proprietor of the land, desirous of encouraging builders, to advance money for enabling them to carry on their operations, and to look for reimbursement on the sale of the property. To make such a transaction safe, it is stipulated in the contract that the feuar shall not be entitled to demand a charter until he shall have paid up the money advanced. And, 1. There can be no doubt of the efficacy of this stipulation to secure the creditor both against creditors and against purchasers: those who come into the feuar's place, in either character, acquire only the right to take the subject as a personal fee, not without the burden of the condition stipulated. 2. It would seem that even for advances made from time to time subsequently to the feu-contract, though the amount should not be stated in the contract, there will be an effectual right to withhold the charter, on the general stipulation that the charter shall not be demanded till all advances shall be paid up. And, 3. Against the general creditors of the feuar, it would seem that the charter may be retained until all advances shall have been paid up, although there shall not be any stipulation to that effect in the feu-contract.¹

2. Conditions in conveyances to land effectually qualify the right while it remains personal, and whether in the hands of the original disponee, or of a creditor, or of a purchaser. The right to the subject will be effectually restrained by the operation of the condition. But the moment that the conveyance is made real by sasine, it stands effectual, purged of all conditions as against purchasers or creditors, unless care has been taken to make the condition a real burden.

3. Lands may be burdened, either expressly or by implication, in warrandice of the conveyance of other lands. When lands are exchanged, or, in the language of the [694] law, reciprocally conveyed in Excambion, it is an implied condition of the conveyance, that on eviction the person who is deprived of the land recurs to his former right, and may recover his own land. When lands are conveyed by one whose title seems questionable, the purchaser sometimes receives a conveyance to other lands in Real Warrandice, and to indemnify him against the eventual challenge. There is an important difference in the nature of these two rights, which ought to be observed. The security in the former rests on the original sasine, which was in the person of him who is deprived of the lands given in exchange for his own. The security in the latter depends on a new sasine in the disponee's person. The right transferred in excambion is conditional; and if the condition appear on the face of the titles, it is effectual against singular successors.² The right conferred by an infestment in real warrandice is a right in security.³ The consequences of this are: 1. That there arises an immediate right in the person suffering eviction in excambion, to enter again into possession of his own land, and to have direct action of mails and duties, etc.; whereas the real warrandice gives the disponee no right but that of an heritable creditor. 2. That a liquidation of the damage is requisite on the part of the disponee in real warrandice; and the disponent, by paying that damage, frees his land; whereas in excambion, the condition being purified by eviction, the excambied lands return to their former proprietor. 3. That, in case of partial eviction, the matter may easily be extricated under real warrandice; while under excambion much difficulty may arise.

1. EXCAMBION.—The more correct way of making excambion of lands is by a contract, though it is sometimes done by separate unilateral deeds. The procuratory and precept are commonly for sasine to both reciprocally, and so bear in græmio the nature of the correlative right. The sasine, therefore, as it appears on the record, stands burdened with the condition. But sometimes there are two separate procuratories and precepts, even where the form of a contract is used; and where the parties dispoise in separate deeds, the sasine may be extremely defective in conveying information of the limited nature of the right. And as it is a general rule, that no real burden can affect land without appearing on the record, it is extremely doubtful whether the implied condition of excambion would be effectual against singular successors.¹

2. REAL WARRANTICE.—The conveyance in warrantice must be completed by sasine duly recorded. But although the burden must thus appear on the record, there is one danger to which the purchase and transmission of all land is exposed; namely, that beyond the years of prescription the land may have been disposed in real warrantice, and may still be effectually bound in case of eviction: for it is only from the time of the eviction that the prescription for freedom from a disposition in real warrantice begins to run. The Court, however, has held that the fear of this liability, where set up as a pretence for not paying the price of lands over which an infestment in real warrantice extends, is in equity subject to a reasonable limitation.²

SECTION IV.—GENERAL REVIEW OF THE CHIEF OBJECTIONS THAT MAY BE TAKEN AGAINST THESE SECURITIES.

[695] The chief objections to securities may be reduced to three classes: 1. Objections which affect the debt secured; 2. Objections which rest upon some defect in the constitution of the security; or, 3. Objections grounded on the laws relative to insolvency.

I.—OBJECTIONS TO THE DEBT.

If the debt itself be objectionable, the security will be ineffectual; as, 1. Where the debt is of a nature which the law does not sanction, as a smuggling contract, or a game debt.³ These exceptions against personal debts we had formerly occasion to consider.⁴ 2. Where the debt is tainted by usurious stipulations, the security will in the same way be rendered ineffectual.⁵ It was held in one case⁶ that this statutory nullity is effectual against assignees; and in England it had been held effectual against the endorsee of a bill of exchange for value, and without notice of the usury.⁷ But this, as already observed, was altered by statute.⁸ 3. The debt may be objectionable on the footing of the negative prescription.⁹ 4. A security granted by a cautioner may be liable to a fatal objection, on the ground of the limitation of cautionary engagements, by the statute 1695, c. 5, already ex-

Nisbet, the granter, was a merchant in Eyemouth, and had entered into a contraband trade with Pillans, who not only furnished him with goods, but advanced him money for repairing the vessel in which the goods were smuggled into this country. For the debt which thus arose to Pillans, the heritable bond was granted over the estate of Gunsgreen, and Robertson had bought it from Pillans for full value. An objection was stated on the ground of illegality of the original debt; and first Lord Justice-Clerk Macqueen, afterwards the whole Court, found the security not entitled to a place in the ranking.

plained.¹ It is fixed, that when the proper diligence has been used, the effect is only to prolong the claim to the extent of the principal sum, and seven years' interest.²

II.—OBJECTIONS TO THE SECURITY.

The objections which attach to the deeds of security themselves, are objections to the execution of the bond, conveyance, or other deed of security; or on account of vitiations; or breach of the Stamp Laws; or radical defects in the sasine, as proceeding on an illegal and defective warrant, as being improperly given, as being defective in the statement [696] of the ceremony, etc. Some of these objections have been touched on already; but one or two points may find a place here.

1. Want of Stamp.—Objections on the Stamp Laws are fatal to certain instruments beyond remedy; as in bills and policies of insurance. But in other cases, the stamp, if annulled or wrong, may be supplied after the instrument is produced in judgment. Nay, it has been held suppliable even after adjudication has been led.³ By analogy, it would seem that after a competition begun on a deed of security not stamped, the objection may be removed by having the stamp supplied.

2. Exhausting of Precept of Sasine.—It is a rule, that a precept of sasine, when once duly executed, is exhausted, and cannot authorize sasine to be taken again. Where the precept is not duly executed, the remedy is by a new act of sasine on the precept as unexhausted. And, 1. This seems to be competent where there is a fatal error in the act of sasine, as not rightly taken; as not on the lands; or not by the proper symbols; or not to the right party; and so forth. 2. It seems also to be competent where there is a defect in the instrument; and so there is not full and legitimate evidence of the execution in due form, and in all points. But, 3. Where the act of sasine is correctly performed, and the instrument in all points unexceptionable, except in not having been recorded in due time, it has been greatly doubted whether the precept is exhausted; whether a new sasine may be taken, and a new instrument recorded; or whether recourse must not be had to other means of remedy. The difficulty here rests on the words of the statute. Had it been declared that a sasine not duly recorded should be null, there could have been no doubt that the precept must have been held as unexhausted, and capable of authorizing a new sasine.⁴ But the Act only declares the instrument, if not duly registered, 'to make no faith in judgment, etc., in prejudice of a third party;' adding, 'but prejudice always to them to use the said writ against the party maker thereof, his heirs and successors' (1617, c. 16). The main argument against the competency of a new sasine, and the principle on which a precept is held to be exhausted, is, 'that where sasine is once taken, the fee is full; and that the fee is full though sasine be not recorded, as appears in a question with the granter or his heirs.' But it cannot be correctly said that the fee is full where the sasine is not in all respects perfect and effectual. If the fee were full, no creditor of the granter could adjudge the estate. But that is competent, for this reason, that there is no infeftment, and so no constitution of a fee as to third parties. But if to any one effect the sasine is null, the precept

² So strongly did the opinion formerly prevail, that the cautioner became liable for all arrears and interest till payment, that Erskine lays down this doctrine. But the Court, contrary to the judgment of Lord Justice-Clerk Macqueen, in the case of Reid v Maxwell, 1780, M. 11043, on a hearing in presence, solemnly found 'the cautioners liable for no more than the principal, and seven years' interest.' See an interesting discussion on the bench, 2 Hailes 850.

This was confirmed in the case of Douglas, Heron, & Co. v Riddick, 1792, M. 11032.

³ Lamont v Lamont's Crs., 1789, M. 5494. An objection was here stated to an adjudication in a ranking, that the decree of constitution proceeded on a will not stamped. 'The objection arising from the writing not being stamped, was considered as one that could be removed at any time.'

⁴ So it is with regard to one species of sasine, the resignation ad remanentiam, by which a superior is re-invested. By the Act 1669, c. 3, it is declared that the resignation shall be null and void if the instrument be not duly recorded.

cannot justly be held exhausted; the whole mandate has not been complied with so as to convey the fee; there is no sasine, or effectual execution of the precept, so as to exclude third parties. And so, when a creditor comes to adjudge and to execute the precept in his charter of adjudication, the former infestment cannot be opposed to him. The statute says it bears no faith; and so the fee is not full.¹ But it is said, 'The sasine is good, and to all intents and purposes effectual, during the sixty days, or till the moment when it is erroneously entered in the record; and that it cannot, as in relation to the precept, be converted at once from a good execution of the mandate into a bad.' This, however, is a mere subtilty. Until the instrument is recorded, the execution of the mandate may be considered as a mere faculty in the hands of the disponee, to be completed into a perfect right or not, as he pleases. He may burn it, or annihilate it by withholding it from the record. And if he do record it, and an error is committed that is fatal to it, the fair construction is, that the act intended to perfect the right is not done, in not being rightly done; and so may be abandoned and commenced of new, if no mid-impediment or jus quæsitum stand as a bar. Unfortunately there is no case which in all respects can be considered as a precedent to settle this important point; but the weight of authority and of judicial opinion seem to authorize the conclusion that the precept in such a case is unexhausted.²

3. Special Precept.—A precept of a special nature or extent cannot authorize a sasine different in character. Thus, 1st, A precept to give sasine in trust, or in security, cannot be the warrant of a sasine in fee or property. But the converse does not hold. A precept for sasine in fee or property may be assigned to the minor effect of taking a sasine in liferent or in security.³ In practice it is so held; and this practice has been sanctioned by the Court.⁴

² In a ms. collection of Lord Pitfour's opinions I find this consultation: 'Where any mistake has happened in such registrations, it is proper to take a new sasine, and put it on the proper record. But it is said you cannot execute the precept a second time, as it is exhausted. The answer is: This would be good, if it were properly recorded; but where not, I think it may be done.'

This accords with an opinion of Sir James Stewart: 'A sasine not duly registered is null by Act of Parliament, except against the heir of the granter, as to whom only it is good, because he cannot quarrel his author's deed. But it will not hold as to a successor in that benefice, because he does not represent his predecessor.' Ans. to Dirl. 275.

The late Lord Meadowbank said correctly on this point: 'Lawyers have held those unregistered sasines may be of some avail to the person infest. But it is certain they do not stand in the way of a person getting a proper right. The lawyers have not stated their opinion correctly; for the true view of the thing is, that the sasine is absolutely null and void, though some persons may not be entitled to plead the nullity. But this is of no consequence. Take it either way, and supposing that it is not absolutely null and void, but only quoad the interest of onerous third parties, it will be the same thing to this argument.' Kibble v Stewart & Speirs, 16 June 1814, Fac. Coll. In that case, a purchaser of land was infest on the precept in his disposition, and it was confirmed; but the instrument was wrongly recorded, there being a fatal error in the name. To cure the defect, he resigned on the procuratory, and was infest on the charter of resignation. And the Court held it competent. Lord Justice-Clerk Boyle and Lord Robertson assented to the opinion of Lord Meadowbank, that the precept was not exhausted. So that, although this be not precisely a decision on the point, it is of great importance in balancing the weight of authority on the subject.

Baxter v Watson, 15 May 1818. Lord Gillies, on great consideration of this case, held the precept to be unexhausted where the instrument had not been recorded till the sixty-seventh day; and the Court adhered. But, on a petition, doubts having been expressed by Lord Balgray, the matter was settled out of Court.

³ Mitchell v Adam, 1767, M. 14335. This case is erroneously reported. The objection was, that the precept in a disposition could not authorize an infestment of annualrent, a right different in nature, and transmitted by different symbols—a penny money, instead of earth and stone. This objection was not sustained (as the report bears), but repelled. So Lord Hailes states it, vol. i. p. 185. Lord Pitfour's ground is, that a procuratory and precept are assignable qualifié, and that in practice an opposite doctrine threatens danger to hundreds of heritable bonds and adjudications. I have seen an extract of the decree, which confirms this statement.

2d, A precept of clare constat is given only to the heir, and cannot be assigned to [698] another. 1. It is strictly confined to heirs-at-law, and cannot competently be granted to an heir of provision; so that a title made up, as not unfrequently happens, by precept of clare constat, in favour of an heir in a destination, is exceptionable. 2. It is confined also to the immediately next heir alive at the time. Such a precept, for example, to the heir in liferent, and the next heir in fee, will vest no right in the fiar; nor will his survivance give effect to an infestment which shall have been taken on such an erroneous precept during the proper heir's life.¹ And, 3. Although an open precept in a disposition is a good warrant for infesting the disponee, or his assignee, or an adjudger acquiring right to the unexecuted precept by his diligence, provided the assignation or adjudication be produced, and read, and recited in the instrument of sasine, this will not hold good as to a precept of clare constat, which is limited to a character not transmissible.

4. JUS ACCRESCENDI.—This doctrine is of great importance in considering the principles on which preferences depend. A sasine may be taken on the warrant of a person having in him only a personal right to lands, to the effect that, by the subsequent completion of his feudal right, the sasine already taken will become effectual. The completed right is in such a case said to accresce to the sasine. This is a part of a more comprehensive doctrine, Jus superveniens auctori, accrescit successori. The general rule expressed in this maxim entitles one, to whom a conveyance is made with warrandice, to the benefit of every supervening right acquired by the disposer after the transmission.² But the point that demands attention in the present inquiry is, In what circumstances will the real right accresce ipso jure, so that a provisional completion of the disponee's right shall ipso jure be completed by the completion of that of the disposer? 1. If a precept be contained in a disposition or heritable bond, by one not himself infest, or granted in a character not yet established in his person (as a vassal giving a precept for a public holding), such precept, with sasine following on it, as proceeding a non habente potestatem, is quite ineffectual to convey the feudal right.³ 2. If the granter hold the personal right as a disponee, or if as heir he be entitled to complete his title by service, his imperfect right will enable him to give a precept to which the doctrine of accretion will apply. 3. If he have no right whatever to the land, and afterwards acquire it by a title originating after the date of his precept, the sasine which has proceeded on his precept will not be made valid by accretion. And if the sasine proceed on the precept of the ancestor uninfest, the heir's infestment will not cure the defect.⁴ The effect of accretion is attended with little difficulty where there has been one conveyance only. But where other interests interfere, nice questions arise. Wherever a right is completed on the part of another, previous to the completion of the disponee's or heritable creditor's right, it is a bar or mid-impediment to the accretion. But where there are more rights or securities than one, it is important to determine whether the rule operates according to priority, or all at once, so as to give them preference according to their dates, or pari passu. And, 1. The infestment first in date will be first completed, 'because the disposer's right,' says Stair, 'accresceth ipso facto.'⁵ 2. Where the infestment of the common author proceeds [699]

cept in the feu-contract. Sasine taken on this warrant was objected to as inept. The security was cut down on another footing, and this objection was little taken notice of; but some of the judges, who at first held the sasine bad, on reconsideration, and looking to the practice, and the sanction given to sasines in liferent taken on assigned precepts in fee, thought the objection unworthy of notice.

¹ Finlay v Morgan, 1770, M. 14480. Here a precept of clare constat was granted to James Shaw (the heir) in liferent, and his son John in fee. Infestment followed in these terms. After James' death, John granted heritable bonds, and afterwards adjudication was led. On John's death, titles were made up to the person who stood last infest before the precept of clare constat was granted, and in a reduction the heritable bond and adjudication were held null and void.

upon the diligence of any party, Stair also thinks the completion of it effectual only to him who does the diligence. This has been held doubtful; and in one case, where the disponent's title has been completed by the voluntary act of a second heritable creditor, though for the sole purpose of giving effect to his own right, that completion of the title has been held to accresce to a prior creditor.¹ It is necessary or advisable on this footing, in completing the right for the purpose of giving effect to a security only provisionally completed, to act so cautiously as to confine the operation strictly to that security.² But it may fairly be questioned, on the fundamental principle of the doctrine of jus superveniens, whether in any case after bankruptcy, or where the completion of the common debtor's title is made by a trustee for creditors, that act can be available jure accrescendi to creditors whose securities are otherwise ineffectual. The whole doctrine rests on the ground of warrandice of the right of the grantee, and accordingly there is no accretion in those cases in which warrandice is not stipulated, or at least implied. But from the moment that bankruptcy attaches to the person, every action which he does is exceptionable, in so far as it confers on one creditor a preference over the rest. He cannot be compelled to it on his obligation of warrandice. And it would be a strange anomaly to hold, that what a trustee for creditors generally does, in order to complete their right, should be construed as an act of the bankrupt, done in the fulfilment of an obligation which he is prohibited from fulfilling.

III.—OBJECTIONS IN RELATION TO INSOLVENCY.

The chief of these rest on the statutes of 1621 and 1696; of which hereafter.

In contemplation of insolvency also, there is another ground of objection under the statute of 1661, c. 24, relative to dispositions, bonds, and conveyances granted by apparent heirs, in prejudice of the rights of the creditors of the predecessor, to whom the heir has succeeded. By this Act heirs are prohibited from granting within a year from their predecessor's death, to the prejudice of the predecessor's creditors, any right or alienation of the predecessor's heritable estate. This law is grounded on the equitable principle, that every man's estate should in the first place be liable for his own debts. The regulations for securing the full operation of this principle will be the subject of a commentary hereafter on the respective rights of the creditors of the ancestor and those of the heir. See below, Sect. 5, Subsect. 2.

Another objection falling under the same class may be grounded on the indefinite nature of the debt, which is the object of the security. We have already (p. 730) had occasion to consider the cases in which it was held that no indefinite unknown burden can be created on land. But it may be questioned, Whether this objection lies against a security granted to a cautioner in relief of debts for which he has become bound? In the case of M'Lellan v Barclay, a distinction was taken in argument between this case and that of a reserved burden of all the granter's debts. In the case of Langton,³ the Court 'found a disposition, granted for security and relief of all engagements the grantee had come under for the father, and especially declaring that all bonds wherein they stood jointly bound were the proper debts of the father, upon which disposition infestment followed, was a valid and legal security to the grantee upon the estate disposed for his relief, of all debts wherein he stood jointly bound with the father preceding the date of the disposition, notwithstanding [700] the particular debts were not specified.'

EFFECT OF OBJECTIONS.

The effect of the objections now shortly referred to may be very different.

1. Those which attach to the debt itself, or which annul the deed of security, and consequently annihilate the real right, have, when applicable to a single creditor, the effect of excluding that creditor altogether from the ranking, or from a preference. Where such objections attach only to one of several creditors combined in the same security, as where a joint disposition is granted to several persons in security of debt, the benefit of the objection accrues not to the general creditors, but to those conjoined in the security in the first place; upon this plain principle, that the security of each creditor extends over the whole subject, so that the annulling of one of the claims augments the fund of security to others.¹

2. Those objections which are competent only to a particular creditor, have no other effect than to prevent the creditor who holds the objectionable security from ranking, to the prejudice of him who is entitled to maintain the objection; but it does not destroy the title to rank as against other creditors. Such is the effect, for example, of an objection on the ground of inhibition. The arrangements necessary for bringing out the true force of such objections will be particularly considered in treating of claims of preference on the ground of exclusion.

SECTION III.

OF PUBLIC BURDENS, LAND-TAX, ETC.

There are certain public burdens attending the right of a proprietor, on which a question may be raised in competitions of creditors, whether they be debita fundi and preferable. These it may be proper to explain.

1. LAND-TAX.—The land-tax, after several revolutions from aids and subsidies to a permanent tax (the proportion of which between England and Scotland was settled by the Treaty of Union), was at last fixed at £47,954, to be levied out of the land rent of Scotland for ever, subject to a power of redemption.² This burden on the land rent is payable partly from burghs and partly from shires; the former being assessed by stentmasters on the inhabitants of burghs, according to their rents and income; the latter being assessed on the inhabitants of counties, according to the yearly revenue of their land and other real property.³ But this tax, although called land-tax, and although a burden accompanying the land, is still, strictly speaking, no more than a personal tax on the owners of land, in proportion to the amount of their land revenue, and not properly a debitum fundi. So it was held with respect to the Scottish land-tax in the seventeenth century;⁴ and there seems to be no ground for a different judgment now.

But although, properly speaking, the land-tax is no debitum fundi, still it is a tax [701] which accompanies the land. Whoever has the land is liable to the tax as it arises. Creditors, therefore, or a purchaser from them, are responsible for the tax; and this has the same effect in giving a preference for the tax falling due after bankruptcy, as if the tax were debitum fundi. There is no preference, however, for arrears. They are secured only by the remedies competent for Crown debts against the personal estate.

2. REPAIRS OF CHURCHES, ETC.—The expense of repairing churches, ministers' manses, etc., and the relief due to heritors from whose land a glebe has been designed to the minister of a parish, are also burdens which accompany the land, but are not properly debita fundi.

¹ Blackwood of Pitreavie v E. of Sutherland, where infetment having been given to several joint disponees,—the precept as to one of them being for infetting representatives, without naming or describing them,—and having as to him been found null, a competition arose between an adjudging creditor and the other joint disponees. The latter were preferred. 1740, M. 14140.

Singular successors and creditors, or a purchaser from them, are not liable for the arrears of those burdens belonging to past years; but they are subject to them, if falling within the time of their being proprietors of the land.¹

CHAPTER II.

OF JUDICIAL SECURITIES OVER LANDS AND HOUSES.

JUDICIAL securities are of two kinds: one preventive, in the nature of a prohibition against voluntary conveyances, called INHIBITION; another, in the nature of a real right in security, or burden, and depending for its preference in competition on a recorded sasine, or certain equivalents introduced by statute. This last sort of security is called ADJUDICATION, and forms the proper subject of this chapter. The former will be more properly discussed hereafter. There is also another judicial security forming an anomalous sort of real burden in burgage subjects, called JUDGE and WARRANT.

SECTION I.

HISTORY AND NATURE OF THE SIMPLE ADJUDICATION FOR DEBT.

Execution against property for debt, which under the Roman law extended to lands as well as to moveables, was for a long time, both in England and Scotland, confined to moveables, and at last was extended to land in very different degrees in the two countries.

In England, a writ of execution called ELEGIT was in the reign of Edward I. invented for the attachment of land; and this seems to be the only form of execution by individual creditors against land at this day. It gives to the creditor possession of one-half of the debtor's land, to be delivered over to him by apprizement; but in no shape authorizes either an absolute and irredeemable sale of the land, or even a redeemable transference of it.

It seems to have been prior to the beginning of the thirteenth century that the execution against land for debt was first introduced into the practice of Scotland. In the time of Alexander II., who began to reign in 1214, it was established by express statute, that if there be no moveables, the sheriff should give notice to the debtor to sell his land within fifteen days, failing of which they should be transferred to the creditor in satisfaction of his debt.² At this time, the sale for a price, or, failing a sale, the transference of the goods or [702] land to the creditor, was absolute and irredeemable. But in 1469 a statute was passed, which, by giving to the debtor a power of redemption within seven years, produced a most important alteration upon the execution against land.³ While the execution against land was thus established in the alternative form of a sale for money, with which to pay the debt, or a transference of the lands themselves to the creditor (but the sale and the transference qualified by a right of redemption), it was not to be expected that the sale should be very successful, or indeed anything more than a name; and gradually the diligence came to be restricted to a redeemable transference of an apprized portion of land.

² Stat. Alex. II. c. 24. It has been well observed by Mr. Ross (vol i. p. 408), that 'the execution against land was thus both earlier and more complete in Scotland than in England.' Edward I., under whom the elegit was introduced, began to reign in 1272; Alexander II. about sixty years before.

³ 1469, c. 3, in Acta Parl. vol. ii. p. 94.

Upon the change in the forms of judicial proceedings, which was occasioned by the institution of the College of Justice, the briefe, under which causes were formerly tried, fell into disuse; and instead of it, a writ called a summons was introduced, which being followed by a judgment or decree, was put to execution, in virtue of letters issued in the name of the king, called Letters Executorial. Those directed against land had the special name of Letters of APPRIZING. They were issued only upon judgments of the Court of Session. They were at first directed specially to the sheriff within whose territory the lands to be apprizied lay; and while it was so, the appreciation was conducted with that degree of attention and care which its importance required.¹ But afterwards those letters were directed to messengers-at-arms as sheriffs in that part. They were men ignorant and irresponsible, and everything went into disorder. The sale gradually vanished; the intimation to the public, which was at first most carefully made, fell into neglect; the appreciation itself was carelessly done; and the lands were assigned over to the creditor at great under-value. At last the whole ceremony was transferred to Edinburgh, where men of skill and impartiality might be procured as a jury upon the rights of the parties. But in this stage of the declension of the diligence from its ancient purity, the expense of bringing up witnesses to prove the value of the lands gradually put an end to the appreciation; and the creditor was allowed to enter, without any inquiry, upon a general redeemable right, to the whole lands, of which during the term of redemption he drew the rents, without accounting. His right was completed, if the property was feudal, by charter and sasine; if not feudal, by the execution of the apprizing.

In this barbarous state the execution against land continued for a century, and creditors who were first in the order of time carried off the whole funds of their debtor.²

The first step taken to remedy the grievance was in 1621, when Parliament declared that the rents drawn by apprizers, above the value of the interest of their debts, should [703] be imputed "pro tanto in discharge of the principal sum."³ But this was not sufficient. Still the evils of a preference by priority of apprizing were great, and another remedy was adopted: all apprizings led before, or after and within year and day of, the first effectual apprizing, were placed upon an equal footing, or ranked pari passu, as if one apprizing had been led for the whole. The first effectual apprizing was defined to be that upon which the first feudal right was completed by sasine, or by a charge to the superior to enter the adjudger as vassal. And the expense of the first effectual apprizing was made a common burden, to be defrayed by all who should claim the benefit of it.⁴

So far as creditors were concerned, this was in some measure a remedy for the evils against which it was directed; but something more was necessary to secure the debtor himself from injustice. With this view, an alteration on the form of the diligence was

¹ Balfour (Comprizing, c. 3, p. 402) and Sir Geo. M'Kenzie (Observ. 5th Parl. Jas. III. c. 37) have preserved some notes of the rules of appreciation followed in those inquests.

² To the debtor the injustice and hardship were intolerable; for the possession being allowed to go for the interest of the money, inability to discharge the debt within the years of redemption was inevitably followed by the loss of the estate, however great the disproportion of its value above the debt; and many families in Scotland had to deplore the loss of their estates in this way. But to posterior creditors the injustice was equal. If, indeed, it happened that a posterior creditor was able to pay off the first apprizor's debt during the term of redemption, he was entitled to step into his place; but if he was unable to do so, he had nothing better to expect than the debtor himself had, and was forced tamely to see the property, which should have afforded him the means of payment, irredeemably transferred to a prior creditor at an under-value.

In form, the apprizing bore hitherto an alternative of a sale and of a transference; but to give the full value of this alternative, it would have been necessary to restore the irredeemable sale, which both in the Roman law and with us in early times was the chief part of the execution against land for debt. This might have redressed at once all these evils; but to such a measure the Legislature had a strong repugnance. Commerce was not yet much advanced; the necessity was not so pressing as it afterwards became; and the strength of Parliament being with the landholders against the moneyed interest, no remedy was ever proposed which could shake the established right of redemption. The Legislature turned themselves a thousand ways rather than consent to the demolition of this right.

proposed by Lord Stair, President of the Court of Session; and the Legislature adopted his suggestion. Instead of letters of apprizing, execution against land was to proceed by ADJUDICATION; a new form of action before the Court of Session. This action was to be of the nature of an amicable suit, in which, dropping even the form of the alternative sale and apprizing, the debtor should appear as defender in the action; produce the title-deeds of his estate; concur in a fair trial for ascertaining the value of the land; and in setting off, to be adjudged to the creditor, subject to a power of redemption, a quantity of land precisely equivalent to the debt, and a fifth part more, in consideration of taking land for money. After all this was done, the debtor was to renounce the possession of the part thus adjudged to the creditor, and consent to the transference, under a power of redeeming within five years.

As this new form was intended for a relief to the debtor, from the hardship of the universal right acquired by the old apprizing, and as it proceeded upon the idea of the debtor's concurrence in this measure for his own benefit, the Legislature thought it not unjust to leave those who did not choose to take the benefit of it to all the evils of the former law.¹ For this purpose it was ordered that adjudications for debt should contain an alternative of a Special and a General Adjudication. The special adjudication was the diligence already explained. The general was in the nature of a penal alternative, in which no trial was to be taken of the respective values of the land and of the debt, and no allotment of a precise portion to the creditor; but a general and indefinite adjudication was to be pronounced (as in the degenerated form of the apprizing) for the principal sum, interest, and penalty, without including, like the special adjudication, a fifth part more. The penal nature of this proceeding induced the Legislature, however, to lengthen the term of redemption, and make it equal to double the time allowed in the special adjudication.²

[704] Thus, instead of execution by apprizing, a proper action of adjudication was introduced, which, although in form an action, differs entirely from the action for debt. It is properly a form of execution, and cannot proceed unless the debt has been already constituted, and its precise amount ascertained by a judgment, or by a legal written voucher. The summons of adjudication, after stating the debt and the debtor's refusal to pay, libels on the statute of 1672, and concludes: First, That as much of the debtor's estate as may be equivalent to the debt and interest, and a fifth part more, as accumulated into one principal sum at the date of the decree of adjudication, shall be adjudged to the creditor, redeemably, in security and payment of the debt; and that the debtor shall, for that purpose, appear,

² Act 1672, c. 19, Acta Parliam. vol. vii. It may perhaps at first sight appear strange, that almost from the first moment that this boon was granted to debtors, down to the present day, it has been neglected, and the penal and general adjudication preferred. But the explanation of this is, 1. That, even in the least involved case that can be supposed, the debtor has an advantage by the general adjudication; as the term of redemption is of double length, and as the general possession which it entitles the creditor to take of the whole lands is burdened with an obligation strictly to account for every farthing of the rental; while in the special adjudication, the value of the land and of the debt being supposed equal, the creditor's possession goes for the interest. 2. It commonly happens that the debtor's affairs are so much involved before adjudication is begun against him, that it is not easy for him to clear off the encumbrances, and give the adjudger an unexceptionable title. In the year 1681 it was proposed to overturn all this, and to restore apprizings, but without success. 'There was an Act (says Lord Fountainhall, vol. i. p. 156) brought in to the Articles, at the mediation of the writers to the signet, for taking away the new Act of Adjudications introduced in 1672, and bringing back the form and practice of comprizings again. This was opposed by the President of the Session (Lord Stair), 1mo, Because he was author of the said Act anent adjudications. 2do, His son being a clerk of the Session, had much benefit by these adjudications. —By the proroguing of this Parliament, this motion ceased.'

produce his title-deeds, consent to the adjudication, and renounce the possession: or, Secondly, That a general adjudication of all and sundry the lands, etc., shall be made to the creditor, redeemable, on payment of the sums of money, penalty, and interest, but without any addition of a fifth part more. Upon this summons the debtor is cited to appear and defend himself; and the action proceeds with particular forms of intimation, etc., to decree.¹

The alternative conclusion is still preserved, but the only use ever made of it is to procure delay in the pronouncing of the decree of adjudication. For although there are not on record more than two or three instances of the special adjudication, it still unquestionably is the privilege of the debtor to elect whether he shall not comply with the requisition to produce his title-deeds, and consent to a special adjudication.²

The decree pronounced by the Court adjudges the lands, etc. to the creditor redeemably, and orders the superior to receive him as vassal. It is accompanied by an ABBREVIATE, or abridged statement of the decree, containing the names of the creditor and of the debtor, the full enumeration of the subjects adjudged, and the words of the decree of adjudication. This is now (1 and 2 Geo. IV. c. 38, sec. 17) signed by the extractor, and within sixty days of its date is recorded in a register appointed for the purpose.³ If the recording have not been made in due time, the Ordinary has been allowed to pronounce a new decree before extract, so as to enable the adjudger to record within the sixty days.⁴

The decree of adjudication supplies in law the want of a voluntary conveyance [705] from the debtor. Where the property, though of an heritable nature, does not require sasine to its transmission, it is fully vested in the adjudger (redeemably) by the decree of adjudication alone. Where the property is feudal, and sasine is requisite, the right of the adjudger is completed by sasine on a charter of adjudication from the superior; or is held, as in competition with other adjudgers, to be completed by certain steps against the superior refusing a charter.⁵

The right acquired by the adjudger is redeemable; the time of redemption being five years in the special adjudication, ten years in the general. The debt may be extinguished by intromission with the rents of the estate, where the adjudger has entered to possess on a general adjudication. In the special adjudication, the rents go for the interest, and the debtor must pay the debt, with a fifth part more, before he can redeem his land.⁶

The adjudger's right is converted from a redeemable security into an absolute and irredeemable right of property, by a decree of DECLARATOR OF EXPIRY OF THE LEGAL. The LEGAL is an elliptical expression for the 'Legal term of redemption;' and the declarator of EXPIRY is an action before the Court of Session, in which the adjudging creditor calls on the

² A great contest arose between Lesly of Balquhain and the Administrators for Irvine of Drum, wherein the latter endeavoured to have Lesly's adjudication restricted to a special one, by offering him a progress. Lesly objected to the titles, 1. As defective; 2. As encumbered. These objections were repelled. But Irvine being nearly an idiot, could not validly renounce; and his administrators had not the power of tutors and curators to renounce for him. And so the general adjudication proceeded. 23 Dec. 1692, 1 Fount. 538.

So, in a case where the creditor showed considerable damage by the delay, the Court found the debtor entitled to a term to produce his titles. Pedie, 1776, M. App. Process, No. 2.

³ While apprising was in use, an allowance or decree confirming the apprising was written on the back of it by authority of the Court of Session, and was the warrant for letters of horning against superiors, charging them to enter the apprizor. These 'allowances,' or 'decrees conform,' were ordered to be entered on record by 1661, c. 31. On the introduction of adjudications, it was first ordered that an allowance, and afterwards an abbreviate in place of the allowance, should be entered on record. Reg. 1695, art. 24; Additional Reg. 1696, art. 3. But it may be remarked that these regulations are so far imperfect, that an adjudication which never has entered the record may be perfectly effectual in particular cases.

debtor to exercise his right of redemption, otherwise to have it judicially declared to be foreclosed. The debtor may in this action require the creditor to account for his intrusions with the rents, so as to have the balance ascertained, on payment of which the land may be redeemed.

Where the decree of declarator has been pronounced in absence, it has been thought doubtful whether it can be opened up again, like a decree for an ordinary debt. At first sight, the cases are a little perplexing. But the following distinctions seem to explain and reconcile them: 1. An irregularity in the original diligence of adjudication will entitle the debtor to open up the decree of declarator; which is considered only as an accessory, partaking of the nature of its principal. 2. Irregularity in the proceedings or decree of declarator will entitle the debtor to relief. Or, 3. If the debt was paid off or extinguished within the legal, the debtor will be relieved against the decree of declarator.¹

Formerly it was held, that by the mere expiration of the term of redemption the right of the creditor became absolute and irredeemable, except in cases where, on equitable grounds, the debtor should still be permitted to redeem. But an opposite doctrine was afterwards sanctioned by a determination of the Court of Session. On a very ample discussion, it was solemnly held that the debtor has a right to redeem at any time previous to a decree of declarator of expiry of the legal.² Since that time the point has been considered as fixed.³ It must not, however, be concealed, that doubts have been entertained respecting this doctrine by judges whose opinions are entitled to the greatest respect. In a case which occurred in 1811, the late Lord Meadowbank took occasion to say, that even at the hazard of encountering a principle which ought to be sacred,—namely, that uniformity should be preserved in decisions,—it well deserved consideration whether the above rule did not shake [706] one of still greater importance, undermining the security of the proprietors of land? He stated it as a fundamental rule of Scottish law, that property should stand secure against latent challenges; and that, on the whole, it were wiser and better to adhere to this great doctrine, with all its consequences, than to follow a determination which he considered as proceeding on unsound reasoning: that the right of the creditor is not in the nature of a penal foreclosure of the debtor, but a right of property under a power of redemption within a certain period. To this opinion Lord Newton assented. But, on the other hand, Lord Robertson, Lord Glenlee, Lord Justice-Clerk Boyle, and Lord Craigie, held that the rule had been well settled, and ought to be adhered to, both as a precedent and on principle; and that after the confirmation it had received in the case of Ormiston, decided under Lord President Blair, it was not to be questioned.⁴

⁴ Stewart v Lindsay, 26 Nov. 1811. This case is not reported; but it seems to be a great deal too important to be left unnoticed. [See 15 F. C. 155, 439.]

I do not know that Lord Chancellor Eldon was aware of this case when he decided the case of the Duke of Athole in 1815. But he took occasion then to say, that 'he could not perceive where, in what statute at least, is to be found prescribed the necessity for a declarator of the expiry of the legal.' And speaking by analogy, he added: 'With reference to what passes in our own courts, if you consider an adjudication as in the nature of a mortgage, the practice is familiar enough. By our mortgages the money is to be paid within a given time; and if it be not paid within the time, the instrument upon the face of it declares that the title of the mortgager is gone. But we nevertheless hold that the title of the mortgager is not gone, without a judgment of a court of equity that it is gone. And accordingly, when a party wishes to have that title which upon the face of it is declared to be absolute, in substance and in fact absolute, he applies to a court of equity for (I may use the very words) a declarator of the expiry of the legal; that is, to have it declared that if the other party does not pay the money in six months he is totally foreclosed; and that which is described in the instrument as a legal title shall be considered as an equitable title also. But where length of time is to form the title, although there be no such decree of foreclosure, no such

But although it must now be held as law, that the mere expiration of the legal term of redemption will not be enough to foreclose the debtor, it remains as a very important question, whether something less than a decree of declarator may not be sufficient? And, 1. It is settled that an adjudication followed by charter and sasine, and forty years' possession subsequently to the expiration of the legal, makes a good irredeemable title to land. It must be admitted that the point has not been settled by a series of solemn determinations; but a rule has long been established, uniformly assumed, and granted in all discussions, and incorporated with the practical jurisprudence and conveyancing of Scotland, that a charter of adjudication, with sasine and possession for forty years after expiration of the legal, has the full effect of an irredeemable right to land. This rule has for nearly half a century been understood as settled; and as such I well remember to have heard it laid down by the late Lord Justice-Clerk Macqueen, the greatest feudal lawyer of modern times. In the case of Gedd v Baker,¹ it seems to have been held, 1. That within the forty years it was competent to prove payment or satisfaction of the debt within the legal; 2. That the expiration of forty years after sasine saved the creditor adjudger from any challenge on the ground of objection to the sasine; and, 3. That it would require the expiration of forty years from the end of the legal term to secure the creditor adjudger from all challenge. The doctrine was, without contradiction, affirmed in a case in 1758.² In a case in 1791, judgment proceeded on the assumption that a charter of adjudication, with infeftment and possession for forty years after expiration of the legal, would, without a decree of declarator, have [707] been a perfectly good title.³ In a still later case, in 1809, the same doctrine was delivered as law under Lord President Blair, a judge eminently qualified to determine on matters of feudal law. The doctrine reported as delivered in that case was, 'That it must now be considered as settled law, that to convert an adjudication into an irredeemable right, and extinguish the right of the reverser, it is necessary that the adjudger shall either obtain decree in a declarator of expiry of the legal, or regularly invest himself with charter and sasine upon the adjudication, and possess thereon for forty years.'⁴ But besides these cases, there are two in which the question was directly determined.⁵

Thus, during a long series of years, and in every case where the point had been stated in argument or raised for decision, it has been assumed at the bar and on the bench, or expressly decided by the Court, that the right of the debtor to redeem an adjudication is extinguished by the expiration of the legal, followed by forty years' possession on charter declarator, if I may say so, of the expiry of the legal; yet if there is an adverse possession for twenty years, that shuts out all question, and dispenses with any such decree or declarator; and my present impression is that it may be so in Scotland.' General Robertson v D. of Athole, 10 May 1815, 3 Dow 114.

⁵ Johnston v Balfour, 1743, 1 Falconer 94, M. 10789. This is reported as a direct determination that a charter of adjudication, with sasine and forty years' possession after expiration of the legal term, is a good irredeemable title. But the report has been said to be incorrect; in proof of which reference was made to Lord Elchies. That eminent judge, however, has reported it the same way in his Dictionary, voce Prescription, No. 26. It is only in his Notes that an account somewhat different is said to be given, of which, however, it is not easy to perceive the inconsistency. And on examining the papers, I found that on both sides the doctrine in law was held undeniable; the only doubt being whether the fact of possession, as under the charter of adjudication, was sufficiently proved.

Spence v Bruce, 21 Jan. 1807. The action was brought to recover an estate which had been adjudged, and where a charter of adjudication with sasine, in March 1747, had been followed by possession for forty years. The chief question was, Whether possession had in fact followed on this title? for the possession having been by a tenant whose lease had been granted jointly by the person in the right of the adjudication, and by one holding a right of liferent, it was doubted whether it was to be held as the possession of the adjudger. The chief distinction, in short, between this case and that of Johnston and Balfour was that the doctrine in law, which was taken for granted in that case on both sides of the bar, was in this case discussed, and an attempt made to establish a distinction on the ground of the decision in Scotland and Jack's case. The judges held, 1. That the possession was sufficiently proved to have originated and continued under the adjudger; and, 2. That the positive prescription applied so as to complete the adjudger's right.

My note of this case I find confirmed by that of Baron Hume.

and sasine. This rule has accordingly been held by conveyancers as settled; and in many parts of the country, particularly in the north, but also in Mid-Lothian and in Ayrshire, many valuable estates rest upon titles no better than a charter of adjudication and sasine, confirmed by prescription; and finally, the doctrine has received the sanction of the House of Lords, after a careful inquiry on the part of Lord Chancellor Eldon, and may now be regarded as settled.¹

[708] If the right of the debtor is to be considered as grounded in equity merely, he should be barred by personal exception, wherever he has consented to, or acquiesced in, any extraordinary improvements made by the creditor in possession after the legal. But this point cannot be considered as settled; nor is there, indeed, any authority to be found on the subject, on which reliance can be placed.

Adjudications for debt are either, 1. Adjudications for enforcing payment of debt; 2. Adjudications in security merely; or, 3. Adjudications on debita fundi.

SECTION II.

ADJUDICATIONS FOR COMPELLING PAYMENT OF DEBT.

The common adjudication is that of which the history has been sketched in the preceding section. It is the ordinary form by which a creditor, for a debt already due, attaches the land or other heritable property of his debtor, for operating payment of what actually is due to him.

¹ General Robertson v D. of Athole, 10 May 1815, 3 Dow 114. In this case, a decree of adjudication was obtained in 1677 against Robertson of Lude, comprehending the lands of Inchmagreenoch, and those of Clunes and Strathgroy. In the former, the adjudger was infeft on a charter of adjudication from the superior; in the latter, he was not infeft. In 1688 the adjudication and lands were conveyed to the Marquis of Athole, who was superior of Clunes and Strathgroy. Those lands were, in the subsequent progress of the titles, included in the Crown charters of the earldom: Inchmagreenoch specially, as acquired by charter of adjudication; Clunes and Strathgroy only generally, under the description of the earldom. Such charters were passed in 1691 and 1725, and were followed by sasine and forty years' possession. The Court of Session decided that the Duke had a good title by prescription.

In the House of Lords, judgment was suspended for further inquiries into the law of Scotland on two points, which I shall state in the words of a note drawn up by Mr. Leach, now Master of the Rolls, to be transmitted to Scotland for information. '1. As to Inchmagreenoch:—If a creditor have adjudication against the land of his debtor, and afterwards obtain a charter of adjudication from the superior, and infeftment follow thereon, and the creditor continue in possession for forty years after the expiry of the legal, but without any declaration of that expiry, Does the creditor acquire by prescription an irredeemable title by force of the Act 1617? The short argument against the irredeemable title is, that the Act of 1617 is to confirm the title appearing upon the heritable infeftment by force of a possession of forty years, and not to convert, by force of that possession, an apparent redeemable title into an irredeemable title. The Lord Chancellor asks, How is the case of an adjudication distinguished from a wadset, where it is stipulated that, if the debt be not paid at a day certain, the right of reversion shall be irritated; in which latter case it is admitted, that if the creditor continued in possession for forty years from the expiration of the term of redemption, without any previous declarator, the right of the reverser is cut off by prescription? The supposed answer is, that the difference is found in the stipulation for redemption at a particular day, etc. For if the money be not paid at the day, the title of the creditor, as it appears upon the heritable infeftment, is irredeemable, and therefore is within the protection of the Act 1617.

'2. As to Clunes and Strathgroy:—The superiority of land is part of an earldom. The superior obtains an adjudication against his vassal, and enters into possession of the land upon his adjudication. All subsequent infeftments are of the earldom generally, and no particular mention made of the adjudged lands, and no declarator of the expiry of the legal. Does the superior, by forty years' possession after the expiry of the legal, acquire, by the Act of 1617, an irredeemable title to these lands? It is objected that the Act of 1617 gives no title by prescription except after the land is enjoyed by virtue of an heritable infeftment; and that in this case there never was an infeftment of the property, or dominium utile, after the adjudication, but that the infeftments were of the superiority only.'

In Mr. Dow's report of this case, the judgment seems to imply that a charter of adjudication without infeftment is sufficient to constitute an irredeemable right. But that is a point which I do not understand to have been expressly determined, and which seems to demand a great deal of consideration. For while there is no authority for such a doctrine in the books of Scottish law, the simple question cannot be taken to have been determined in a case which, on that branch of the contest, admitted of so much reasoning on various points.

Three cases may be distinguished, as leading to variations on the form and proceedings in common adjudications for payment of debt: 1. Where the debtor is alive, and the subject to be adjudged is his own proper estate; 2. Where the debtor has succeeded to an heritable estate, but has not hitherto completed his titles to it; and, 3. Where the debtor has died, leaving an estate.

SUBSECTION I.—ADJUDICATION OF PROPERTY VESTED IN THE DEBTOR.

The adjudication of property feudally vested in the debtor himself, is the simplest species of the adjudication; and as it is the form which, in the preliminary sketch of this diligence, has been kept in view, no further explanation will be necessary.

It may, however, be observed, that no adjudication is competent of a spes successionis.¹

SUBSECTION II.—ADJUDICATION OF PROPERTY TO WHICH THE DEBTOR HAS SUCCEEDED.

The difficulty of the second case arises from a peculiarity of the Scottish law of [709] succession. The right of the heir, in Scotland, is not completed by the mere operation of law. Certain forms are necessary, both to enable the heir to convey voluntarily the property to which he succeeds, and to entitle his creditors to attach it.

The estate descendible to the heir consists of subjects vested feudally, or of subjects not feudally vested in the ancestor; and these are carried to the heir by different forms of investiture. If the property was vested by sasine in the ancestor, the heir either obtains an entry voluntarily from the feudal superior, by precept of clare constat; or he purchases a brieve, gets himself served heir in special as to that property; and, upon the retour of the verdict, proceeds to compel the superior to grant him a charter, and so to complete his right by infeftment. If the ancestor have neglected to take sasine, a general service puts the heir precisely in his place; and he proceeds to complete his title by executing the procuratory of resignation or precept of sasine, the warrants under which a feudal investiture is bestowed; or if the ancestor's title contained neither of these warrants, he proceeds to supply their place by adjudging in implement.

A creditor, whose debtor has succeeded to heritable property, can have no difficulty in adjudging, if the debtor choose voluntarily to take up the succession: For,

1. When the debtor has served himself as heir in general, all the property unvested by sasine in the ancestor is open to adjudication by his creditors, the personal title to the feudal subjects being carried by the adjudication; and the adjudger being equally well entitled, as the heir himself would have been, to complete his feudal investiture upon the unexecuted warrants for sasine.

2. When the debtor has served himself heir in special, and completed his feudal title by sasine, to lands in which his predecessor was vested, the case as to the adjudger is the same as if the debtor had been originally proprietor of the estate; nay, even where the heir has not been actually infeft, but, having served heir in special, has charged his superior to enter him, the creditor may proceed to adjudge as if the title were complete.²

But the difficulty was to find a remedy where the debtor did not choose to enter to his ancestor's estate. There was a time when no remedy for such a case seems to have been

¹ Beaton & M'Andrew v M'Donald, 1821, 1 S. 49, N. E. 53. This was an attempt to adjudge such parts of the lands, etc., with all right, title, etc., as Alexander M'Donald, younger, has, or may claim, as heir-apparent or otherwise, of A. M'Donald, his father. The father was a lunatic, and in right of the lands. The adjudication was dismissed by Lord Allover as incompetent, 'in respect that, although Alexander

M'Donald is the eldest son of his father, there is no right vested in him as his heir-apparent, the right not opening till the father's death; and in respect that this proceeding is altogether new, in so far as the Lord Ordinary knows, in the law of Scotland, in which there has been no previous attempt made to adjudge a spes successionis.'

known; when the refusal or non-compliance of the heir with the request of his creditors, that he should take up the succession, and enable them to attach it, was irremediable by the creditors. But a statute in 1540, c. 106, which was passed with a view to the creditors of the ancestor only, was by a declaratory Act in 1621 applied to this case of the heir refusing to do justice to his creditors by entering to his ancestor.¹ The mode in which this is accomplished is so fully described in the former statute, that a less minute explanation will be sufficient.

1. Where the land has been invested by infeftment in the ancestor, the creditor, upon production of his grounds of debt, obtains letters of special charge from the signet; which, proceeding upon a narrative of the debt, and of the heir's refusal to enter, to the disappointment [710] of the complainer's diligence, authorize a charge against the debtor to enter heir in special to the predecessor, and to complete his right within forty days, so that the complainer may obtain execution by adjudication. The penalty or certification if he fail is, that the complainer shall be allowed to proceed with his diligence as if the debtor were actually entered.

2. Where the subject has not been feudally vested in the predecessor, the form is different; and a distinction, in name, accompanies it. As the former was called a special charge, so this is called a general special charge; the general special charge,—although it points only to a general service,—containing a specification of those subjects which are to be adjudged by the creditor, and which must be thus enumerated, in order to give effect to the certification.

3. The heir is not obliged to answer to these charges before the expiration of the annus deliberandi; and consequently the statutory certification cannot till then take effect, unless it can be shown that the debtor has already assumed the character of heir, by possessing the estate, or granting conveyances of it.²

4. After the days of the charge are expired (provided the heir has not renounced the succession), the creditor is entitled to proceed with his adjudication as if the heir were entered. The adjudication differs neither in nature nor in proceeding from adjudication in the simple case; and the right of the creditor is to be completed in the same way as if the debtor had been served heir in special.

5. In the case (to be immediately considered) of an heir succeeding to one whose debts expose the estate to the diligence of his creditors, the heir may wish to renounce the succession, and not to undertake even that implied and legal responsibility which the statute has declared to be the result of disobeying a special charge. But there is a manifest objection to such renunciation by a debtor who has succeeded to a valuable estate.³ Between the case of an heir who is required to enter upon the succession of his ancestor, in order to facilitate the payment of that ancestor's creditors, and the case now under consideration,

² This long delay, although undoubtedly very inconvenient, is not so dangerous as it may at first sight appear to be, since there is a legal preference given to the creditors of the deceased using diligence against the estate any time within three years from his death, over the creditors of the heir (see below, p. 764), and since none other of the heir's creditors can get their diligence forward any faster. There no doubt is one danger, viz. that the heir may voluntarily grant a conveyance to some one of the creditors, to the prejudice of those of his own creditors who mean to adjudge, and whose hands are tied up by the law. But besides the diligence of inhibition, prohibiting all voluntary conveyances, not only of subjects vested in the debtor, but of those which shall afterwards be acquired by him, there is a special prohibition of such deeds within a year from the death. See below, p. 770.

[By the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, the summons of adjudication is now held to imply a special or general special charge, and the annus deliberandi is reduced to six months.]

³ The doubt whether renunciation be competent in this case, is as old as the time of Lord Durie. Six years after the passing of the statute of 1621, by which the law of special charge was declared applicable to the heir's own debt, as well as to the ancestor's, it was questioned, in a case between the laird of Carse and his brother, Whether a renunciation was in such a case competent? The debt being established by a registered obligation, the laird of Carse was charged, under the statute 1621, c. 27, to enter heir in special of his father to certain lands. The laird suspended, and gave in a renunciation, which was opposed. The Lords found that he might lawfully renounce to be heir. 23 March 1627, Durie 294.

there is a marked distinction. No man can be forced to undertake, for the benefit of those to whom he owes no duty, a succession which implies burdens; but a person who is owing debts cannot renounce a succession which has opened to him, and which may supply the means of paying his debts, without unjustly bestowing upon the next heir property to which his own creditors are entitled. Another main distinction between the cases is this, that the creditors of the ancestor are not deprived of his estate by the refusal of the heir to enter, although compliance might have facilitated their operations: for by law they are entitled in that case to proceed directly against the hæreditas jacens, or unvested property itself, as coming in place of their debtor; whereas the creditors of the heir can attach the [711] succession only through the person of their debtor. A renunciation in the former case is therefore of little consequence; in the latter, it deprives the creditors of the fund which ought to be open to them.

SUBSECTION III.—ADJUDICATION OF THE DEBTOR'S PROPERTY AFTER HIS DEATH.

In Scotland, the estate of a debtor is in all situations liable to the diligence of his creditors, both during his life and after his death, unless it be held by him under such restraints as deprive his creditors of their remedy against it. The natural method of recovering payment of debt, after the debtor is dead, is by an application to his heir. Should he refuse to pay, the next object of the creditor is to attach in his hands whatever property the ancestor may have left; or, if the heir's titles be not completed, to force him to his election, whether to take up the succession, or to leave it at the disposal of the law, for the benefit of the creditors.

This last object is accomplished, under the operation of the Act 1540, c. 106, already alluded to, by means of charges to enter heir. This method of calling upon the heir to enter, there could have been no hesitation in making absolute, without leaving to him a choice, had it not been for the principle, that an heir who enters to the succession of his ancestor becomes personally liable for all his debts.¹

1. If the heir choose to enter to the estate of his ancestor, and to complete his titles to it, the creditors of the ancestor proceed, in the first place, to have their debts fixed against him, as representing their debtor; which is done either voluntarily, by bond, etc., on the part of the heir, or judicially, by the judgment or decree of a court. They then proceed to adjudge the estate, as if the heir had been originally their debtor and the proprietor of the estate; and they have this peculiar privilege over the creditors of the heir himself, that

and beyond the extent of this inventory he was not liable. In France, where the Roman law was much regarded, the provisions for this case were in essence the same. There was only this difference in form, that the right of the legal heir was held to be vested in him from the moment of his predecessor's death, so that a renunciation was necessary to clear him from the consequences of the succession, and relieve him from the debts of the ancestor. It was only the heir by institution who was required to declare his acceptance. Pothier, Traité des Successions, 230; ibid. 126.

In Scotland the law is the same with that of Rome and of France, in giving the heir a year to deliberate, and in subjecting him to an universal representation, unless where the entry is made by inventory; but it agrees with the Roman rather than with the French law in requiring a formal entry by the heir. Indeed, it would appear that in Scotland, even more than in Rome, a formal entry as heir is necessary. The passive representation may indeed be incurred tacitly, as by gestio pro hærede, but the heir has not a full active title without a formal entry.

their adjudications, if completed within three years of their debtor's death, give them a preference upon the ancestor's estate.

2. If the heir, either tacitly or by express act, assume the general succession; if he behave as heir, and, taking the benefit, render himself liable as representative for his ancestor's debts; the creditors of the ancestor, founding upon that representation, bring their actions of debt against him without any previous charge; and upon obtaining decrees, [712] transferring the ancestor's debts against him, they proceed as already described, and force the heir to complete his titles, in order to validate their adjudication of the property. They charge him upon a special or a general special charge, according to the state of the titles; and as he cannot in such a case be allowed to renounce the succession, having already assumed it in general representation, he must either enter, or the certification of the statute 1540, c. 106, will supply the place of an actual entry, and enable the creditors to proceed as if the heir were served in special.

3. If the heir have not assumed the representation, then the creditors of the ancestor are to take measures for obliging him to declare his election. This is done by means of a charge to serve himself heir in general to the debtor, otherwise to be held as heir. This charge cannot, however, be given with effect till the annus deliberandi be expired; the heir not being obliged sooner to declare what his resolution may be. The general charge gives the heir forty days for obedience; and it has been settled that the charge may be given so that these forty days shall run along with the annus deliberandi.¹

4. Whether the heir choose to answer this charge or not, the creditors of the ancestor may, immediately after the expiration of the forty days, proceed with their action of constitution, for the purpose of transferring the ancestor's debt against the heir. The heir may in this action appear and answer the charge, by renouncing the succession; but if he do not, judgment is pronounced against him, as lawfully charged to enter heir to his ancestor. If he appear, and defend himself against the debt upon any plea, as in right of the ancestor, this is an assumption of the passive title in respect to that particular debt; but it will not give a right to other creditors to make him universally liable.² Neither of these passive titles, in short, reach further than the special debt in question; but as to that debt, they subject the heir, in his person and in his own estate, as well as in his right to the estate of his ancestor. If the decree on the general charge, however, be in absence, the heir will be allowed to suspend it on producing a renunciation; at least to suspend it in so far as it subjects him or his estate for his ancestor's debts. The heir cannot be deprived of this right of suspension, unless some of his own creditors have attached the ancestor's estate; in which case the heir must clear off the debt before his renunciation will be admitted.³

We shall see hereafter that there may be a necessity for hurrying on the proceedings, in order to preserve to the creditors of the ancestor the preference which law has conferred on certain conditions. This will deserve attention in selecting the court in which the action of constitution is to be raised.⁴

5. The debt being fixed against the heir by this decree, when he has not chosen to renounce the succession, the creditors of course proceed to charge him to enter in special, either by special or general special charge. The special charge cannot be given till the decree of constitution be pronounced; because 'the special charge is a part of and preparation for the execution of a sentence, and so cannot precede the sentence.'⁵ Yet it is no objection that the special charge was executed before extracting the decree of constitution; it having been actually pronounced.¹ It is by the decree of constitution that the debt is fixed upon the heir, and therefore it is proper and regular to recite that decree [713] in the letters of special charge; but the omission of this founds no objection against an adjudication, provided the decree was actually obtained before raising the letters.²

6. Where the heir chooses to renounce, the proceeding is somewhat different. The estate of the ancestor being then abandoned by him who has the right of succession, the creditors are entitled to attach it for their debt. Upon production of the renunciation, all personal conclusion against the heir is discharged, and the heir absolved from the action; and decree is pronounced simply to the effect of declaring the amount of the debt which is to be a burden on the succession. This is called a decree cognitionis causa contra hæreditatem jacentem et bona mobilia; and after it has been pronounced, a summons of adjudication is raised, calling upon the heir and all others having interest to hear and see the lands, etc. adjudged to belong to the creditor, in payment of his debt. The decree of adjudication, thus pronounced, has the same effect with the adjudication for debt against the debtor's own estate. It entitles the creditor to complete his right by infeftment, and to enter into possession. This adjudication was by 1621, c. 7, first declared redeemable by posterior creditors, either of the ancestor or of the heir. Prior to that Act, it was doubted whether the heir himself could redeem; but it is thereby fixed that he cannot, unless minor at the date of the renunciation. The method of redeeming, if he wish to do so, is to grant a trust-bond, on which the trustee adjudging may redeem.³

7. It may be observed, before leaving this point, that by the Act 1540, c. 106, it is declared that the heir, in order to be subjected to this sort of coercion, shall 'be of perfect age.' But M'Kenzie remarks,⁴ that minors may notwithstanding 'be validly charged to enter heir de practica;' and that 'by our constant practice they may be charged, since this is necessary for completing the creditor's diligence.' But, at least, if such charge be competent, no effectual proceedings can take place in the action of constitution, unless either tutors or curators have been cited; or, if there be none, the creditor take care to have a tutor ad litem appointed to watch over the interests of the pupil.

8. It may happen that the Crown, as ultimus hæres, is the successor of the deceased debtor; and it seems doubtful how the Crown can be subjected to the operation of the statutes under consideration. Both Craig⁵ and Stair⁶ hold that the debt may be made effectual contra hæreditatem jacentem by adjudication, calling the officers of state and the king's donator. And more recently this question having been tried, the Court held a summons competent against the officers of state, concluding for a decree of cognition for constituting the debt, and adjudication of the estate of a bastard debtor.⁷ It is not, therefore, by a charge against the officers of state that the creditor is to proceed; for the Crown succeeds ipso jure coronæ, and the officers of state may at once be called in an action for constituting the debt, and fixing it as a debt on the succession.

Of the forms of attaching the estate of a deceased debtor, that in which the heir takes up the succession, and that in which he subjects himself to the diligence authorized by 1540, c. 106, were regular and known forms of diligence by appraising in 1672; and when the Legislature in that year substituted adjudications before the Court of Session, instead of the old form of appraising, the adjudications in these cases were, along with the simple adjudication for debt, included in the law. The third kind of diligence, contra hæreditatem jacentem, never appeared in the form of an appraising, but from the first in the shape of an action [714] for adjudging the hæreditas jacens to belong to the creditor. When the Legislature then substituted adjudications in place of appraisings, and declared the Court of Session the only competent judicatory for those substituted adjudications, it did not mean (at least so it has been decided¹) to include adjudications contra hæreditatem jacentem; and they, accordingly, have always been held competent before the sheriff, as all apprizings formerly were. This is the first peculiarity that deserves notice in the adjudication contra hæreditatem jacentem. A second is, that in adjudications contra hæreditatem jacentem before the sheriff there is no absolute provision for recording or publishing. The abbreviate of the adjudication, which enters upon the record, is a mere substitute for the allowance of the appricing. But there never was any decree conform, or allowance, pronounced upon adjudications contra hæreditatem jacentem.² When abbreviates, therefore, were introduced instead of allowances, by the regulations 1695, art. 24, adjudications contra hæreditatem jacentem were not included. This omission, in so far as regarded such adjudications when led before the Court of Session, was supplied by the additional regulations 'concerning the Session,' 1696, art. 3; but the remedy extended not to those which proceeded before the sheriff. It has, indeed, been the practice to have abbreviates signed by the sheriff, and to record them, like the abbreviates of the Court of Session, in the register of adjudications; but the judges have thought themselves entitled to go no further than to refuse issuing letters of horning against superiors when this has been omitted.³

SECTION III.

ADJUDICATION IN SECURITY.

Before adjudications were substituted for apprizings, this process had been adopted by the Court of Session as an equitable remedy in cases where appricing was not competent. The adjudication in security was thus introduced; and with the exception of the pari passu preference, none of the statutory provisions applicable to ordinary adjudications reach this diligence.

We have already seen that, by the law of Scotland, creditors in future and even in contingent debts are entitled to take measures of security against the impending insolvency of their debtors, and to insist that a share of his inadequate fund shall at least be set apart for their satisfaction against their debt becoming due. The grounds and principles of this doctrine have already been explained.⁴ The adjudication in security is the remedy by which the debt of a future or contingent creditor, or of a creditor who is not ready to adjudge for payment, is secured against the other creditors. The libel of adjudication states the nature of the debt, the impending insolvency of the debtor, the requisition for proper security; and so concludes, that 'in security of the sums mentioned, the lands should be adjudged from [715] the said defender, and decerned and ordained to belong to the pursuer, heritably, in security and satisfaction of the said sums.'

1. The legal of this adjudication does not expire,⁵ or rather there is no legal. It is from first to last a redeemable right.

2. As a prætorian remedy in equity, adjudication in security may be applied for where the debt is not yet due, or where it is contingent, or where the creditor has it not in his power to establish the amount of it; or perhaps, also, where the creditor has no proof of his debt instantaneously to produce.¹

¹ Ker v Primrose, 1709, M. 46.

² They never had the form of appricing, but were from the first proper actions of adjudication, in order to the execution of which against the superior a separate and accompanying action was at first raised, though afterwards a conclusion for decree against the superior was thrown into the summons of adjudication contra hæreditatem jacentem itself.

In such cases apprizings were incompetent,² and the lawfulness of adjudications was once doubted on the analogy of apprizings; but, 1st, An adjudication by a cautioner, in security of his relief, was found to have the same effect with an infeftment in relief;³ 2^d, So of an adjudication on a bond, payable on the granter's death;⁴ and, 3^d, An adjudication in security 'for a daughter's bond of provision was found entitled to proceed and compete with the other creditors, though the term of payment was not till her age of eighteen years,' and posterior to the competition.⁵

3. This remedy, however, will not be given in all cases, but only where there is a manifest call for it in justice, as on occasion of impending insolvency, or where other creditors have begun to adjudge, and there is danger of losing the pari passu preference.⁶

4. On principle, it might seem doubtful whether, if the first adjudications be in security only, intimation be necessary, since this is a sort of adjudication which never can carry off the estate, and of which the legal does not expire. But still it will be remembered that a preferable security may be constituted; and the words both of the Act 1661, c. 62, extending all the rules of that Act along with the pari passu preference to adjudications for debt as well as to comprizings, and the words of the recent statutes,⁷ put this beyond all doubt.

5. The adjudication in security is to be completed like the ordinary adjudication for payment; the right, of course, being merely a right redeemable, and not capable of becoming absolute. There is no legal in such adjudications.

SECTION IV.

ADJUDICATIONS UPON DEBITA FUNDI.

The adjudication of a feudal subject for personal debt confers a real right only in consequence of the sasine which follows upon it. But adjudication may be led for debts which are already made real upon the estate, and which form, independently of any [716] adjudication, preferable claims upon it. The purpose of leading an adjudication in such a case is not to give the debtor further security, or even to obtain payment of the real debt, but to accumulate the debt, with its interest, into a capital bearing interest. In so far as concerns the real debt, and interest due on it, these adjudications are said to be preferable to all others. But, to speak more correctly, the adjudication does not deprive them of their natural preference as real debts.⁸ The adjudger has no preference over other adjudgers for the interest of the accumulated sum in his adjudication, since that is not a real, but merely a personal debt, being interest upon interest.

Debita fundi, which thus are entitled to a preference over all common adjudications, are such as form a real burden upon the lands, whether constituted by law or by agreement. Debts secured upon land by heritable bond, with the interest upon them; debts forming burdens by reservation; the duties due to the superior,—all are real debts, entitling a young man in trade, and so exposed to hazard. The Court held, that 'an adjudication in security before the term of payment of the sum adjudged for is an extraordinary remedy, not allowed except when the creditor is in danger otherwise of losing his debt.' And as in this case there was no sufficient ground of hazard alleged, the Court assolvied the heir.

the holders of them to preference. But in order to raise the interest due upon arrears into a real debt, or debitum fundi, so as to be the ground of a preferable adjudication, it is necessary to use the diligence of 'poining the ground.' This, as already explained, is an action in which the proprietor of the ground, and tenants, are cited, and which concludes for decree and warrant to point the moveables on the lands, and for adjudication of the ground-right, in payment of the arrears due; and it has the effect of converting the arrears into a principal sum, bearing interest, and really secured. An adjudication following on this, and accumulating the arrears which have been the subject of this diligence, bestows a preference for the interest of the accumulated sum, as being now converted into a real debt.¹ It does not seem to be necessary to have a decree of constitution against the heir, in order to found an adjudication on a debitum fundi; for letters of poining of the ground proceed without any constitution, upon merely calling the apparent heir for his interest;² and the poining of the ground is a direct warrant for the adjudication.

SECTION V.

COMMENTARY ON THE STATUTES FOR REGULATING PREFERENCES AMONG ADJUDGING CREDITORS.

Such being the nature of the diligence of adjudication when used by a single creditor, those regulations next demand attention by which the preferences among adjudging creditors are regulated. In this inquiry, two cases are to be distinguished: 1. Where the adjudgers are all in one class as creditors of the same person; and, 2. Where there are two classes of creditors—the one of the ancestor, the other of the heir.

SUBSECTION I.—ADJUDICATIONS BY CREDITORS OF THE SAME DEBTOR.

Where the adjudgers are all creditors originally of the same debtor, whether the property to be adjudged belong to that debtor, or descend to him from his ancestor, or be the proper estate of the debtor in hæreditate jacente, their diligence is subject to the operation of certain statutes introducing equality among them. Beyond the range of those statutes the adjudications take their station in the ranking, like voluntary preferences, according to the dates of their completion.

I.—PARI PASSU PREFERENCE WHILE THE DEBTOR IS ALIVE.

[717] The spirit of the law is, that every creditor who shall obtain decree of adjudication within year and day from the date of the decree pronounced in that adjudication which shall be first rendered complete, shall be entitled to share equally with the first adjudger. At its introduction this law was very imperfect. But by certain provisions for the publication of the first adjudication, so as to put other creditors on their guard, and by provisions also for enabling creditors at less expense to take the benefit of the law, it was improved into a useful, though still a very clumsy and cumbrous, remedy against inequality.

The equalization, or pari passu preference of diligence against land, was first introduced by the following section of the Act 1661, c. 62: 'And because oftentimes creditors, in regard they live at distance, or upon other occasions, are prejudged and preveened by the more timeous diligence of other creditors, so that before they can know the condition of the common debtor his estate is comprized, and the posterior comprizers have only right to the legal reversion, which may and doth often prove ineffectual to them, not being able to satisfy and redeem the prior comprizings (their means and money being in the hands of the common debtor) : Therefore it is statute and ordained, that all comprizings deduced since the first day of January one thousand six hundred and fifty-two years, before the first effectual comprizing, or after, but within year and day of the same, shall come in pari passu together, as if one comprizing had been deduced and obtained for the whole respective sums contained in the foresaid comprizings. And it is declared, that such comprizings as are preferable to all others, in respect of the first real right and infeftment following thereupon, or the first exact diligence for obtaining the same, are and shall be holden the first effectual comprizing, though there be others in date before and anterior to the same : and the foresaid benefit given and introduced hereby, in favours of those whose comprizings are led within the time and in manner foresaid, is only granted and competent in the case of comprizings led since the first day of January one thousand six hundred and fifty-two years, and to be led after the date of thir presents, and for personal debt only, without prejudice alwayes of ground-annuals, annualrents due upon infeftment, and other real debts, and debita fundi, and of comprizings therefor of lands and others affected therewith, which shall be effectual and preferable, according to the laws and practick of this kingdom now standing. And it is also provided, that the creditors having right to the first comprizing, except as is above excepted, shall be satisfied by the posterior comprizers, claiming the benefit foresaid, of the whole expense disbursed by them in deducing and expeding the said first comprizing and infeftments thereupon.' The statute afterwards proceeds to enact, 'That the benefit foresaid introduced hereby anent comprizings, shall be extended to adjudications for debt ; so that the creditors at whose instance the same are obtained, and those who have right to redeem the same, shall be in the same case as to the benefite foresaid, as if the said adjudications for debts were comprizings.'

This rule was continued as applicable to adjudication, when by 1672, c. 19, that form of diligence was substituted for apprizing. In 1793 several provisions were made for diminishing the number of adjudications, and lessening the expense.¹ These are continued in the late Act.²

The law on this subject may be explained under these heads : 1. The description of the first effectual adjudication ; 2. The term during which a subsequent adjudication may be led to the effect of conferring an equal right on the creditor ; and, 3. The provisions for rendering this remedy complete, by publishing the first adjudication, and facilitating [718] the proceedings in posterior adjudications.

1. Description of the first effectual Adjudication.

As voluntary conveyances and securities can be completed only by sasine where the estate is feudal, so adjudications, in order to stand in competition against such conveyances, must also be completed by sasine. But sasine is not necessary as between one adjudger and another. In this case the statute has declared it to be sufficient if the creditor shall have done diligence for forcing the superior to enter him.³ The statute describes the first

¹ 33 Geo. III. c. 74, secs. 10 and 11.

² 54 Geo. III. c. 137, secs. 8 and 9. [Infra, p. 760.]

³ This it may be proper shortly to explain. It has already been stated, that a decree of adjudication is equivalent to a conveyance from the debtor, with procuratory of resignation in favorem creditoris ; and that the adjudger is entitled, under his decree of adjudication, to apply to the superior for a charter, upon which sasine may follow. Long before superiors were bound to receive voluntary purchasers, creditors were entitled to demand an entry. Even so early as the time of Alexander II., the superior had his choice of taking the land himself, or entering the creditor as vassal (Stat. Alex. c. 24, secs. 5 and 7). By statute 1469, c. 37, it was expressly enacted : 'That the overlord sall receive the creditor, or any other buyer, tenant till him, payand to the overlord a zieres male, as the land is sett for the time ; and failzing thereof, that he tak the land till himselfe, and undergang the debt.' This legal obligation upon the superior to enter the apprizor was in ancient times enforced by diligence proceeding against the superior, upon the decree conform, or allowance of the apprizing, the precursor of the abbreviate. At that period the common diligence for enforcing performance of effectual adjudication to be, 'that upon which infestment shall have followed, or the first exact diligence for obtaining the same.' But it was doubted what should be held as exact diligence for obtaining an infestment. In the simple case, indeed, it was not questioned that a charge to the superior was sufficient; or the presenting of a signature in Exchequer where the Crown was superior. But in a great variety of cases the simplicity of this rule was disturbed; and although the Legislature in 1793¹ swept away all those perplexities, perhaps the spirit and effect of the statute cannot otherwise be so well understood as by a review of the questions which arose under the former law.

1. As, in admitting the charge to the superior to be a due completion of the diligence in all questions with co-adjudgers, the law proceeded merely on the ground that the creditor could do no better, and that such a regulation was necessary to prevent the rights of creditors from being exposed to the caprice or injustice of the superior; it followed, that wherever the creditor could complete his adjudication without applying to the superior, the reason of the law did not apply, and the charge should not be held as an effectual adjudication. Thus, if the debtor's right be still personal, the creditor adjudging may complete his title by taking sasine on the unexecuted precept; the adjudication carrying right to it, and also entitling the adjudger to enforce exhibition of it, for the purpose of completing his infestment.²

[719] 2. Many difficulties arose where the titles of the superior were incomplete. As a superior unentered has, in the eye of law, no feudal character, a charge against him to enter a vassal was nugatory; and our best lawyers required, to the completion of the adjudication, a charge to the superior to get himself also entered in the superiority, that he might be in a capacity to receive the vassal.³ This question of the necessity of charging the superior to enter, came several years ago to be discussed,⁴ when it was said by one of obligations ad factum præstandum was by letters of four forms. They consisted of four different charges, given by officers of the law, under the authority of four warrants successively issued, and increasing in severity of requisition to the last. In the common case of an obligation ad factum præstandum, the last of these charges denounced against the debtor, in case of disobedience, all the penalties which the law had appointed for the punishment of rebellion. In the diligence upon the apprizing the penalty was not so formidable: it was merely that if the superior should not, in compliance with the requisition, enter the adjudger, the creditor should be allowed to go to the next superior and receive an entry from him; and so successively up to the Crown, who never refuses to enter a vassal. To prevent superiors from unjustly granting an entry to one adjudger, and refusing it to another, that statute which established the communion among adjudgers declared that diligence against the superiors should be sufficient to complete the adjudication, in so far as respected that competition.

² Pierce v Limond, 1791, M. 244. Here several creditors of Ross of Kerse led adjudications. Limond, to complete his adjudication, charged the superior to enter him. Pierce, observing that the debtor, Ross, had never been infest on the disposition in his favour, although it contained precept and procuratory, got possession of the disposition, and took infestment by executing the precept in his own favour as adjudger. This having been done beyond year and day, the question arose, Whether Limond's adjudication was the first effectual, or whether Pierce's was not to be considered as the only effectual adjudication? The Court unanimously held, that the adjudication at the instance of Henry Pierce was the first effectual one.

See also Dewar v French, 6 Dec. 1695, 1 Fount. 684.

⁴ Ranking of Kerse, Bell's Cases, p. 3. There arose here a competition respecting the lands of Little Mill, between Mr. Pierce and Mr. Ross. Both parties mistook the state of the titles, and made up their adjudications erroneously. These lands had been held feu of Lord Cathcart by Mrs. Crawford. She had conveyed them to William Ross, and he infest himself base upon his disposition. After his death, his brother, Hugh Ross, paid his debts, and took steps for vesting his right in himself as creditor, but he never was infest. Thus it will be observed that there was a superior remaining inter-

the judges, that a charge given to the proper superior to enter the adjudger would be held to make an effectual adjudication, although his titles were not complete. But a different opinion prevailed, viz. that where the superior is unentered, it is necessary first to charge him to enter, and then to charge him to receive the adjudger; that the creditor is bound, before going to the Crown, who refuses none, to take every proper measure for forcing the superior to complete his titles. This opinion not only rests upon the solid ground, that a charge against the unentered superior to enter the creditor is inept, since the person charged is not the feudal superior; but it is supported, as we have seen, by the authority of one of our oldest and best lawyers, and sanctioned by the practice which the other lawyers of his time approved of and directed.

3. Another class of difficulties arose respecting the completion of adjudication, where the creditor adjudging was himself the superior. Lord Stair thought that in such a case no sasine was necessary, the original sasine of the superior recovering its full force when the right is brought back by apprizing;¹ but Mr. Erskine shortly and ably refutes this doctrine, and shows it to have proceeded upon a mistaken notion with regard to the nature of the feudal consolidation.² The superior must therefore be infeft upon his own precept; [720] and after the right becomes, by expiry of the legal and declarator, irredeemable, he may consolidate by resignation ad remanentiam.

4. Difficulties multiplied in a most distressing degree where base rights had been constituted, and the titles and connections of parties were not clear. Thus, a question occurred respecting the proper method of making an adjudication of a base right effectual where the disponee was dead. One being infeft as a Crown vassal, disposed to his son, with procuratory and precept, and died. The son was infeft base, and never made his right public by confirmation or resignation. His creditors did diligence by adjudication against the superiority, as in hæreditate jacente, and against the property; and a competition arose among them for the quality of first effectual. The superiority clearly was in hæreditate jacente of the father; the property in his son. There were three ways in which it was conceived that the adjudications ought to be made effectual: 1. By the adjudgers obtaining in Exchequer a charter of adjudication of the superiority, and then as superiors giving infeftment to themselves in the property: 2. By throwing into the signature of adjudication a clause of confirmation of the base right, so as to enable the creditors to take sasine on the adjudication, as if the right were consolidated: 3. By charging the heirs of the father to enter, and infeft the adjudger in the property. The last of these methods would no doubt have been effectual, upon the principles stated above in Kerse's case; but it was excluded here by the second method, which had been taken before, and which all agreed was good. As to the first, it was universally thought that it gave no right to the property; and the only question was, Whether, as it preceded the second, it did not serve as a mid-impediment to the confirmation? But the Court found it did not; and that although it made the first effectual adjudication quoad the superiority, it precluded not the confirmation, as making the first effectual against the property.³

Thus, even in the most simple cases, where the vassal had not taken sasine on the disposition, the adjudger could not complete his adjudication without possession of the disposition; and this he might find great difficulty in recovering: while in the more com-jected between Lord Cathcart and William and Hugh Ross, viz. Mrs. Crawford, for William Ross' disposition was base. But Hugh Ross, overlooking this circumstance, obtained a disposition from Lord Cathcart; and upon the procuratory resigned in the hands of the Crown, and upon the Crown charter infeft himself and his son. Now two of the creditors followed different plans in adjudging. Mr. Ross having adjudged, applied for a Crown charter of adjudication, and was thereupon infeft. Mr. Pierce thought he had taken effectual means for attaching the property, by charging Mr. Ross, as superior under his Crown-holding, to enter him as adjudger. But the Court found that neither of these creditors had effectually adjudged the property, since the charge ought to have been given to the heirs of Mrs. Crawford, the interjected superior.

² Ersk. ii. 12. 29.

³ M'Kenzie v Ross & Ogilvie, 1791, M. 275.

plicated, it was necessary for the creditor-adjudger, in order to proceed with safety, to have the most masterly assistance to direct him what step to follow, in the peculiar situation of the feudal titles of his vassal, or of the superior; and even the materials for such deliberation he could not be expected to have at command.¹

The same strictness is still required where the adjudication is to come into competition with other real rights; with heritable securities or dispositions, completed by infeftment. But in competitions among adjudgers themselves, it was necessary to have a method of completing the diligence more within the reach of a creditor, and less exposed to the collusion and fraud of the debtor, or of his superiors. Therefore, by the 33 Geo. III., continued by 54 Geo. III. c. 137, sec. 11, and subsequent statutes, 'the presenting of a signature in Exchequer, when the holding is of the Crown; or the executing of a general charge of horning against superiors at the market-cross of Edinburgh, and pier and shore of Leith, when the holding is of a subject; and recording an abstract of the said signature or the said charge in the register of abbreviates of adjudications, shall be held in all time coming as the proper diligence for the purpose aforesaid.'²

In burgage subjects (as to which there might otherwise be difficulty) this general charge is sufficient.

[721] In the interpretation of this law a difficulty may be stated: Whether it can be held to apply to the case of a superior adjudging the property of his vassal? On the one hand, there does seem to be a sort of absurdity in a person charging himself by horning to do an act which is within his own power; but, on the other, the view of the law evidently was to form a general rule for all cases, and, without regarding the peculiarities of situation or the person or state of the superior, to make a general charge recorded sufficient for supplying all deficiencies. There is a possibility at least that a superior may be mistaken as to the titles of his debtor; and that, in giving an entry to himself, he may be as far from the true line as if he had no connection with the property: there may be interjected superiors, of whom he knows nothing; and therefore the general remedy should be open to him as to others.

The first effectual adjudication, once constituted, is the criterion of the pari passu preference. It becomes from that moment not merely a private diligence, belonging exclusively to the individual who uses it, but a general diligence, in which every creditor who afterwards adjudges has an interest. In this view, it is not entirely at the disposal of the individual: its quality of 'effectual' remains to complete the other adjudications, although the debt upon which it proceeds may have been paid off, and the adjudication of course extinguished as an individual diligence.³

2. Term during which all Adjudgers may partake of the Preference of the First Effectual.

All adjudications which are prior to the first effectual, and all those which, being posterior to it, are dated within year and day of the pronouncing of the decree, are to be brought in equally, or pari passu. The expression of the Act to this effect seems to be clear; and yet it has given rise to doubts.⁴

¹ Of this distressing uncertainty, the case of Murdoch v Cheslie may be taken as an illustration, where the debtor appeared to be fully vested in the feudal right, and several creditors proceeded in completing their adjudications upon that idea; but a strict investigation having shown that there was an essential flaw in his title, other creditors took steps for forcing him to complete a proper title, and were preferred. 1766, M. 6923.

² [See 19 and 20 Vict. c. 91, sec. 6.]

³ Street v E. of Northesk, 1672, M. 248. See also Straiton

v Bell, 1676, 1679, M. 255. [Forman v Nicholson, 1832, 10 S. 365.]

⁴ The statute bears: 'That all apprizings, etc., BEFORE the first effectual appricing, or AFTER, but within year and day of the same, shall be brought in pari passu.' Lord Kames, in his Dictionary, states a case where an attempt was unsuccessfully made to limit the pari passu ranking, even as to prior adjudgers, to the term of a year and day. Forbes v Buchan, 1630, M. 265.

1. The year and day within which it is necessary for every adjudger to obtain his decree of adjudication, in order to entitle him to rank pari passu, begins to run, not from the moment of completion of the sasine, or of the diligence by which the first effectual adjudication is completed, but from the date of the decree of adjudication.¹

2. In computing the term, the year and day is to be reckoned, 'not by the number of days which go to make up a year, but by the return of the day of the next year that bears the same denomination.'² In general, it would seem that when a term is appointed [722] within which a thing must be done, the maxim, Dies inceptus pro completo habetur, is properly applicable to the commencing day of the term; and where, on the contrary, a term is appointed, beyond which things must have continued in a particular state, the maxim properly applies to the concluding day of the term. In the former case, it makes the term begin to run on the day following that upon which the act takes place; whereas in the latter the term begins instantly to run, and the commencement of the day after the completion of the term indicates the expiration of it. This distinction seems to be necessary, in order to give in either case the fair benefit of the assigned term.³

3. Of the Publication of the First Effectual, and of the Provisions for Lessening the Number and Expense of Adjudications.

To give full effect to the equalizing law, it is necessary that the first effectual adjudication should be published. This is done by means of the record of adjudications, and of the minute-book and rolls of the Court of Session, which are printed and distributed.

1. The recording of the abbreviates of adjudications is not required under the pain of nullity, and therefore there is no absolute security that the first adjudication shall be recorded.⁴ 1. Where infetment can be obtained without a charge to the superior, the adjudication may be the first effectual, without having been recorded; and it will be remembered that the year begins to run, not from the completing of the real right, but from the date of the decree. 2. An adjudger is entitled to the benefit of the pari passu preference, although his diligence has not entered the record. 3. The adjudication contra hæreditatem jacentem before the sheriff has regularly no abbreviate, and consequently is not null, though unregistered.⁵

See also Rickarton v C. of Traquair, 1678, M. 240, where the rule is correctly laid down: 'The Lords found the coming in of posterior apprizings pari passu with the first must be calculated year and day from the date of the first apprizing, and not from the date of the infetment.'

² Lady Bangour v Hamilton, 1681, M. 248. Here one adjudication was dated 30th July 1679, another 31st July 1680. The Lords found, 'That the year is not to be counted by the number of days, but by the return of the day of the same denomination of the next year; and therefore found that the creditor's adjudging being upon the 30th July 1679, and the lady's adjudication on the 31st July 1680, it was within year and day of the rest, and came in pari passu therewith.'

³ Sir G. M'Kenzie says that in this question, as in all others where a day is adjoined to a larger term, 'Dies inceptus pro completo habetur.' (Observ. 1 Parl. Charles II. c. 62.) If the meaning of this be that the expiration of the year excludes an adjudication from the pari passu ranking, so that, if dated on the day after the expiration of the year, the adjudication must be postponed, it may be observed that the only decision upon the point contradicts this; for in the above quoted case the first effectual was dated 30th July 1679, and the one in question on the 31st July 1680.

⁴ The statute 1661, c. 31, which first ordered the recording of the allowance of the apprizing, did not require it under the sanction of nullity. On the contrary, it was held: 1. That a comprizing, though not recorded, was still entitled to the benefit of the pari passu preference under the subsequent law, c. 62, of the same year. Stuart v Murray, 17 July 1668, M'Kenz. Observ. 2 Parl. Chas. II. c. 31. And, 2. That infetment fully supplied the want of the recording of the comprizing. M'Kenz. loc. cit.; Stair iii. 2. 25; Ersk. ii. 12. 26.

The statute 1672, c. 19, introducing adjudication, ordered the allowance to be registered in the same manner, 'and under the same certification, with the allowance of apprizings.'

And the 24th art. of the regulations 1695, appointing abbreviates instead of allowances, requires their registration 'conform to the Act of Parliament anent the recording of apprizings.'

⁵ King v Hunter, 1742, M. 5744.

2. But the publication of the proceedings in the Court of Session affords an additional security against the chance of the year and day expiring without notice. First, the printed rolls of court form a record of every action which comes into court. Secondly, A minute-book is kept by the clerks of court, in which all the important proceedings in every cause are daily entered; which book is also printed and distributed weekly, for the use of the practitioners, and forms another record easily consulted, in which an adjudication must appear. Thirdly, It was provided by the 33 Geo. III. c. 74, sec. 10, 'That the Lord Ordinary officiating in the Court of Session, before whom the first process of adjudication against any estate for payment or security of debt is called, shall ordain intimation thereof to be made in the minute-book and on the wall, in order that any other creditor of the common debtor, etc. may be conjoined in the decree of adjudication.' This was sanctioned by a declaration of absolute nullity if the intimation should be omitted; saving only the [723] validity and order of ranking of posterior adjudgers. But in 54 Geo. III. c. 137 an exception is very properly introduced, allowing the adjudication to be brought forward again in more unexceptionable form, or to be conjoined with any subsequent adjudication.¹ The publication of the first adjudication by this intimation in the minute-book and on the wall is a warning to the other creditors to secure to themselves the benefit of the equalizing law, by having their adjudications led within the year. But, at the same time, a great evil attends this arrangement. Every creditor takes the alarm, in consequence of the appearance of an adjudication; and by the accumulating expense of many adjudications, a debtor whose circumstances are in no degree desperate is plunged into irretrievable insolvency. How far the law has hitherto afforded a remedy for this evil, shall be inquired into hereafter: at present it may be sufficient to observe, that the irretrievable injury which may attend a notice of this sort makes the Court unwilling to authorize intimation, if a case can be made out by the debtor to bar the intimation. The rules are: 1. That where by a discharge, by instantly verifying a claim of retention or compensation, or in any other way instantly showing there are no grounds for adjudging, the order for intimation will be refused. But, 2. That where investigation and discussion are necessary, or where the adjudication is opposed only by a trust-deed, to which the adjudger has not acceded; or where, although the adjudger has acceded, the trust is neglected and inoperative, the intimation must proceed.²

It is a natural part of the provision for equalizing adjudications, that the publication of the first adjudication should be accompanied by some method of diminishing the number and lessening the expense of concurring adjudications. It has, with this view, been provided, that posterior adjudgers may be conjoined in the first adjudger's decree, instead of each leading a separate adjudication. By the statute of 1783,³ it was ordered, 1. That the Lord Ordinary, before whom any process of adjudication was called, should order intimation of it; and, 2. That after a reasonable time for creditors to come in, decree should be pronounced, in which any creditor ready to adjudge might insist to be conjoined.⁴ By the Act

² D. of Queensberry's Exrs. v Tait, 11 July 1817, Fac. Coll. 375. Here the Court held, 1. That where investigation and discussion are necessary, intimation must proceed. 2. That where a right of retention is instantly established, warrant for intimation ought not to be granted.

³ 23 Geo. III. c. 18.

⁴ 22 Geo. III. c. 18, sec. 5. The object of the Legislature passed in 1793, the law was considerably altered in two essential points: 1. Intimation [724] was made necessary only in the first adjudication; and, 2. It was required, that a creditor applying to be conjoined, should not only have his grounds of debt ready for adjudging, but that he should also have his summons of adjudication, libelled and signeted. But it was left ambiguous whether conjunction was to be allowed in any other adjudication than the first.¹

Although, under this statute, there certainly was no authority for conjoining, with posterior adjudications, creditors producing summonses of adjudication, with the grounds thereof; yet as the spirit and intention of the law was to lessen, by means of conjunctions, the number of separate diligences, the practice, which began under the old statute, was continued under the new one, of conjoining creditors, whether the adjudication in dependence was a first or a posterior one. Upon the words of the statute objections were taken, in several rankings, to the claims of creditors thus adjudging by conjunction with posterior adjudications; and the Court held such adjudications to be ineffectual.² This judgment was unavoidable, under the imperative words of the Act. It appeared to be expedient, that, in reviving this law, conjunction ought to have been permitted with posterior as well as with first adjudications; but the statute has not in this respect been altered, though it is not obvious what possible harm could have resulted from following out thus far the true principle of the doctrine.

It was questioned under the Act 33 of the king, whether the first adjudication, having been ordered to be intimated, and another creditor having in the meantime adjudged, this last, if good at all, was not properly the first adjudication in the sense of the law. It was held that this adjudication was not ineffectual, but that the other still continued to be the first, with which, in terms of the Act, other creditors were to be conjoined.³

Nullities, in the first effectual adjudication, may be fatal to it, considered as the criterion of the pari passu preference. But where a creditor comes forward under the late statute, in consequence of the first adjudger's intimation, and is conjoined in the decree, he cannot be hurt by any defect in the first adjudger's diligence. The completion of the combined decree, by a charge against superiors, will make any one of the conjoined adjudications in this enactment seems to have been, that every adjudication brought into Court should be intimated (where there was no danger from delay, and of which the Lord Ordinary was to judge), that each might in its turn be the means of contributing to the general design of lessening the number of separate diligences. But the practice under this statute was extremely loose, and gave occasion to several questions. The intimation in posterior adjudications was generally omitted; and when the counsel came to the bar, and stated that 'this was a posterior adjudication,' the Lord Ordinary pronounced decree of adjudication at once, without ordering intimation. But as the appearance of an adjudication in the weekly rolls was a kind of intimation, other creditors frequently came to the bar, with their grounds of debt prepared, and were conjoined with the adjudger at the first calling of the cause, and where no intimation had been made. In the Banking of Redcastle, objections were taken to both these practices. Several adjudications within year and day of the first had been led without any intimation, and with some of them were conjoined creditors who had produced their grounds of debt at the bar. Three points were questioned: 1. Whether the want of intimation in the posterior adjudication was not a nullity under the statute? 2. Whether the conjoined creditors were to be considered as having legally adjudged? And, 3. Whether some relief was not to be afforded to postponed creditors, who, if intimation of each adjudication had been made, would have been apprised of the necessity and opportunity of producing their grounds of debt? These questions were very fully discussed. On the first of them, the Court found the want of intimation no good objection to the posterior adjudications; and that the Lord Ordinary, having power to dispense, must in all cases be supposed to have virtually dispensed with the form. On the second question, the objecting creditors endeavoured to show that the great view of the Legislature in appointing intimation was, that the intimation might supply the place of citations, etc. by the creditors who should apply to be conjoined; and that no conjunction could therefore be lawful which was not preceded by intimation. But this view of the matter the Court did not regard. They held the conjunction by the Lord Ordinary, under the powers given him in the statute, to be effectual as an adjudication to the creditors who were conjoined. And as to the third point, the Court had no difficulty in deciding that no relief was to be given, since these creditors ought to have come in before. De Roveray and others v Mackenzie and others, 1793, Bell's Ca. 404.

an effectual diligence, though all the rest that are conjoined with it should be null. To give any other interpretation to the statute, would not only defeat the very object of the Legislature, since no creditor would risk his debt upon the diligence of another; but it [725] would have the further effect of converting the second adjudication into the first, and subjecting it to a fatal objection, as not being intimated in terms of the statute.

The legislative provisions for promoting equality among adjudgers have been aided by the equitable facilities given to posterior creditors by the Court of Session. But although the establishment of equality is an object of much favour, the term allowed for creditors to come in is very long; while ample provision is made for intimating the first adjudication to the public. The Court, therefore, in giving every proper aid to posterior adjudgers, in order to bring them within the term, have regulated themselves in all such questions by the rules of a sound discretion. The following points may be stated:—

1. In the action of CONSTITUTION, the Court has interfered, to dispense with the ordinary term for the debtor's appearance in Court; to prevent the debtor from delaying the decree, by the discussion of his defences; and to dispense with the usual intimations subsequent to decree.—1. It is essential to the very existence of an action, and the validity of any order or decree to be pronounced by the judge, that proper intimation should be given to the defender to appear in court. The judges have never held themselves entitled to dispense with this essential part of the action, nor conceived that any decree pronounced where this was omitted could be legal or effectual. But there are cases in which equity has permitted the Court to dispense with a part of this form. Thus the second diet of appearance was dispensed with in a case where the debt against the ancestor of the defender was constituted by writing, and where the defender, having given in a written renunciation to be heir, decree cognitionis causa was pronounced.¹ 2. The Court pronounces decree where delay is hazardous, reserving to the defender the full effect of all his defences, as objections contra executionem.² 3. By Act of Sederunt 20th January 1671, it is provided, 'That no act or decree done either in the Inner or Outer House shall be extracted until twenty-four hours elapse after the same is read in the minute-book.' It may sometimes be of importance to dispense with the reading in the minute-book, especially as the Act of Sederunt 5th June 1725 appoints the reading of the minute-book to begin on the sixth sederunt or court day of each session; and the Court, in particular cases, grant dispensations permitting the decree to be instantly extracted. Such dispensation seems justifiable in all cases where the decree is merely for constitution of a debt, on the same principle on which the Court reserves the consideration of defences.³

2. In the ADJUDICATION itself, the Court also interferes to abridge the unessential forms. 1. The Court interfered to dispense with the second diet of compareance in a posterior [726] adjudication.⁴ Now, by 50 Geo. III. c. 112, sec. 27, there is only one diet where the

² Sir John Sinclair v Sinclair, 1792, Bell Oct. Ca. 1. [Bontine v Graham, 1829, 8 S. 87 and 263; Cowan, 1832, 11 S. 130; Meiklam v Glassford, 1851, 13 D. 803.]

At the same time, it should be observed that the judges were much moved by the consideration that here the only person interested in the judgment had renounced, and that no one could have appeared to bring it under review.

⁴ Hamilton v Blackwood, 1761, M. 6864. This was decided on the principle that, the debt being established by writing (which must always, of course, be the case in adjudications), and the benefit of the alternative of a special adjudication, which alone could have required a proof, being forfeited to defender is in Scotland. 2. The defences against adjudication are reserved to be stated as objections wherever prejudice can arise from delay; and this even in a first adjudication.¹ The privilege of the special alternative cannot be reserved; and the debtor has been thought entitled to take a day for producing his titles in a first adjudication, even where the adjudication was by a creditor of the ancestor, and where there was danger of losing the preference of the Act 1661.² But this seems to deserve consideration; for although it is seldom that there can be any interest for hastening on a FIRST adjudication, it may by possibility happen; as where the adjudger is a creditor of the ancestor, and the three years of preference are nearly expired. But the privilege of demanding the alternative is forfeited by having already allowed a general adjudication to pass.

II.—PARI PASSU PREFERENCE WHERE THE DEBTOR IS DEAD.

The doctrine of equality among adjudgers, as applicable to the case of an adjudication after the death of the debtor, will not require much explanation.

1. Where the creditors of the deceased debtor alone are in the field, some of them having adjudged during his life, and others not till after his death, the adjudications against the heir, for the ancestor's debt, or proceeding upon his renunciation of the succession, are entitled, if within year and day of the first effectual adjudication against the ancestor, to be placed on an equal footing with that adjudication.³

2. But the heir may refuse to answer the charge to enter till the expiration of the annus deliberandi; and so, where creditors have adjudged during the ancestor's life, the term of the pari passu preference may expire, before posterior adjudgers can obtain their decrees, and get the benefit of the equalizing rule. The remedy is an equitable one. The Court will allow those adjudications to proceed as if the heirs had renounced.⁴

III.—PREFERENCE OF ADJUDICATIONS AFTER YEAR AND DAY.

1. The statutes already commented on, confer on all comprizings and adjudications within year and day of the first effectual, the same right 'as if one comprizing had been deduced and obtained for the whole respective sums contained in the foresaid comprizings.' But adjudications which are subsequent to that term derive no aid from those statutes, and must therefore be completed as if no rule to this effect had been introduced. Hence arose a question, Whether, after a year from an adjudication made effectual by sasine, it was necessary to complete new adjudications by sasine? This, again, was held to depend on the question, Whether there remained with the debtor, after adjudications completed by sasine, anything more than a personal estate of reversion? And at the time when the question occurred, adjudications having been regarded as sales under reversion, the Court held, that without sasine an adjudication subsequent to the year was good to carry the the debtor by his having allowed a first adjudication to pass against him, it was not an action which required, according to the old rule, a second diet. See Pedie's case below, note 2.

² Pedie, petitioner, 1776, M. App. Process, No. 2. This case did not present the point pure for decision, for the induciae had not expired. They expired on 11th January, which being within the Christmas recess, and the three years expiring three days after, a petition was presented to the Court, praying a warrant to a Lord Ordinary to decern in the adjudication, without allowing the defenders to take a day to produce. This petition was refused.

³ Sinclair v E. of Caithness, 1781, M. 268.

⁴ This difficulty was stated in the above case, and thus answered: 'Such an inconvenience and injustice might be rectified by allowing the diligence of the other creditors to proceed within the year, in the same manner as when the heir, in favour of particular creditors, has renounced the benefit of the annus deliberandi.' Ersk. iii. 8. 55. And the reporter adds this note to the case: 'N.B.—All the judges who spoke declared their opinion, that a creditor in danger of losing his preference by the death of his debtor, after an effectual adjudication had been led by another creditor, would obtain relief in the way suggested by the respondents.'

personal right.¹ It may be fairly questioned, now that a different view of adjudication has been adopted (namely, that for which Lord Kilkerran and the minority in that case argued²), whether the rule would not now be reversed. Mr. Erskine's doctrine (Ersk. ii. 12. 28 and 33) proceeds on the same principle which guided the Court in the case quoted below; and it was not till long after his time that the doctrine was abandoned, and an adjudication held to be a pignus prætorium.³

2. The old rule holds, that preference is according to priority in all adjudications beyond the year and day from the date of the first effectual decree.

SUBSECTION II.—PREFERENCES AMONG ADJUDGING CREDITORS OF DIFFERENT CLASSES; VIZ. OF THE ANCESTOR AND OF THE HEIR.

The ordinary rules of preference among adjudgers will not regulate every case of competition. Where the adjudging creditors of the ancestor, to whom the estate formerly belonged, come into competition with those of the heir, the former are in justice entitled to a preference, on the principle that every man's estate should be liable in the first place to his own debts. This principle has been admitted to control the pari passu preference of adjudications, as established in ordinary cases, but with such modifications as have seemed to the Legislature necessary for doing justice also to the creditors of the heir. And perhaps this is the fittest occasion on which to enter upon a commentary on the statute by which the relative rights of the creditor of the ancestor and of those of the heir are settled.

COMMENTARY ON THE STATUTE CONFERRING A PREFERENCE ON THE ANCESTOR'S CREDITORS.

The estate of which a man is possessed, and which he has an uncontrolled power to alienate to his creditors, or to make the subject of securities to them, naturally becomes a source of credit on which he may obtain money or goods. Such credit is readily given by dealers and money-lenders, without taking specific security over the estate or effects, and [728] trusting only to that right of attaching the property which they know can at any time be exercised for their payment. This right of attachment ought not at once to cease on the death of the debtor. If his heir is unwilling to undertake the debts, he ought to leave the property untouched for the creditors; if he take up the succession, he should reckon on being liable for the debt which belongs to it. And the creditors of the heir can in justice take no better right than he himself has, that is to say, the reversion of the ancestor's estate, after his debts are paid. This is so natural a consequence of the credit acquired in reliance on the uncontrolled power of a proprietor, that it has found admission into every system of jurisprudence, where no peculiar territorial policy has interfered with it. The principles of the feudal law opposed it while that system was in its strength; for they admitted not of a free exercise of the power of alienation or of execution against land. And in some countries this effect of the feudal system remains after the rest of the structure is gone. In ENGLAND this has been the case. The heir in the real estate is freed from simple contract debts, on the feudal principle that he takes the land not from the ancestor, but under the original feudal contract: that the executor alone, therefore, is answerable, so far as he has assets; but the heir not at all, in respect of the lands descended. And reported the cause to the Inner House), 'that nothing was left with the common debtor but a personal reversion.'

² Campbell v Scotland & Jack, 1794, M. 821, Bell's Ca. 11; Buchanan v Purdon Grey, 10 July 1809.

although the introduction of the power of alienation made some invasion on this doctrine, still the distinction has been kept up, that the assets in the executor's hands are liable universally. Those in the hands of the heir are answerable only to debts of record, in respect of the lien created by the judgment on the lands themselves, or to debts by specialty in which the heir is named; while simple contract debts do not bind the heir. It is to be regretted that the exertions of the late Sir Samuel Romilly, who devoted much of his attention to the improvement of the law, had before his death made so little progress in dispelling the prejudices which guarded this ancient error. In SCOTLAND, while the feudal forms are maintained in their simplicity and purity as a system of mere conveyancing, these absurd effects of it have been entirely dismissed.

But the HEIR, in his turn, acquires credit in reliance on the lands and effects to which he succeeds, whether his titles and possession be completed, or he be seen as apparent heir to possess for a course of time in undisturbed tranquillity.¹ It is just, therefore, to his creditors, that the preference should not be continued in point of time to the creditors of the ancestor without limitation.

Out of these two opposite views has resulted in Scotland a system of rules for regulating the preference of the creditors of the ancestor in competition with those of the heir. The law, as it has been established in Scotland, has been moulded on the prætorian doctrine of the Roman law, which permitted to the creditors of the ancestor the privilege of demanding a SEPARATIO of his estate from the estate of the heir, provided it was done within five years after the death.² The first statute in Scotland relative to this matter was passed in the middle of the seventeenth century, 1661, c. 24; and was intended to regulate, in respect to the real or heritable estate, the competition of diligences raised by the creditors of the ancestor, where they came to clash with those raised by the creditors of the heir; or to guard the ancestor's creditors from the danger of being excluded by the heir's voluntary conveyance to his own creditors. Towards the close of that century, also, a remedy on the same principle was applied in relation to the moveable succession. It had first been [729] administered by the Court of Session in decisions and Acts of Sederunt, proceeding on grounds of equity. Afterwards a law was passed by the Legislature, in which the term of indulgence to the creditors of the ancestor was very justly limited to a much shorter period than in the case of the real estate.³

The statute relative to heritage, after a preamble, 'That appearand heirs, immediately after their predecessor's death, do frequently dispoise their estate, in whole or in part, in prejudice of their predecessor's lawful creditors, before their death come to their knowledge, or before they can do lawful diligence against the said appearand heirs; and which dispositions the saids appearand heirs do often make before they be served heirs and infet; or otherwise by collusion they suffer their predecessor's estates to be comprized or adjudged from them for payment of their own proper debts, real or simulate, without respect to their predecessor's creditors; and how just it is that every man's own estate should be first liable to his own debt, before the debts contracted by the appearand heirs,' proceeds, 1. To 'declare that the creditors of the defunct shall be preferred to the creditors of the appearand heir in time coming as to the defunct's estate: Providing alwayes, that the defunct's creditors do diligence against the appearand heir, and the real estate belonging to the defunct, within the space of three years after the defunct's death.' 2. The Act further proceeds on a preamble, that 'it were most unreasonable that the appearand heir, when he is served and retoured allowed for the preference of ancestor's creditors in the statute now to be considered.

² See Dig. de Separationibus, lib. 42, tit. 6; Voet, h. t. vol. ii. p. 811, sec. 2.

³ See a commentary on this law under Preferences on the Moveable Estate, vol. ii.

heir, and infest respective, should for the full space of three years be bound up from making rights and alienations of his predecessor's estate; and yet it being as unreasonable that he should dispoise thereupon immediately or shortly after his predecessor's death, in prejudice of his predecessor's creditors, he having year and day to advise whether he will enter heir or not; therefore it is hereby declared, that no right or disposition made by the said appearand heir, in so far as may prejudice his predecessor's creditors, shall be valid, unless it be made and granted a full year after the defunct's death.'

In commenting on this statute, these two provisions may be explained in their order :
 1. The provisions for enabling the creditors of the ancestor, as adjudgers of his estate, to secure to themselves a preference over the adjudging creditors of the apparent heir; and,
 2. The provisions for preventing the heir from interfering, by voluntary conveyance or deed, with the just rights of his ancestor's creditors.

1. Competition of Diligence by Creditors of the Ancestor and of the Heir.

Supposing the rights of the respective creditors to be left undisturbed by any attempt of the heir to confer on his own creditors preferences by voluntary conveyance, it is requisite on the part of the ancestor's creditors, if they mean to claim preference over those of the heir, that they shall do diligence against the apparent heir, and the real estate belonging to the defunct, within the space of three years after the defunct's death.

This law applies only to the heritable or real estate. The preamble speaks of comprizing and adjudication; the enacting clause, of the appearand heir and real estate. But in the real or heritable estate is comprehended not only land and houses, but all heritage descending to the heir or requiring adjudication, and whether the subject be heritable by mere destination or sua natura.¹ The Court of Session, says Lord Kames, extended the [730] principle of this Act to moveables, and so 'completed the remedy,' which he holds the Court as a court of equity well authorized to do.² But in the cases to which he refers there seems to have been no intention on the part of the Court thus to extend the law or complete the remedy; and all our lawyers agree in reprobating Forbes, the reporter of one of the cases referred to by Lord Kames, for so representing the case.³ The moveable estate is regulated by other statutes already alluded to, of which hereafter.

The Act, in speaking of apparent heirs as those whose creditors are to be postponed to the creditors of the ancestor, is not to be held as confining the remedy strictly to the case where the heir is still in apparenecy. The Act itself shows that the term 'apparent heir' is not meant to be applied to the exclusion of an heir served and retoured, while the principle of the remedy applies equally to a case in which the heir has completed his titles, as to the case of a mere apparent heir. The Act seems equally to include the case of an heir succeeding by the settlement or disposition of the ancestor.⁴ But where the heir is infest during his predecessor's life, the Act has been held not to apply.⁵

One great difficulty in the construction of this part of the Act is to settle what diligence is requisite. The words of the Act are very vague: Provided always, 'that the defunct's creditors do diligence against the appearand heir, and the real estate belonging to the defunct, within the space of three years after the defunct's death.' In the construction of these words, it is to be observed, 1. That there is no express requisition that the diligence shall be completed. 2. That it seems a fair construction of the Act, that merely to commence diligence should not be held a due compliance with the condition; otherwise, instead of a space of three years, during which the heir's creditors should be barred from effectually attaching the estate, nothing short of the long prescription would have limited the privilege, which certainly was not the meaning of the Legislature.¹ But, 3. This construction of the Act seems to admit of limitation, in so far as the operations of the ancestor's creditors are barred either by the act of the heir, or the prohibition of the law itself. This leads to a question of very considerable practical importance.

¹ M'Kay v M'Kay's Reps., 1783, M. 3137. Here the Court 'were clearly of opinion that the statute 1661 applies to heritable subjects indiscriminately, whether they be such destinatione or sua natura.'

1. The creditors of the ancestor are not held, by acceptance of bills or bonds of corroboration from the heir, to renounce this privilege as against the creditors of the heir.² But neither would this probably be held as fulfilling the requisite of the Act, which is to vindicate the privilege by diligence done within three years.

2. It seems to be settled, that where there has been no obstruction or impediment to the diligence, it must be rendered complete; and that, to make it so, the adjudication must be followed by infeftment, or by a charge within the three years.³ Inhibition would perhaps be held complete diligence in the sense of the Act.⁴

3. It may often happen, without any fault or undue delay on the part of the [731] ancestor's creditors, that unless they are enabled to proceed with greater rapidity than the ordinary course of the law allows, they cannot get the diligence completed within the term. In such cases the creditor will be allowed to urge forward his diligence without the impediment of discussing his debt in the action of constitution, or abiding all the forms of the ordinary process; and such objections as may lie against his debt will, on the principle already explained, be reserved contra executionem. Among the delays which would thus be dispensed with, the Court would probably allow a first adjudication to proceed, without abiding the expiration of the term of intimation.⁵

4. But it may happen that, by vacations of the Court, it may be impracticable to have the debt constituted in the Court of Session, and the diligence completed in due time.⁶ And where it is so, without any undue delay previously, or any fault imputable to the ancestor's creditor, it is a very serious question, Whether the construction to be put upon the Act shall be so strict, that the ancestor's creditors, without fault of theirs, shall suffer a loss of their preference? This would be a harsh effect, scarcely to be inferred by mere construction, where the words do not unequivocally import as much, which the spirit of the law so clearly applies with favour to the creditor. A creditor of the ancestor, for example, intending to do diligence, is stopped during the annus deliberandi from proceeding with his adjudication; and in the progress of his proceedings the heir dies, and the proceedings

¹ Stair ii. 12. 29. 'Albeit the being complete be not expressed in the statute, yet by the design thereof it must be so understood; for if diligences inchoated in these three years, though perfected thereafter, would be sufficient, the preference would not be for three years, but might come to be for forty years.'

² Ranking of the Crs. of Cult, 1781, M. 3137.

⁴ [In Menzies v Murdoch, 1841, 4 D. 257, it was held that inhibition is not diligence in the sense of the statute 1661, c. 24, and does not, though used against the heir by a creditor of the ancestor within three years after his death, create any preference in favour of the inhibitor over those creditors of the heir whose debts were contracted prior to the inhibition.]

⁵ See above, Of Adjudication, p. 762.

⁶ In such cases it may be possible, in the inferior jurisdictions, or in Admiralty if the debts be mercantile, to get decree of constitution more quickly than in the Court of Session. Even the adjudication itself may be led contra hæreditatem jacentem before the sheriff. Marshall's Crs. v Pencaitland, 1709, M. 47; Graham's Crs. v Hyslop, 1753, Elchies, Adjud. No. 45. But not only is that not a method likely to be attainable in such competitions, since it is necessary to adjudications contra hæreditatem jacentem that the heir should have renounced the succession; but it is also to be observed that an entry cannot be forced on that sort of adjudication. Murdoch King v Hunter, 1742, M. 5744.

It also would appear that such adjudication, if the first, could not now proceed before the sheriff, since the Act of Parliament requires intimation in the first adjudication, and there is no intimation possible before the sheriff.

must be revived. It seems not consistent with the spirit of the Act, that this should forfeit to the creditor his preference as a creditor of the ancestor. Accordingly, to a certain extent, indulgence has been given. Whether the creditor is obstructed by the heir himself, or by the creditors of the heir, in those proceedings which he is carrying on in compliance with the Act; or where there has been a surcease of justice (an evil not belonging to these times, though not unfrequent in the confusions of our early history), the benefit of the preference is not lost.¹ The conclusion to which this would seem to lead is, that unless the creditor were chargeable with MORA, as in other cases of competition, he should not be held to forfeit the benefit of his preference. And mora never is chargeable in diligence, where the creditor has used all due exertion which circumstances or judicial rules permit. On this principle a decision of the Court of Session seems questionable, where it was held absolutely, as reported by Lord Stair, that 'the diligence upon the defunct's debt could not be preferred to a prior diligence on the apparent heir's bond, unless the diligence on the defunct's debt were within three years of the defunct's death, and that no impediment could continue the three years.' And again, as reported by Lord Fountainhall, that 'the Act is not [732] to be understood of anni UTILES, but CONTINUI.'² In a case fit for raising the question, the Court would probably hold themselves bound to consider whether the impediment were not such as to entitle the diligence of the creditor to the character of due diligence used within the three years.

Entry cum beneficio inventarii is not to be held as diligence for the benefit of the ancestor's creditors.³

5. The chief difficulty arises from the laws intended to abridge the expensive proceedings of creditors adjudging, and to introduce an economical and effectual system of sale and distribution in cases of insolvency. It will be recollected that in 1661, when the ancestor's creditors were required to do diligence within three years, in order to preserve their preference over the creditors of the heir, there was not only no general process of judicial sale or sequestration for selling and dividing the estate among the creditors, but the law of pari passu preference was not yet introduced; and on the introduction of those several remedies to the existing evils of distracted and expensive proceedings by creditors, the rules of preference or ranking (which by this time were established) were expressly saved. It is of importance, then, to observe how the policy of those several laws may best be preserved in the administration of justice under them.

First, In regard to the PARI PASSU PREFERENCE, the ancestor's estate being open to both classes of creditors, the creditors of the ancestor being entitled to charge the heir to enter and make up a title, and so to adjudge on an actual or presumed compliance, and those of the heir to charge him to enter and take up the succession for the benefit; both sets of creditors may be proceeding at the same time. It never has been doubted that the laws of pari passu preference were intended to apply to such a case, and to prevent the necessity of more than one creditor proceeding to complete his adjudication, as first effectual, for the benefit of all the rest. But several cases require to be distinguished. And—

(1.) The first effectual adjudication by a creditor of the ancestor, will entitle all the other creditors of the ancestor to the benefit of the pari passu preference, without the necessity of their severally completing their adjudications. But it will not follow, that the first effectual being thus completed within the three years, it will have the effect of bringing under the privilege of the Act 1661 those whose adjudications, though led within year and

² Paterson v Bruce, 1678, M. 3126-7. In this case the impediment pleaded by the ancestor's creditor was merely that his debt was future. But that was truly no impediment, since he might have done diligence in security. The doubt, therefore, which seems to arise on the construction of the Act, extends not to the decision of that particular case, but to the gratuitous decision of a point not necessarily included, that not only this, but no impediment, can continue the three years.

day of it, are not led till after the three years have expired. On the contrary, in such a case, the ancestor's creditor who had adjudged within the three years would enjoy his preference; the other creditors of the ancestor adjudging within year and day, but beyond the three years, would have nothing but the pari passu preference along with the other adjudgers of both classes adjudging within year and day.¹

(2.) If, on the other hand, the first effectual adjudication be led by a creditor of the heir, it seems to be sufficient compliance with the Act 1661 that a creditor of the ancestor shall have adjudged within year and day, so as to take the benefit of the completion of the first effectual, provided his adjudication be also within the three years. If the heir have completed his titles by infestment in his ancestor's estate, the creditors of both classes [733] adjudge from him; and the first adjudication, whether by a creditor of the one class or of the other, will be the first effectual to both. If, instead of having completed his titles, the heir is still in apparency, the creditors of the ancestor as well as his own must proceed to adjudge by means of a charge to enter heir; and if the heir enter, the adjudication must of course proceed as in the case already mentioned; while, if he should neither enter nor renounce, but allow the statutory presumption to take place, the adjudication proceeding on the charge will serve as the first effectual to both classes of creditors. That adjudication by a creditor of the heir must be available to the creditors of the ancestor, so as to make it unnecessary for them to complete their diligence separately, cannot be doubted, where the three years have expired, and all distinction between the creditors of the ancestor and those of the heir has vanished; and there seems to be no ground for admitting any other rule where the three years have not expired.

Secondly, In the case of a JUDICIAL SALE or SEQUESTRATION, it should seem on the same principles that the requisites of the Act 1661 are sufficiently complied with by the creditors of the ancestor, provided they claim their preference within the three years, the ancestor's estate being duly carried by the sequestration, or included in the sale.

(1.) A JUDICIAL SALE, whether at the instance of a creditor, or at the instance of an apparent heir, is declared to be equivalent to an adjudication as of the date of the first deliverance, for all the creditors who shall afterwards be included in the decree of division, and no adjudications are allowed to proceed during the dependence of a judicial sale.² When such action of judicial sale has been commenced, whether by the apparent heir, or by a creditor of the ancestor, or by a creditor of the heir himself charging him to enter, it is competent for every other creditor, both of the ancestor and of the heir, to appear and claim a share in the division; and every creditor of either class is forbid to adjudge. It cannot be doubted that it is quite sufficient to preserve the preference to a creditor of the ancestor, if he should enter his claim in the ranking and sale within the three years; and that his diligence will in the sense of the Act of Parliament be held complete.

(2.) Much more ought this to be held where a SEQUESTRATION under the 54 Geo. III. has been awarded, and the estate of the ancestor has been adjudged or conveyed to the trustee. This is the most complete of all diligence, and supersedes and bars every other,³ whether awarded on the application of the heir himself, or of a creditor of the ancestor, or of a creditor of the heir. It should be observed, however, that it is necessary, in order to give effect to the sequestration as an adjudication of the ancestor's estate, that, in confirming the trustee, that estate should be specially adjudged or conveyed in terms of the 29th and 30th sections of the Act; and that such adjudication has by the 42d section preference over every other led or made effectual subsequent to the date of the first deliverance. The creditors of the ancestor entering their claims in such a sequestration within the three years as preferable creditors, have their preference completely preserved to them. The doctrine now laid down was at one time held doubtful,¹ but may now be considered as settled;² and [734] the creditors of the ancestor, provided the trustee has been confirmed, and provided they shall lodge their claims within the three years, are entitled to the full privilege of the Act 1661, c. 24. Many difficulties had suggested themselves as the inevitable consequence of the principle adopted in the first of the cases quoted below,—namely, that the preference given by the statute 1661, c. 24, rests on the ground of a separatio of the estates of the ancestor and of the heir as in the Roman law, instead of holding it to be a mere privilege. But the principle which ruled the last of these cases went to remove those difficulties; to prevent the possibility of the ancestor's creditors, or any part of them, starting aside in the course of a sequestration to adjudge the ancestor's estate as separate; and to secure the fair course of administration, and the operation of the true spirit of those laws, which have been so wisely made for restraining the diligence of individual creditors, and introducing pari passu preference.

¹ The practical solution of this difficulty is more proper for consideration afterwards. It will proceed thus :—All the adjudgers, including the first effectual, will be ranked in the first place pari passu; and by a subsequent operation of arithmetic, there will be deducted rateably from each adjudger, after the first effectual, what is required to make up to him full payment of his debt in virtue of his preference under the Act 1661.

² 54 Geo. III. c. 137, sec. 10.

2. Inefficacy of the Heir's Voluntary Conveyance to defeat the Creditors of the Ancestor.

The second part of the Act is directed against the attempts of the heir to disappoint the creditors of the ancestor, by granting voluntary dispositions to their prejudice.

In commenting on this part of the Act, it is proper to recollect, 1. That the heir has the privilege of deliberating for a year whether he will enter as heir, during which time no adjudication is available against him, or against the estate; 2. That the heir may notwithstanding enter to the estate, and complete his right by infestment, immediately after his predecessor's death; and, 3. That the creditors of the ancestor at common law had no remedy but by inhibition to prevent the heir from conveying away the estate to their prejudice. It seems to have occurred to the Legislature, that a remedy was requisite for the protection of the creditors of the ancestor, who might be ignorant of their debtor's death, and could not therefore use inhibition; but that, in justice to those who might deal with the heir, entered or not entered, this implied inhibition should not continue longer

¹ Bennet, Tr. for Crawford's Crs., v his Father's Crs. adjudging, 25 May 1820. On 1st February 1816 the estate of James Crawford was sequestrated. He was feudally infest as heir of his father, John Crawford, in an heritable debt due by Blair of Blair. The trustee got from the bankrupt on the 30th March a general disposition, which he completed by adjudication in implement and charge against the superior, Blair. The father, John Crawford, was owing large debts, and died 3d August 1813. Subsequently to the sequestration and title in the person of the trustee, those creditors of the ancestor raised constitutions, and adjudged within three years of the ancestor's death. The trustee in the sequestration of the son's estate opposed these adjudications as incompetent subsequent to sequestration. Decree of adjudication was pronounced, reserving all objections contra executionem, and the adjudications were completed on 2d August 1816. The debtor in the heritable bond raised an action of multiplicity. Lord Alloway preferred the creditors of the father adjudging, and the Court adhered, holding the effect of the Act 1661 to be to separate the two estates, and reserve the ancestor's for the diligence of his own creditors.

² M'Lachlan v Bennet, 1826, Fac. Coll., 4 S. 712, N. E.

717; aff. 3 W. and S. 449. This question arose in the same competition of John and James Crawford's creditors. Besides the subjects in which adjudication had, as in the above case, been completed within the three years, there were other estates of John Crawford to which no title had been made up. They were included in the sequestration of James Crawford, and the trustee was confirmed with a general adjudication only. Creditors of the ancestor, John, proceeded to adjudge; but the summons having been taken out to see by the trustee, the diligence was not completed till after the expiration of the three years. But claims by the ancestor's creditors were lodged in the sequestration within the three years, and a preference was demanded under the Act 1661. The Court held, that the Bankrupt Acts have the effect of making the trustee in the sequestration the sole and exclusive organ of diligence for completely attaching the estate for both sets of creditors, and with full reservation to each of all their privileges; and that in this case the general adjudication in his favour was sufficient in the competition to bestow on all the creditors of the ancestor, who had lodged their claims within the three years, the privilege of the Act 1661.

than the prohibition to adjudge should as a privilege to the heir endure. It was on this view of the matter that the second provision of the Act 1661, c. 24, seems to have been framed, relative to voluntary deeds by the heir.

The preamble of this part of the Act has in contemplation, as the evil to be remedied, those conveyances frequently made by heirs in prejudice of the ancestor's creditors, before the ancestor's death is known, whether made during apparenacy, or after the title as heir is completed by sasine. And the enacting words are, 'That no right or disposition made by the said apparent heir, in so far as may prejudice his predecessor's creditors, shall [735] be valid, unless it be made and granted a full year after the defunct's death.

1. The prohibition in this Act extends to all conveyances or securities whatever; as, a sale for a full price, or an heritable bond for money lent to the heir; and not merely to such deeds as are granted in favour of the creditors of the heir. The title of the Act, 'Concerning apparent heirs, their payment of their predecessor's and their own debts,' seems indeed to indicate an intention only to exclude voluntary deeds in favour of the heir's creditors; and with this seems to accord that part of the preamble which declares the great principle of the Act to be a consideration, 'how just it is that every man's own estate should be first liable to his own debt before the debts contracted by the apparent heir.' Our authorities also, in speaking of this Act, say that the only view of the Legislature was to favour the creditors of the ancestor before those of the heir.¹ But while this remedy would be very imperfect in preserving to the creditors of the ancestor the estate on which their credit may have rested, if it did not act as a prohibition of all conveyances whatever, since an heir willing to disappoint his predecessor's creditors would only need to sell or borrow money on the land, and distribute the price or loan among his creditors, the enacting words are perfectly general, and apply without qualification to such a case. Accordingly, not only is there a recorded opinion of the Court, delivered recently after the Act, very strongly inferring that a disposition to a stranger for onerous cause is objectionable within the year, since the Court there held that a conveyance to the heir's creditors is bad, though beyond the year;² but the question has been frequently determined, and sales made by heirs reduced at the instance of the creditors of the ancestor.³ The effect of this prohibition in the statute is similar to that of the diligence of inhibition. The conveyance is not void, but only not valid 'in so far as may prejudice the predecessor's creditors.' Therefore, 1. If the price were a fair and full price, and unpaid, there seems to be no doubt that the sale would stand, the ancestor's creditors having right to their payment out of the price. 2. If the price were inadequate, or, being inadequate, if it had been paid over to the heir, the ancestor's creditors would be entitled to insist either for a new sale of the lands, or that, to the extent of their debts, the purchaser shall make up the price, or pay a second time.

² Harcarse (2 Br. Sup. 93) says: 'The defunct's creditors doing diligence within three years are preferable, even where the heir disposes after the year; otherwise the heir's creditors would have more advantage by a voluntary disposition than they could have by legal diligence, which were absurd.'

an action was brought by Taylor's representatives against Lord Braco, as Duff of Dipple's representative, for reduction of the right to the lands on the Act 1661, c. 24. The defence was grounded on the want of diligence within the three years. But the Court held that, though this would be a good defence against creditors if the disposition were after the year, it is no defence at all where the disposition is granted within the year, the creditors being entitled to plead the statutory nullity though they have done no diligence; and they found the reason of reduction relevant and proven.

Mags. of Ayr v M'Adam, 1780, M. 3135. Here Campbell, proprietor of a land estate, died indebted to the town of Ayr. His son made up titles and sold the lands within the year; and more than three years afterwards the Magistrates of Ayr brought a reduction against M'Adam, the purchaser, for setting aside the sale on the statute. The Lords reduced the sale.

2. To give to the creditors of the ancestor, where there is no competition with those of the heir, a right to avail themselves of the objection to the deed, it is not necessary that [736] they shall have done diligence within the three years. The inhibition of the Act has been held available against the purchaser, first, where the creditors have done no diligence by adjudication or otherwise; and secondly, where the challenge has not been made till after the expiration of the three years.¹ But,

3. Where there is a competition between the creditors of the ancestor and those of the heir, and the ancestor's creditors have not done diligence within the three years, it may be questioned whether the ancestor's creditors can reduce a conveyance granted within the year, to the effect of having their debts paid preferably out of the proceeds. Mr. Erskine seems to think that the prohibition to alienate was introduced purposely into the latter part of the Act, that it might remain unaffected by the limitation which confines the privilege by diligence within three years, and serve as a general inhibition in favour of the ancestor's creditors, to which they should in all circumstances be entitled to trust. In that view, a disposition to a purchaser not being available against the creditors of the ancestor, they would be entitled to demand payment if the price were adequate, or, if not, reduction of the sale, as an inhibitor would, without being under the necessity of communicating the benefit to the creditors of the heir, who have no right to avail themselves of the statutory inhibition; but, on the other hand, if the price were adequate and still unpaid, the creditors of the heir might attach it, and so gain a preference, unless within the three years the ancestor's creditors should do diligence in terms of the Act.

4. A conveyance by the heir in favour of the creditors of the ancestor has been held not objectionable under the Act.² In so far as the heir thus interferes to aid all the creditors of the ancestor, no objection can be stated to his proceeding. But it seems very doubtful whether Erskine has not too indiscriminately extended the doctrine of the Court, as laid down by Harcarse, when he says that a conveyance to a creditor of the ancestor is unexceptionable.³ If such a conveyance to a single creditor were challenged by the body of creditors of the ancestor, the Act would unquestionably entitle the rest to challenge the deed; if, on the other hand, there were no other creditor of the ancestor to object, the conveyance would be effectual.

5. A conveyance by the heir to one of his own creditors is not challengeable by the rest of his creditors.⁴

6. A disposition to one of the heir's own creditors, executed beyond the year, is ineffectual to defeat the diligence of the ancestor's creditors within three years of the death of the ancestor. This is laid down by Harcarse as held by the Court soon after the date of the Act.⁵ It is an extension of the Act for which there is no warrant in the express words of the law; but it seems to be supported by its spirit and intendment, since the heir would otherwise have it in his power, by a private deed, to destroy that preference which the Legislature had been at so much pains to establish. The doctrine is accordingly approved by Erskine and all our other authors.⁶

See also the case of Taylor v L. Braco, supra, p. 771, note 3, as to which Lord Elchies (8vo ms. 26 Nov. 1747) says: 'The question was, Whether a disposition by an heir, or apparent heir, intra annum, is, upon 1661, c. 24, void in competition with a creditor of the defunct's, though he has not done diligence within the three years. The Lords unanimously found the disposition void and null, though no diligence was done within the three years, agreeable to a decision in Harcarse, subjoined to Decis. 144 (see above, p. 771, note 2). Dec. 9 adhered, and refused a reclaiming bill as to this point.'

SECTION VI.

GENERAL REVIEW OF THE OBJECTIONS THAT MAY BE TAKEN AGAINST ADJUDICATION FOR DEBT.

Objections may be stated to an adjudication, either by the debtor himself, for [737] the purpose of preventing the adjudication from being converted into an irredeemable right of property; or by creditors, the debtor being bankrupt. But in a competition of creditors, objections which have not a stronger effect than this are comparatively of little value, since the diligence will still be sufficient to maintain the adjudger in his place among the competitors.¹

The objections which are available to creditors are: 1. Those which destroy and annul the whole adjudication; or, 2. Those which restrict the extent of the claim that might otherwise be made under cover of the heritable security.

In distinguishing between these two classes of objections, it may not be incorrect perhaps to say, that wherever the defect is in mere form, and on a point not essential to the efficacy of the diligence, or where there is a trifling error or innocent omission respecting the amount of the debt, or an error in the calculation and accumulation of the sum, the objection has only a restrictive effect, converting the diligence into a security; while every objection to the debt upon which the diligence stands—every essential defect in the evidence of its existence—every exorbitant and wilful overcharge—every defect in the essential parts of the diligence, as in the citation, destroys the adjudication, and either entirely annuls it, or restricts the extent of the claim.

SUBSECTION I.—OF THE NATURE AND DESCRIPTION OF AN ARTICULATE ADJUDICATION.

Where more than one debt is included in an adjudication, care is taken to discriminate clearly between the several debts, so that instead of one complex diligence for a sum composed of the amount of the several debts, it shall present several separate adjudications and distinct decrees, each complete in itself, and capable of standing alone, whatever exceptions may be competent against the others which are combined with it. The articulate adjudication is thus strictly a congeries of single adjudications carried on as one action to avoid expense. The writers of systems, who study the greatest possible simplicity, in order to reach the principle upon which the institution they mean to illustrate proceeds, and who have their minds so frequently abstracted altogether from the difficulties and perplexities of practice, have considered adjudications in the simple shape of diligence for a single debt; while, in practice, the compound form of the diligence is well known and established. This omission has sometimes led to doubts whether there really be such a distinction in adjudications, but it is now fully established.²

1. The most distinct example of articulate adjudication is that in which several creditors conjoin their adjudications under the legislative provisions already explained.³ In such conjoined decrees of adjudication, the debtors are quite separate and independent; the disposition in security by an heir, within a year and day of the ancestor's death, in favour of one of his own creditors, was reducible under the Act 1661, c. 24, as being to the prejudice of the ancestor's creditors. A majority of the whole judges of the Court of Session were of opinion that a bond and disposition in security in favour of a creditor of the ancestor would be objectionable under the statute; but in the view taken of the case in the House of Lords, the question did not arise for decision.]

¹ This is well illustrated by the case of Sinclair & Doull v. E. of Caithness & Innes, 1781, M. 268, where an adjudication, reduced to a security on account of an objection, was found still the first effectual in a competition, regulating the preference of all the rest.

³ See above, p. 667.

[738] summonses are distinct; and the decree is made specifically applicable to so many different articles, as if each were entirely independent of the rest.

2. Another example of articulate adjudication, is that in which a person adjudges as trustee for several creditors, and perhaps also for himself, and distinctly details the respective debts in the summons, and has them separately accumulated in the decree.

3. Where the adjudication proceeds at the instance of a single individual, for several debts of his own, standing upon different grounds, and these are distinctly detailed and articulately decerned for, the parts of the adjudication are as capable of separation as where there are several creditors concerned.

In the doctrine relative to articulate adjudication these points seem to be fixed: 1. In order to make an effectual articulate adjudication in the person of one who is the creditor in all the debts, it is necessary that the debts should be accumulated separately; and, accordingly, the Court found an adjudication, including several debts not so accumulated, null as to the whole, in consequence of an objection applicable only to one of them; the creditor having illegally adjudged for a fifth part more of the sum contained in the bill by which that debt was constituted.¹ 2. A different rule prevails where the adjudger acts only as trustee for others; the adjudication is held as articulate for each debt so adjudged for.² 3. The conclusions of the libel regularly ought to bear the articulate nature of the decree which is intended to follow; and when the judge in such case 'decerns in terms of the libel,' the extractor has full authority to extract the decree of adjudication articulately. But it does not seem competent, under any other form of conclusion, to extract an articulate decree. 4. Sometimes the conclusion is alternative,—'as the said debts shall be jointly or separately accumulated.' Under such a summons, a decree of adjudication, either cumulative or articulate, is competent; but the judge must pronounce decree in an articulate form in order to give it effect as such. The extractor cannot make out the decree in an articulate form, where the interlocutor of the judge merely 'decerns in terms of the libel.'³

SUBSECTION II.—OBJECTIONS TO THE GROUNDS AND WARRANTS OF ADJUDICATION.

[739] Documents of debt, bonds, bills, contracts, assignations, and decrees of constitution, etc., are called GROUNDS of the decree of adjudication; general and special charges, and other preliminary steps of proceeding, are called WARRANTS of the decree. Objections to adjudications may be considered, 1. As affecting the constitution of the debt; or, 2. As affecting the preliminary steps and warrants of the adjudication.

² 'An adjudication, proceeding among other debts upon a bill which bore penalty and annualrent, was found null and void only quoad that bill, and sustained as to the other debts, in respect the endorsation to the adjudger bore that it was endorsed in trust for behoof of the endorser.' Kilk. p. 2.

³ Landales v Carmichael, 1794, M. 305. Here, in the summons of adjudication, the conclusions were alternative: the Lord Ordinary decerned in terms of the libel; and the extractor extracted the decree articulately. On this adjudication, which was duly completed, the creditor entered into possession of a considerable estate for a small debt; and in absence obtained, on expiration of the term, a decree of expiry of the legal. In a reduction by the heir of the reverser, the adjudication was objected to as null in consequence of a pluris

petitio in one of the claims; and the question was, Whether the decree was legitimate by an articulate decree of adjudication, or to be restricted to a security for the sums truly due on an accounting? The Court held 'that this is not an articulate adjudication, and proceeds on a pluris petitio, and can only be sustained as a security for the principal sums truly due, and interest thereon.'

L. Camelford's Trs. v Maxwell, 1789, M. 309. Here the several sums claimed arose out of one debt, and the conclusions of the sums were not articulately set forth. The Lord Ordinary 'adjudged, etc., in terms of the libel;' and the decree was, by the operation of the extractor, extracted articulately. In a competition the adjudication was objected to on account of a pluris petitio in one of the sums of interest; and the question was, Whether the objection should affect that sum only, or reduce the adjudication as an accumulating diligence, and restrict it to a mere security for principal and interest of the whole debt? The Court found the adjudication not articulate; and the objection was applied to the whole.

I.—GROUNDS OF THE DECREE OF ADJUDICATION.—CONSTITUTION OF THE DEBT.

Although adjudication be in form an action, it is strictly and properly a diligence. It is an action of execution merely, in which the Court cannot try the amount of the debt, or admit it to proof. The debt must previously have been constituted, and its exact amount fixed, either by a legal written document or voucher, or by the judgment of a competent court. And it must be precisely liquidated, not merely a rule or principle fixed by which it may be reckoned.

I. ADJUDICATION ON LIQUID DOCUMENT.—1. By a liquid document is to be understood a bond, or bill, or other obligation in writing.¹ It is not necessary that a bill should be protested or registered. The document is sufficient liquidation of the debt.² If it bear a clause of interest, or if interest be due ex lege, the adjudication may proceed for arrears of interest without constitution.³ Of course, every objection to the debt itself, want of authenticity of the voucher, want of a stamp, etc., are available against an adjudication. As to the stamp (required only for the purposes of revenue), the want of it may in most cases be supplied in the course of an action of constitution, though in the case of bills and policies of insurance (supra, pp. 337–8) the stamp cannot afterwards be affixed. It seems very doubtful on principle, whether, in answer to an objection to an adjudication extracted, it be competent to have the stamp supplied. But this has been decided in favour of the adjudger in a ranking, where an adjudication was held to be validated by the proper stamp being affixed.⁴

2. The debt adjudged for must be still a subsisting debt at the date of the adjudication. 1. If the debt was discharged or paid off at that time, the adjudication will be annulled, in whose hands soever it may now be. Nay, if the evidence produced be so imperfect as to lead to a presumption or suspicion that the debt may have been paid, the adjudication seems to be objectionable.⁵ 2. But it is no sufficient objection that the debt is compensated [740] by another debt due by the adjudger, for compensation takes not effect ipso jure; nor does it operate as an extinction of a claim unless when pleaded.⁶ It is sometimes difficult, however, to draw the line between a claim of compensation and the extinction of the debt.⁷ 3. If prescription have run against the debt before the adjudication, it will be a fatal objection to the adjudication. A bond, for example, against which the negative prescription of forty

¹ Porteous v Sir J. Naesmith, 1784, M. 132; affirmed on appeal, 4 April 1785. The obligation of a tenant to pay rent, as constituted in a contract of lease, was here held a good ground of adjudication for arrears, without any previous decree of constitution.

Here the distinction was taken between arrears under a lease and rents on tacit relocation, which, as not established by written voucher, were held to require constitution by decree.

² Ferguson v Robertson, 20 Feb. 1816, Fac. Coll. 99. [The rule does not, of course, extend to the case of a prescribed bill or note. Scott v Brown, 1828, 7 S. 192.]

³ This seems to have been taken for granted in Porteous' case. See above, note 1.

⁴ Lamont v Lamont's Crs., 1789, M. 5494. The Court, in a ranking, found the objection that the document of the debt on which adjudication had proceeded was not stamped, capable of being supplied at any time. A remit was made to the Lord Ordinary to sist proceedings till the deed was stamped; and on its having been stamped accordingly, the objection to the adjudication was repelled.

In an election case it was held that a title to vote, which at the time of enrolment was defective, sasine being taken on a disposition having a wrong stamp, was rendered unexceptionable by the subsequent affixing of the proper stamp. 16 Feb. 1819.

⁵ In Hay v Fleming, M. 280, Bell's Ca. 47, the judges seem to have held (when the point was accidentally started) that a decree of registration is not sufficient to support an adjudication, unless accompanied by production also of the bill; and upon this ground, that the evidence of the debt being still unpaid is not complete, the want of the bill tending much to weaken the legal presumption of its subsistence.

On the same principle seems to rest the decision in the case of M'Guffock v Edgar, 1762, M. 131, in which a bond, payable on requisition, was found no good ground of adjudication, as there was no evidence of requisition.

⁷ Crs. of Alison v Auchinlecks, 1759, M. 114. It is not marked distinctly in the report, that the rents which the creditors said ought to have been allowed were the rents of certain lands to the possession of which the adjudger had entered on a lease before the existence of the debt on which the adjudication was led. The adjudication was held to subsist only as a security for principal, annualrents, and necessary expenses accumulated at the date of the adjudication.

years has run without interruption, will not sustain an adjudication led after that term had expired; although no objection has been stated to the passing of the decree of adjudication. In the same way, if the ground of debt on which the adjudication has proceeded be a bill on which the sexennial prescription has run, a good objection will lie to an adjudication led upon it, for the law declares such bill 'to be of no force to produce any diligence or action;' and although it might have been competent to prove the debt by the oath or writ of the debtor in an action of constitution, it will not be a sufficient answer to an objection against an adjudication, that the debtor is now ready to acknowledge the debt. Nor will it even be sufficient that the debtor has appeared in the action of adjudication, and judicially admitted the debt; for this is an essential part of the constitution of the debt, which must precede the adjudication. And although there are some objections which may be cured at any time, no objection can be included under this description, which goes to the essential evidence of the debt.

3. An adjudication may proceed on an English penal bond, without any previous decree of constitution;¹ but a penalty cannot be adjudged for besides the principal and interest.²

4. An adjudication cannot proceed on a personal obligation by a wife; and although an heritable bond by a wife is a good security to affect her estate, an adjudication cannot be led on it: for that diligence, where it proceeds on an heritable bond, rests on the personal obligation, which is null when granted by a married woman.³

II. DECREE OF CONSTITUTION.—1. A decree of constitution is necessary as the ground of an adjudication in all cases where the debt is not liquid;⁴ where there is no written document of the debt; where it is ambiguous, or dependent on a condition; or where the [741] written document, though existing, does not appear; or where it has been lost.⁵ A decree of registration will be a sufficient constitution; but as it affords no evidence of the debt being still subsisting, unless accompanied by the bill or other document of debt, it may be necessary, in answer to any objection of this sort, to produce the document, or to raise an action of constitution.⁶ The summons of adjudication is not issued at the signet, without a warrant from the Lord Ordinary on the Bills; and this warrant is applied for by a short petition or bill, along with which must be produced the written voucher of the debt, or the extracted decree by which it is constituted. When the adjudication is called in Court, the grounds of debt must be produced along with it, to give an opportunity to the debtor of seeing and objecting to them; and where the decree has passed, and is produced in a ranking, those objections may still be stated as nullities, which formerly might have been pleaded in bar of the action.

2. The action of constitution must be regular and correct; and, 1. The Court must be

¹ Ranking of York Building Co.'s Crs., 1783, M. 228; and 1783, M. 229. The adjudication in these cases was held good, without any previous decree of constitution, for an accumulated sum not exceeding the penal sum in the bond, and for the interest of such accumulated sum.

² Forbes and Attorney v York Building Co., 1800, M. App. Adj. 23.

³ Robertson v Watson, 1772, M. 5976, 1 Hailes 508. Lord Pitfour says: 'The maxim of law is, that an adjudication proceeds on this, that the debtor had become bound to pay, and had neglected to fulfil his personal obligation. There was no personal obligation on the wife, and therefore an adjudication cannot proceed against her lands.' The Court held, 'that adjudication cannot proceed on the personal obligation of the wife.' [Thomson v Stewart, 1840, 2 D. 561. As to adjudication for attaching the jus mariti, see Menzies v Gillespie's Crs., 1761, M. 5974; Calder v Steele, 19 Nov. 1818, F. C.]

⁴ The Court has held a decree of constitution to be necessary, even in a ranking and sale. Scott Moncreiff v Innes, 1821, 1 S. 73, N. E. 74. This will deserve notice afterwards, in speaking of ranking and sale. It will also require very grave consideration should the question occur again.

⁵ Hay's Crs. v Fleming, 1794, Bell's Ca. 49, M. 280. Here a bill had been sent abroad to procure payment, and there was produced to ground the adjudication only a copy of the bill, with a protest on it taken in London, but without any decree of constitution. Decree was obtained in a conjoined adjudication, reserving objections contra executionem. The bill was afterwards produced in the ranking. The Court sustained an objection to the claim. It was said on the bench that an adjudication 'can proceed only on a decree of constitution or a liquid document. The copy and protest show that the bill once existed, but not that it is resting-owing.' [See also Barclay v Alexander, 1846, 8 D. 549; Wilkie v Flowerdew, 1850, 12 D. 1818.]

competent by which the decree is pronounced.¹ And although an action may be unexceptionable if the jurisdiction be prorogated, this must be done by one entitled so to act.² 2. Where no citation was given to the tutors and curators of a minor, the decree of constitution was held inept, and the adjudication set aside entirely.³

3. Where the creditor is uncertain of the amount of his claim (e.g. where it depends upon a settlement of accounts not yet balanced), it will not validate his adjudication that he has raised an action of constitution, and obtained decree for a random sum, reserving all objections; or at least he must, in competition, support the adjudication to the full extent of the sum adjudged for. In such a case there seem to be two remedies. One is to adjudge articulately for such sum as certainly is due, with a random conclusion for the uncertain sum; which will be available, if it can be justified to the full amount. Another is to adjudge in security, and to obtain decree, reserving objections contra executionem.⁴

4. Where the debt, though proved by written voucher or decree, is future or contingent, or where the sum is not ascertained, the proper proceeding is to adjudge in security, the legal of which adjudication never expires.⁵ An apprising in such a case would unquestionably have been illegal under the old law;⁶ and the lawfulness of adjudications in security was once doubted on this analogy of apprizings. But, 1st, An adjudication by a cautioner, in security of his relief, was found to have the same effect with an infeftment in relief;⁷ 2^d, An adjudication on a bond, payable on the granter's death, was also [742] held competent;⁸ and, 3^d, An adjudication in security, 'for a daughter's bond of provision, was found entitled to proceed and compete with the other creditors, though the term of payment was not till her age of eighteen years,' and posterior to the competition.⁹ The Court generally sustains an adjudication of this kind as a security, where there is no objection of pluris petitio, giving it the same force as if originally it had been restricted to that species of diligence.¹⁰

5. Where the debt is due, but is not at the time of adjudging vested in the adjudger, a distinction appears to be made between the case of a person succeeding to the debt, and whose titles are not completed till after the adjudication, and that of one who acquires right to the debt by assignation. In the latter of these cases the completion of the right is not held to validate the preceding diligence.¹¹ Nay, it has been held not enough that the adjudger was at the time in treaty for the debt.¹² But in the former case, where the right of the adjudger comes to him by succession, a more indulgent rule is followed.¹³

6. Where the creditor, though his debt be constituted by written voucher, has not that voucher at hand to produce as the ground of his adjudication, and has, in order to supply the defect, raised an action for constituting his debt, decree will be allowed to pass, reserving all objections to the debt when produced in the ranking. The production of the evidence in the ranking will, in consequence of this reservation, be admitted; but the adjudication will stand only if the precise amount of the debt has been decerned and adjudged for.¹⁴

7. Where the decree of constitution has been passed, reserving objections, the adjudger must, in supplying the defects in competition, support his action of constitution as libelled.¹

8. If the person adjudging be not himself the original creditor, he must connect himself by a proper title. 1. If the creditor be dead, the adjudger must be duly confirmed executor.² Partial confirmation is not enough, although it may be sufficient to make it safe for the debtor to pay the debt. 2. It is a good objection to an adjudication, that the adjudger has right only by a testament; and that the subject or claim is not testable. But [743] to such an objection it is a sufficient answer, that the conveying words are strong enough to assign.³

II.—WARRANTS OF DECREE OF ADJUDICATION.—PRELIMINARY PROCEEDINGS.

Many objections are incident to the various steps preliminary to adjudication.⁴

1. The special charge affords the only means by which, where the debtor succeeds to property without having made up titles, the adjudger connects his debtor with the land to be adjudged. It must therefore charge the debtor to enter to the person last infeft, and in that particular character in which the person charged is entitled to enter; otherwise it will not avail the creditor. Thus, a charge to enter heir to a grandfather, when the fee was truly vested in the father by the last infeftment, is null.⁵ While the creditor is not perfectly acquainted with the state of the titles, the charge ought to be kept general in its terms, to avoid objections on account of a mistake in the character of heir.

2. Where the debtor is a minor, it is a good objection that his tutors and curators were not charged on the special charge.⁶

3. It is also a good objection, that the special charge was blank in the name of the lands.⁷

4. If no special charge has been given, it cannot afterwards be supplied.⁸

5. The immediate warrant of an adjudication is a bill presented to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, and which lies deposited in the signet office. Errors or defects in this warrant will be fatal to the adjudication; as misnomers of the debtor, errors or defects in narrating the debt, etc.⁹

Between GROUNDS and WARRANTS there is this distinction, that it is not necessary to produce the WARRANTS of an adjudication after the expiration of twenty years from the date of the decree of adjudication: ¹⁰ the GROUNDS of the adjudication, that is to say, the decree

Mr. Tait adds: 'Adhered to, 24th July 1771, in respect that general and special charges are not parts of the pursuer's of constitution, or bill, bond, or other document of debt, must be produced if called for any time within the years of the long prescription.

SUBSECTION III.—OBJECTIONS TO THE ADJUDICATION.

I. LIBEL OF ADJUDICATION.—1. The libel must bear the alternative of a general [744] and special adjudication,¹ unless it be an adjudication in security. An overcharge or pluris petitio in the libel furnishes no good ground of objection, provided the error has been corrected in the course of the proceedings, and the sum is correctly stated in the decree.²

2. Compensation or retention will avail the debtor against adjudication, where instantly verified, and will entitle the debtor to oppose even the motion for intimation in a first adjudication.³ But if no objection is stated in the course of the proceedings, the objection will avail, not by injuring the adjudication as incorrectly led, but by restraining its operation.

3. Where the creditor has adjudged for payment, in a case where he ought to have adjudged only in security, his adjudication will not be available. Thus, if the debt be illiquid, or future, or contingent, he cannot adjudge for payment.⁴

4. If, however, the constitution have been laid for a sum, for which, though it cannot be instantly proved, the creditor takes decree, reserving all objection contra executionem, the adjudication will be good, provided in the ranking the debt can be supported to that extent.⁵

5. No lands can be adjudged which are not the property of the debtor; but his property may stand in so peculiar a situation as to suggest difficulties respecting the form of adjudging. Where, for example, the debtor has conveyed his property in trust for certain uses and purposes, it may be doubted whether the adjudication should proceed against the debtor, against the trustee, or against both. In one case upon the election statutes, the opinion of the Court seemed to be, that the truster was utterly divested of his estate.⁶ But this error was corrected in another election case.⁷ And in a ranking it was decided, that the radical right of a trust estate is in the truster, and may be affected by adjudication against him or against his heir, as if the trust never had been granted.⁸

title, but produced as evidence of the passive title against the defender; and also in respect of the former decisions of the Court, and acquiescence of the nation therein.' 5 Br. Sup. 465.

'Strichan reported a question of adjudication, whether it was a good answer to the offer of a progress, that there were inhibitions against the debtor, though those inhibitions were after the pursuer's debt. The President, Royston, and Arniston, thought that the estate must be unencumbered; and that the creditor is not obliged to dispute the validity of that encumbrance, or his preference to it, because the inhibition is not in the field; and upon the question it carried to sustain the objection to the progress: sed multi in contraria fuerunt opinione; inter quos ego. 10 Nov. 1737.'

² 'If, when the decree comes to be pronounced,' says Lord Kilkerran, 'the error of pluris petitio be rectified, and decree only sought and obtained for the sums truly due, the error in the libel will be no nullity.' Maxwell and Riddell v Maxwell, 1743, M. 110.

⁸ Ranking of Edderline, Campbell's Trs. v his Crs., 1801, M. App. Adjud. No. 13. Campbell of Edderline became insolvent, and conveyed his estate to trustees absolutely, for behoof of his creditors, with power to them to sell, etc., 1. For payment of debt; 2. For provision to younger children; and, 3. For entailing the remainder. The trustees were infert, and in possession; Edderline died; an action of sale was brought; most of the creditors adjudging in the common way, by charge against the heir. One creditor, conceiving Edderline to have been divested by the trust-deed, constituted his debt against the trustee, and thereon adjudged. He adjudged also, by way of precaution, against the heir of Edderline and the trustees jointly, but beyond the year and day. Lord Eskgrove, Ordinary, decided 'that Edderline was not completely divested of the real right and property of his estate by the trust-right and infertment thereon, the same having been a trust for the granter's behoof, though it contained a power to the trustees of selling the lands for the purpose of paying off the granter's debts; but which power the trustees never exercised, and still stood bound, in the event of a sale, to re-convey or settle the remainder for behoof of the granter and his heirs; which did not disable his lawful creditors, not acceding to the trust-deed, from doing diligence against himself while he lived, or against his apparent heir after his

[745] II. DECERNITURE.—If the accumulated sum include more than is justly due, the diligence is objectionable on the ground of a pluris petitio. But the decisions of the Court have not been uniform respecting the effect to be given to a pluris petitio. Lord Kilkerran, in reporting the case of the Creditors of Easterfearn, gives a history of the opinions of the Court on this subject, gradually relaxing from the rigid notions applicable to apprizings, and admitting adjudications containing pluris petitio as securities, unless where the pluris petitio was gross and fraudulent.¹ The Court went afterwards even further than this, and found an adjudication containing a pluris petitio 'plainly mala fide,' good as a security.² The doctrine seems at last to have settled at this point, that in cases of material pluris petitio, or culpable neglect, the adjudication is annulled;³ but where it is slighter, the only effect is to reduce the adjudication to a security for principal and interest, without expenses or penalties.⁴

The pluris petitio is judged of by the accumulated sum as it appears in the decree of adjudication. Though this part of the decree, however, seems thus to be rendered so [746] important, yet (inconsistent as it may appear) it seems not to be held essential to the subsistence of the adjudication that the sum should be filled up in the decree.⁵

Material omissions in the extract will annul the adjudication; as, where several steps of death, for payment or security of their debts; and therefore repelled the objection to the adjudication led by the other creditors against the son and apparent heir of their debtor, after his decease: Found, that neither the decree of constitution obtained in absence, at the objector's instance, against the said trustees, nor the adjudication following thereon, can afford ground for preferring the objectors to the creditors who had before obtained adjudication against the heir of their debtor on special charges; the objector's adjudication against the trustees being an inhabile diligence, the trustee not being the real proprietor of the lands adjudged, nor the proper debtors in the debt adjudged for.' To this judgment the Court unanimously adhered, without an answer to the petition; holding it to be fixed that, notwithstanding a trust-deed, the radical right remains with the truster, and may be adjudged from him or his heirs by creditors; and that the law of M'Adam's case is quite exploded.

¹ Ross, and other Crs. of Easterfearn v Balnagown, 1747, M. 112.

Lord Elchies has the following note of this decision: 'The Lords, nemine contradicente, adhered to Drum's interlocutor, sustaining an adjudication as a security for the sums truly due, even in a ranking of creditors, though led for near eight times as much as was due, viz. £9540, though there was a fitted account before, making the sum due only £1284. My reasons were, that reducing it in toto was penal and contrary to equity; that a decree of constitution would be so restricted and sustained; and I saw no difference now betwixt a decree of constitution and adjudication; that when no more was apprizd than lands equal to the sum, and that by a sworn inquest, a pluris petitio behoved to be a total nullity, because not only the sum must be restricted, but some of the lands struck off, which could only be done by a new inquest; that, by regulation 1695, decrees were only to be reduced on nullities to restore against the injury done, and no further; and that this adjudication was a decree in foro contentioso, where every objection was either competent and omitted, or postponed and repelled, and we could repon against it only in equity; and that equity could not annul it altogether. Ar-niston added, that special adjudications must as to this point be in the same case with apprizings of old; and that he always was against annulling such applications altogether, and against sustaining them for accumulations.'

² After this, says Lord Kames, 'there can scarce be any prospect of cutting down an adjudication in toto for a pluris petitio.' Rem. Dec. 271. A similar decision was pronounced in the Competition of Dunjop's Crs., 1759, M. 114. But see Ranking of Cairnton, 1760, M. 116; and Rutherford v Bell, 1769, M. 117, Hailes 287.

⁵ The only case in which this question seems ever to have occurred, is the Ranking of the Crs. of Alison of Dunjop, where the judgment pronounced by the Court was, that 'the accumulate sum not being filled up, is no nullity in the adjudication.' 13 Jan. 1759, 2 Fac. Coll. 285, M. 114.

Though the judgment is there stated only in the way of narrative, it is quite correct. In a preceding part of the same volume of the Faculty Collection, this case is very incorrectly reported (as of date 18 Nov. 1757), for it is there made to appear that the Court restricted the adjudication on account of this objection. In the papers, I find that the Lord Ordinary (Woodhall) had found the objection 'relevant to restrict the decree to a security for principal, interest, and expenses of deducing the adjudication.' But when the question came into the Court, they pronounced this judgment: 'The Lords found that the accumulated sum not being filled up is no nullity in the adjudication, and that the adjudication can only subsist as a security for the principal sum, annualrents, and necessary expenses accumulate at the date of the same, and the interest thereafter, in respect that no allowance is given for the rents possessed before the date of the adjudication, and in respect it is proved,' etc.

It is to be observed that the error of the first report has been transcribed into the Dictionary, and the second report is represented as another judgment to the same effect.

procedure were omitted, and the decree was made as in absence, though there had been a debate, the Court held it to be a nullity.¹

III. ABBREVIATE AND RECORDING.—1. The recording of the abbreviate of adjudication is prescribed by the regulations 1695, art. 24, and additional regulations 1696, art. 3, in substitution of the recording of allowances of comprizings ordered by the statute 1661, c. 31. It must be recorded within sixty days after the decree has been pronounced. Where this has been omitted, the Court have granted warrant for recording after the sixty days.²

2. The effect of omitting to record was, by 1664, c. 31, declared to be the postponement of the apprizing to any other apprizing duly recorded. But such omission does not affect the pari passu preference.³

3. Where all the adjudications in competition are recorded in due time after their date, the preference (unless where the rule of pari passu preference applies) is according to the priority of registration.

4. Where sasine is taken and duly recorded, the omission to record the adjudication is of no consequence in a question with creditors posterior to the sasine.⁴

SUBSECTION IV.—EFFECT OF DILIGENCE BY THE CROWN.

In the adoption of the English revenue laws at the Union, an express exception was introduced respecting the operation of the Crown's diligence, so far as concerned the [747] real estate. As to such estates, the law of Scotland is left on its original footing.⁵

1. The term 'real estate' is English, not Scottish. The Scottish term which is the most nearly analogous to it, is 'heritable.' The real estate includes not only lands, but all tenements and hereditaments, and everything which is not strictly moveable or personal, as following the person wherever he goes.⁶ Even the statute of Queen Anne itself speaks of 'honours, manors, lands, tenements, or hereditaments,' as to be regulated and tried, in respect to the Crown's right, by the Court of Session and the law and practice of Scotland. There is therefore no doubt that the Crown's preference is restrained from operating not only against lands, but against all the proper heritable estate, rents, annuities, and so forth, which by the law of Scotland are adjudgeable. There are no cases

¹ Crs. of Fallahill, 1736, competing, M. 12185, Elch. Adj. No. 7. In this case the Court by consent admitted the adjudication to rank, but without consent it would have been held null. Lord Elchies reports it thus: 'Adjudication, if at all sustained, ought to be ranked according to known rules of preference of adjudgers; and therefore, a nullity being objected against an adjudication, and sustained by the Ordinary ad effectum to restrict the adjudication (which had the first infetment, and was year and day before all the rest), and the creditors' preference thereon, to a pari passu preference with the other adjudgers. The Lords adhered; but added the reason, viz. because the creditors did not insist to annul the adjudication, but only to be preferred pari passu with it.' Voce Adjudication.

In the 8vo MS. this note is entered: 'The Lords adhered, but added the reason, etc.; otherwise I and many others thought it would have been very dangerous to make it an arbitrary question whether adjudgers should be preferred pari passu or not? and that, if it had not been the creditors' omission, the adjudication must either have been found totally void and null, or otherwise it must have been allowed the preference the Act of Parliament gives it.' Notes, p. 2.

corded in twenty-one days. See the Bankruptcy Act, sec. 79.]

⁴ See saving clause of 1661, c. 31; Ersk. ii. 12. 26.

⁵ 'And Her Majesty shall be preferred in all suits in the said Court, according to the said statute, and the practice of the Court of Exchequer in England; and as well the bodies, as the lands and tenements, debts, credits, and specialties, goods, and personal estates of all debtors or accountants to the Crown or their debtors in Scotland, shall be liable by extent, inquisition, and seizures, or by any other process, to the payment of such debts to the Crown, in the same manner as hath been used in the Court of Exchequer in England; provided that no debt to the Crown in Scotland shall affect any real estate in Scotland, further or otherwise than such real estate may be subject thereto by the laws of Scotland; and that the laws of Scotland shall in all such cases hold place.' 6 Anne, c. 26, secs. 7 and 8. And in a subsequent section it is provided, that 'the validity and preference of the title of the Crown to any honours, manors, lands, or hereditaments, or to casualties belonging to the Crown, shall continue to be tried in the Court of Session by the law and practice of Scotland, and not otherwise.' 6 Anne, c. 25, sec. 22.

⁶ See 2 Blackst. Comm. 16 et seq. and 384 et seq.

settling this point, the only one in which the exception came to be questioned being relative to lands.¹

2. The peculiar conception of one part of the statute left it doubtful whether the exception was not meant only to exclude the operation of the English forms, as not being equivalent to our sasine, etc. in heritable property, with the reservation to the Crown of a preference, where the Crown should be as far advanced as the subject in the legal diligence of the Scottish law. In deciding this question, however, the provision already alluded to, that the validity of the Crown's preference should be tried by the Court of Session, according to the laws of Scotland, and no otherwise, was held conclusive.² And therefore it is now settled, 1. That the Crown can attain no preference over the heritable estate by any sort of diligence, more than a subject; 2. That the Crown will be excluded from ranking on the heritable estate altogether, unless the Scottish diligence for attaching that estate be used; and, 3. That the Crown will come in pari passu with other adjudgers, without any preference.

SECTION VII.

OF ADJUDICATION IN IMPLEMENT.

[748] While apprising was the diligence by which land was attached for debt, there were two cases in which that method of proceeding was not deemed competent, and for which the Court of Session introduced a new form of judgment, interposing as a court of equity their authority to provide a remedy which the ordinary course of law did not supply. One of these cases was the renunciation of the heir after the ancestor's death, for which the remedy has already been described. The other was the case of an imperfect conveyance, or an obligation ad factum præstandum, for which the form of adjudication in implement was invented.³ The principle upon which this last was introduced, is well explained by Lord Stair. He says (iv. 51. 9): 'It is an adjudication for perfecting dispositions of rights of the ground which require infeftment, whether in fee or liferent, and whether in property or annualrent, where the disponent is either expressly or impliedly bound to infeft the acquirer, and oftentimes to infeft himself for that effect, yet hath not performed the same. Justice requiring some legal remedy to make such dispositions and obligations effectual, which would have been very tedious and expensive, if the acquirer had no other remedy but first to use personal diligence against him to liquidate the damage, and then to apprise thereupon (whereby the acquirer having a real right, if not complete, might easily be prevented by any creditor who had only a personal right); therefore the Lords, etc. did sustain process at the acquirer's instance against the disponent to fulfil, and against his superior to supply his place, and remove the acquirer in the same way as he might have done upon his vassal's charter of confirmation or procuratory of resignation.'

¹ See the case quoted in the next note; but the report is vague in respect to the point now in question, speaking only of an adjudication of the real estate.

² Crs. of Burnet v Murray, 1754, M. 7873. The receiver-general of the customs adjudged for the king the land estate of Burnet, on account of duties on tobacco. The other creditors followed with adjudications within year and day of the king, and claimed pari passu preference, as if the king's adjudication had been for a common debt. The Court found: 'That before the Union, the king, by the laws of Scotland, was entitled to no preference for revenue debts upon the real land estates of his subjects, but only according to his diligence, and that by the Act 6 Anne the laws of Scotland are saved and declared to hold place and be observed; and therefore that His Majesty is preferable only pari passu with the adjudgers within year and day of his adjudication.'

See Lord Elchies' note of this case, Notes, p. 16, and also p. 400.

³ Adjudication hath place in two cases: The first 'and most ordinary is, where the heir renounces to be heir, in which case adjudication is competent whether the debt to be satisfied be liquidate or not. The other is where the obligation to be satisfied consisteth in facto, and relateth to a disposition of particular things, which disposition or obligation not being fulfilled by the debtor or disponent, though all ordinary diligence be done, then adjudication taketh place to make the same effectual.' Stair iii. 2. 45. See also Ersk. ii. 12. 47.

Adjudication in implement differs from an adjudication for debt, 1. In being directed against a particular subject, in order to have an imperfect conveyance of it completed; 2. In having no alternative conclusion or reversion, unless such be the nature of the obligation to be implemented; and, 3. In being in its nature exclusive of other creditors, admitting of no pari passu preference.¹ And yet there may occur a competition of imperfect rights, of which it is not possible to dispose justly otherwise than by dividing the subject between the competitors.

Adjudication in implement may be defined a form of legal diligence, by which the want of a complete voluntary title to land or other heritage is judicially supplied to those who hold a disposition or other conveyance, without a precept or procuratory, or who hold an obligation entitling them to demand a full conveyance of any particular subject.² It is merely the completion of the form of a transference already constituted in part, and which the proprietor had bound himself to complete. And, like a voluntary transference [749] when followed by sasine, it bestows a real and preferable right from the date of the sasine.³

1. Adjudication in implement is led against the granter of the imperfect title himself, if alive, in the same manner as a common adjudication for debt.⁴ The summons recites the disposition or contract, or obligation to transfer, of which implement is demanded; and concludes for decree of the Court, adjudging the lands, etc. to the pursuer in implement. The decree adjudges the lands from the debtor, and declares, decerns, and ordains the same to belong to the pursuer; and decerns and ordains the superior to enter him accordingly.⁵

2. If the adjudication is to be led against the heir, the previous forms of a general charge,⁶ action of constitution, and either special charge or decree contra hæreditatem jacentem, must be observed, according as the heir shall renounce or be silent. The adjudication requires no intimation.

3. This adjudication is to be completed by an abbreviate recorded, and a charter from the superior followed by sasine. It was once doubted whether the superior was obliged to enter such an adjudger, but these doubts are now at an end. The effect of a charge to the superior, in a common adjudication for debt, depends entirely upon the force of the statute, and it has no effect as a preference except against co-adjudgers. It seems, therefore, extremely doubtful whether any effect should be given to a mere charge upon an adjudication in implement. It has indeed been found, that where no step was taken to complete the first adjudication in implement, a second, with a charge against the superior, was entitled to a preference;⁷ but this has always been held a doubtful judgment, and is not to be taken implicitly, as settling that a charge gives security to such an adjudger. It seems indisputable that, in competitions with voluntary securities, such a charge could be no bar to sasine, and would not entitle the adjudger to a preference. Neither could such a charge stand against an adjudication for debt, completed by infestment subsequently to its date. Neither does there seem to be any ground for holding that the second adjudger in implement, with the first infestment, would not be preferable to the first, who had only charged the superior.

² Mr. Erskine seems to confine this remedy to the case of one holding a disposition. But he means to speak only of the prominent case, not restrictively. One who has bought a house by missive of sale, is entitled to a decree of adjudication in implement, as well as if the disposition had been granted. Ersk. ii. 12. 50; Dallas 231.

³ Sir George M'Kenzie, Observ. 1 Parl. Chas. II. c. 62. Lady Fraser, 1677, M. 233.

⁴ It is not now necessary (as once it seems to have been) that adjudication in implement should be preceded by personal diligence to enforce performance. Ersk. ii. 12. 50. See Stair iv. 5. 9.

⁶ No annus deliberandi seems in these adjudications to be necessary. Ersk. ii. 12. 50.

⁷ Sinclair v Sinclair, 1704, M. 56.

In its nature, this sort of adjudication is not subject to pari passu preference. That belongs properly to adjudications for debt, each forming only a burden, of which many may subsist together without incongruity. But adjudication in implement being equivalent to a conveyance of the property itself, without reversion or alternative, is inconsistent with any similar right in another. At the same time, it must be remembered that, among the many dishonest methods of raising money, it is not unfrequent to procure money on the faith of sales to be afterwards completed. It may thus happen that two innocent persons may be deceived into a situation where equal hardship may be pleaded by both: both may be ready to adjudge in implement; the adjudications of both may stand in the roll together. Shall it then be held that the Lord Ordinary must adjudge to each, leaving them to run against each other in the race to obtain sasine, and making the preference depend on the many accidents by which they may be retarded or advanced? This, plainly, is a case which should be ruled by the principles of bankrupt law.¹

[750] 1. It seems to be consistent with that equity which first introduced the remedy of adjudication in implement, that two or more persons having equal pretensions to demand a complete transference, should be conjoined in one complex adjudication, and the subject either sold or divided for their benefit. Truly they are nothing more than creditors; for while no real right or jus in re has been constituted, the jus ad rem that each enjoys, resolving into a mere action, makes them proper personal creditors.

2. As there is in bankruptcy no true distinction among creditors who hitherto hold nothing but a mere personal obligation, whether that obligation be to pay money, or to convey land, or to perform any other specific act,—a creditor for a money debt being just as well entitled to have direct execution against the debtor's land, as one who holds an obligation from the debtor to convey his land to him; so a creditor obtaining an adjudication in implement will not have preference over a creditor for debt, who with a decree of adjudication in payment has previously completed his security by sasine. Neither ought the adjudger in implement to prevail over the other money creditors who come within year and day of a prior adjudication for debt, completed by infeftment, though subsequently to his adjudication in implement and sasine. The subject is already attached preferably for the benefit of all who come within the year, and the adjudger in implement may still adjudge as a common creditor for damages.

SECTION VIII.

OF THE JUDICIAL BURDEN BY JUDGE AND WARRANT.

It is doubtful whether an adjudger or creditor in possession of subjects, and repairing them without judicial authority, has, in accounting with other creditors adjudging, a claim for the expense so laid out. But whatever might be the determination in such a question, the judicial process of JUDGE and WARRANT creates a real burden on a burgage tenement, which will be effectual against creditors and purchasers.

This process begins by an application to the dean of guild, at the instance of any one having interest, in order to have the tenement examined and repaired. The dean of guild, after a citation of all parties interested, summons a jury to examine the subject; and their verdict on the necessity of the operation of rebuilding or repairing, authorizes the dean of guild to grant a warrant for having it done.

1. Where the subject is possessed by a creditor-adjudger or otherwise, and the person having right to the reversion or property either cannot be found, or takes no charge of the property, the possessor is safe to make the repairs required, the dean of guild 'pronouncing a decree,' cognoscing and declaring the amount of repairs, and costs of the proceedings, with interest, to 'be a real and preferable debt affecting the said tenement,' and granting a warrant to the applicant 'to set or possess the tenement until the sums expended, with interest, be repaid.' The extract of the decree is the ground and voucher of the debt and of the preference; and the recording of it in the dean of guild's books is held legal notice of the burden.

2. Where the tenement is ruinous, and has on that account been uninhabited for three years, a judicial procedure is authorized by statute,¹ in which the magistrates or dean of guild summon all concerned to repair or rebuild the house; and failing their doing so, the house or area may be valued by sworn valuers and sold. If the persons having right [751] to the subjects are known, the price is paid to them; if not, it is deposited or consigned with the magistrates, for the benefit of all having interest; and the purchaser gets a title from the magistrates, which is declared to be a perfect security to him and his successors. If no one buy the area or ruined tenement, the magistrates may order it to be rebuilt, and then sold; the price being disposed of as before, and the title declared perfectly secure to the purchaser.

Besides the proper diligence by which lands may be attached for debt, there is another judicial proceeding which may be productive of important consequences in competitions; I mean a DECREE OF DECLARATOR and ADJUDICATION.

DECLARATOR is one of those remedies unknown in England, in which the good sense and adaptation of the Scottish law to the occasions and business of life is distinguishable. Without intending to show the various uses to which this form of proceeding may be applied, it is obvious that on many occasions it is necessary, for the purposes of justice, that a form of action should be provided, by which the true interest of a party in heritable property may be ascertained, so as to prevent the creditors of one who has the apparent property from carrying it off. Thus, where a person has granted a security over his estate, by means of an absolute disposition, trusting to the honour of the donee; or where a company has purchased property which, in compliance with feudal rules, is disposed to one of the partners, or a third person, for behoof of the partnership, but without including the declaration of trust in the disposition; the creditors of the apparent proprietor, if there were no remedy, might by adjudication, judicial sale, or sequestration, carry off this as a fund of division among them, leaving the party to whom truly the right belongs as a mere creditor personally for the value. The remedy in such a case is by an action wherein a solemn judicial declaration can be made of the pursuer's right.

This action is brought into the Court of Session by a summons, stating the circumstances, and concluding that it should be found and declared that the property truly belongs to the pursuer. This is a REAL action, in which the object is not to have a decree against the defender as for a debt, but a judgment against the land or other property. And after the commencement of it, no voluntary act of the apparent proprietor is suffered to interfere with or defeat the right to be declared. This action may also admit a conclusion of adjudication for having the land declared and adjudged to belong to the pursuer, and the superior decerned and ordained to receive the pursuer as vassal, and grant to him a charter on which he may be infeft.

The effect of such a decree, followed by infeftment in the lands, will be to vest in the pursuer a right which, like that of an adjudication in implement, will not be subject to the pari passu preference.

There are certain other securities over the feudal estate which are referable to another principle,—not real rights, but personal prohibitions or embargoes on the power of alienation. These shall be considered hereafter, under the title of Securities by Exclusion.

CONCLUSION.

OF ACCESSORIES TO LAND, AND OTHER HERITABLE SECURITIES.

[752] In concluding concerning Securities on the Feudal Estate, it seems not unfit to consider the accessory effect of such securities on those parts of the subject which are in their own nature moveable. This is a question which has frequently occurred of late, in consequence of heritable bonds and other securities granted by the proprietors of cotton-mills and other valuable machinery. In such cases the general creditors contend, that while the land may be effectually burdened, although the possession of the owner be continued, provided sasine on the security have passed and been recorded, the moveable parts of the machinery (which are rather the dead stock in trade than by annexation a part of the heritage) ought to accompany the apparent ownership inferred from possession. The holder of the security, on the other hand, maintains that by accession the whole of a machine or mill, of which part is attached to the soil, must be held as a fixture comprehended within the security.

If the intention of parties were sufficient to determine the point, this would not probably be a frequent question; but it is necessary, in order to complete the security, that there should be an effectual tradition; and unless comprehended within the infestment, as a part of the subject, things which are moveable cannot be conveyed in security; for there is no effectual transfer of moveables retenta possessione. The machinery of every mill—whether a common corn-mill, a thrashing-machine, a cotton-mill, or even a steam-engine—may, without hazard of injury to the building or to the machinery, be removed. That of a cotton-mill may, without the least detriment: it is, indeed, intentionally made removeable; so that the great moving power, whether a water-wheel or a steam-engine, is all that remains fixed to its place.

Where a man dies and leaves an heir and an executor, the former takes the land and heritable property; the latter gets the moveables. If a contest arise between them, Whether by annexation to land, or by accession as part of an heritable subject, the heir is to have right to that which, taken apart, is properly moveable? it may not unreasonably be held that the whole machinery ought to go together, a point of succession being chiefly a quæstio voluntatis. In cases also of temporary occupation, as where a lessee or liferenter has for his own conveniency made additions to the subject of his temporary possession, and the question is raised between tenant and landlord, or between the fiar and the executors of the liferenter, on expiration of the term of possession, Whether the additions are to remain permanently annexed to the land, or to be subject to removal? the same criterion may seem fair and reasonable. But there is considerable difficulty in admitting the same rule to govern cases in which the contest is between the general creditors of a trader, possessed apparently of a valuable stock of machinery, as at once the instrument of his trade, and in part at least the foundation of his credit, and a particular lender of money, who takes his security over the ground or house in which the trader has fixed his establishment.

1. There is one point in which the several cases seem to coincide, and where the same determination must be given in all. If an addition has been made to land or houses, which cannot be dissevered without destruction or injury to the principal or to the accessory, things so added, though in themselves moveable, become, as fixtures, part of the land. As such they descend to the heir; or, on the expiration of a temporary contract of possession, they accompany the land: and they will also, as part of the subject of security, be available to the holder of an heritable bond.¹

2. Houses, walls, etc., or what is so affixed to them for permanent use, that it cannot, without injury or destruction to the edifice or to the addition, be removed, accompany the property of the land, according to the rule, Inædificatum solo cedit solo.²

3. But it is not mere physical annexation which alone deserves to be considered in such questions. That sort of annexation which depends on the principle of accession, is frequently as strong a bond of connection as the mortar or iron by which a fixture is attached. Thus, the water-wheel and stationary parts of a mill are useless without the moveable machinery by which the working power produces its effect in manufacture. This sort of accession seems, as already observed, to afford a rational ground for carrying the whole parts of an engine, by implied will, to the heir who takes the land whereon it is erected. And accordingly this seems to have been settled as law in questions of succession.³

4. But lastly comes the great consideration, whether the above, which may be considered as the general rule, ought not to suffer exceptions from the various employments of stock in trade and manufactures. Engines and machinery have come in the mercantile world to be regarded in many cases rather as accessories to the trade in which they are used, than as accessories to the land; and in questions at least of temporary occupation, as between landlord and tenant, this consideration seems sufficient to control the ordinary rules of mere physical annexation, so as to entitle the tenant on expiration of his term to remove them, or his creditors on his bankruptcy to make them a subject of distribution. The machinery of a steam-engine or cotton-mill is undoubtedly moveable before it is put up. It cannot be used for the purposes of manufacture without being fixed in its place; probably built into the wall, or sunk in the ground, or connected by buildings of various forms with the ground on which it stands. But the engine is generally the principal subject; the ground whereon it stands of comparatively little worth. The engine is not erected for the purpose of enjoying the produce of the land; but the ground is taken merely to be a station for the engine, as employed in a separate manufactory. It in no shape can be supposed to have been intended to pass with the land, but to accompany the manufactory, if there should be occasion for removal to another station.

Cases of this sort have not occurred frequently in Scotland, which may proceed from the attention naturally bestowed, in the arranging of contracts of temporary occupation, to have this matter well settled by agreement. In England there have been several cases on the question, as untouched by special contract. The separation of machinery from the freehold, when first contended for in England, seems to have been held extremely questionable; afterwards it was admitted that a dyer making vats for the purposes of his occupation during the time of his possession might remove them. The same was held as to a baker. After some intermediate doubts, Lord Holt laid it down that a soap-boiler might remove the vats he had set up during the term for the purposes of carrying on his trade.⁴ [754] Here it was held that the machinery was, in all questions between landlord and tenant, to be considered as real or personal, as it happened to be an accessory to the trade,¹ or to the possession and use of a particular subject.²

³ Dirleton and Stewart have carried this so far as even to make the horse and other instrumenta mobilia of a horse-mill descend to the heir. Voce Mill. So the buckets, chains, and instruments of a coal-work go to the heir. Dirleton and Stewart, voce Executry. A similar view seems to have been taken in England. Lawton v Salmon, 1 Hy. Blackstone 259, notes.

These are distinctions which equity and public expediency, as well as mercantile understanding, ought perhaps to recommend to adoption, even in the case of succession ab intestato; and they do not seem to be inconsistent with the common law of Scotland, in regulating the interests of the parties to a contract of temporary possession.

There is another point of view in which the question is of great importance. By the Scottish law, the Crown's process of extent gives no preference over heritable property. How, then, is a sheriff to conduct himself in executing a writ of extent over the property of a great manufacturer? Or how is the line to be drawn by the Court of Exchequer between the Crown and the general creditors?

Lastly, in determining on the extent and effect of a security specially constituted over heritable subjects, on which an engine or machinery has been erected, it will deserve very grave consideration, whether the rule by which the entire machine is held, by accession, to accompany the land or fixed part of the establishment, should not yield to that now so generally prevailing in the mercantile world, by which machinery is held to accompany the trade as an accessory. If this were to be considered as the rule, a cotton-machine or steam-engine may not be more capable of becoming the subject of a separate security for debt retenta possessione, than any other part of the stock in trade; and an infetment in the ground whereon the buildings stand would have no effect in securing the creditor over the machinery of a cotton-mill or steam-engine. This question does not seem to be at all settled in England. I am not, indeed, aware of any cases on this point; but in a case which occurred in Scotland, the opinions of two eminent English counsel were taken, and they were directly opposite to each other.³

¹ In Lawton v Lawton, 3 Atkins 13, a fire-engine to work a colliery was held by Lord Hardwicke to be an accessory to the trade of getting and vending coals, which was a matter of a personal nature. In another case determined by Lord Hardwicke, L. Dudley v L. Ward, Ambler 113, a fire-engine to work a colliery was held an accessory of the trade.

So Lord Chief Baron Comyns considered a cider-mill as accessory to the making of cider. Cited 3 Atk. 13, 16.

² In the case of Lawton v Salmon in 1792, 1 Hy. Blackstone 259, Lord Mansfield held salt-pans to be accessory to the salt spring, 'as the inheritance could not be enjoyed without them;' and therefore, in a case of succession, 'on the reason of the thing, and the intention of the testators, he held that they must go to the heir.' But he explained at large the distinction taken in questions between landlord and tenant as being a case in which, for the benefit of trade, there has been a relaxation of the strict rule, by which whatever is connected with the freehold goes to the heir. He admitted that, in this very case of salt-pans, the question would have been very different if the springs had been let, and the tenant had been at the expense of erecting these salt-works.

In Elwes v Maw, the Court of King's Bench (the judgment being delivered by Lord Ellenborough) held certain houses erected by a tenant for the more convenient possession of an agricultural farm as accessory to the reality, being for the mere purpose of better reaping the profits of the land, and as such not to be removeable at the end of the lease. 3 East 38.

³ In a case submitted to Mr. Moncreiff, Dean of Faculty, as arbiter, an inquiry into the English law was directed by him, and cases were laid before Sir Samuel Romilly and the present Master of the Rolls, Mr. Leach. The case put to Sir Samuel Romilly was this:—'1st, Whether, by the law of England, a mortgage regularly executed over a piece of ground, upon which is erected a cotton-mill or factory, with a steam-engine and spinning machinery, would be effectual to the mortgagee, to the exclusion of the assignees of the grantor of the mortgage, in the event of his becoming bankrupt; or to what extent such mortgage could be set aside?

'2d, In the case of the proprietor of a cotton-mill or factory, with a steam-engine and machinery attached, devising his whole real estate generally to one person, and his personal estate to another, Under which of these descriptions of property could the steam-engine and machinery be considered as included?' The answer of that eminent lawyer was:—

'1st, That, by the law of England, a mortgage of a piece of ground on which a cotton-mill or factory was erected, and of a steam-engine and machinery upon it, would be valid as against the assignees as a mortgage not only of the land, but of the steam-engine, and of all the machinery which was affixed to the freehold; but it would not be valid with respect to utensils and machinery not affixed to the freehold, but used in the manufactory.

'2d, That this is a question of considerable difficulty; but the validity of the mortgage cannot in any degree, by the law of England, depend upon the answer to be given to it. Whether the steam-engine and machinery affixed to the freehold would, as between heir and executor, or devisee and residuary legatee, be considered as real or personal estate, it is perfectly clear that a mortgage of them would be good, as against the general creditors of a bankrupt.'

The case put to Mr. Leach was in these terms:—'A granted an heritable security or mortgage to B on a subject belonging to him, consisting of the buildings occupied as a cotton-mill, with the steam-engine thereto belonging, and the cotton

In one case, the Court of Session in some measure proceeded on the principle of [755] accession of the machinery to the land, as a part of an engine of which the great moving power was a fixture. The security of an heritable bond was there held to cover not merely the ground and house, and great moving power, or steam-engine, but also the whole of the smaller machinery essential to the completeness of the mill.¹ But this ground of the decision did not satisfy the bar at the time; and it has been in some measure disclaimed by the judges in a subsequent case, so as to leave the question entirely open.²

machinery. Infeftment in the heritable subjects followed on the mortgage. A continued in possession of the whole premises. Having become bankrupt, a question has arisen between B and the trustee for A's creditors, upon which your opinion is requested, viz.—

‘Whether in these circumstances the security extends over the steam-engine and machinery?’ The answer was this:— ‘I am of opinion that the security will not extend to the steam-engine and machinery; but I speak altogether upon the principle of the law of England.’

OF REAL SECURITIES OVER PROPERTY SIMPLY HERITABLE.

THIS subject divides, of course, like that of real securities over the feudal estate, into two heads,—Voluntary Securities, and Legal Diligence.

SECTION I.

VOLUNTARY SECURITIES.

The completion of voluntary conveyances and securities, where the subject is simply heritable, not feudal, is either by actual possession or by intimation, unless where the right conveyed is a portion or mere accessory of a feudal subject transferred by sasine as an accompanying right.

1. LEASES OF LANDS OR OF HOUSES are completed by possession.¹ They may be transferred by assignation (where there is no excluding clause), completed in like manner by possession.² Where lands are under sublease, so that the right to be transferred truly is

² It has been laid down by Erskine (ii. 6. 27), that possession is not good to complete a lease of an urban tenement as a real right effectual against singular successors. But the question was tried lately, and the lease sustained. Waddell v Brown, 1794, M. 10309. In this case, a lease having been constituted by missive for seventeen years of a dwelling-house and shop in Glasgow, of which the tenant took possession, the Court held that the missive of lease, being clothed with possession, was effectual against a purchaser.

[756] that of levying the surplus rents, intimation to the subtenant seems the legitimate completion.¹ Whether intimation to the landlord is, in the ordinary case of a lease assigned, an effectual transfer of the tenant's right, is a question already discussed.²

2. A right to STANDING TIMBER, by a conveyance in satisfaction or security of debt, requires actual possession by the creditor or his workmen in cutting down the timber; or at least constructive delivery, by marking out the trees as sold. Whether this be sufficient as actual delivery to bar the privilege of stopping the purchaser's operations on his insolvency, is another question. But a creditor who receives in satisfaction or security right to his debtor's woods, is to be considered as having paid the price; so that if his right is not challengeable on the Bankrupt Acts, constructive delivery will be enough.

3. A right to a QUARRY, COAL WORK, or other MINE, when not transferred by sasine as a feudal subject, must be completed by possession, in order to constitute a preference in favour of the purchaser or creditor. Such right is in the nature of a lease, and can be effectually constituted only on the principles of that contract.³

4. A LIFERENT RIGHT in lands is constituted by sasine, but it cannot be so transmitted; for the liferenter cannot infeft another. 'There can' (as Lord Stair says) 'be no subaltern or renewed infeftment of a liferent, which is only personal to the liferenter; the right is incommunicable.'⁴ The use or right to the rents is transmitted or assigned in security by assignation, followed by actual possession;⁵ or by intimation to the tenants; or by legal process against them in the character of assignee.⁶

The benefit of the legal liferents of terce or courtesy may be assigned, and the right of the assignee will be completed by possession, or by intimation to the tenants.

The right of an heir of entail under strict prohibitions is similar in effect to a liferent; but it is in its nature a fee under restraint. The conveyance of the right, therefore, is not like that of liferent by assignation and possession, but by disposition and sasine.⁷

5. Under the statute for redeeming the land-tax,⁸ provision is made for the sale of entire farms of entailed estates in Scotland, when they exceed in value the sum required to be raised, under the condition, 1. That the surplus shall be bestowed in the purchase of land to be entailed on the same heirs, and under the same limitations; and, 2. That in the meanwhile the surplus shall be lodged in one of the public banks for reinvestment, either permanently on the purchase of lands to be entailed, or in the meanwhile on good security upon interest, 'such clauses to be inserted in the bond, or other security to be taken for the money, as shall be effectual to secure the person who would for the time being have been entitled to the rents and profits of the said lands, etc., in case such sale, etc. had not been made; and to the succeeding heirs, etc., the enjoyment of the interest of the said money; and to preserve the capital until the money shall be employed as aforesaid.' [757] The right which is in such cases vested in the heir of entail for the time, is an heritable estate in the nature of an annuity. It is assignable, and the conveyance seems to be by assignation intimated to the trustees, where such money is taken payable to them; or to the proprietors and tenants of the land, if ever in such a case the interest be taken directly payable to the heir in possession. Whether such a right may be effectually assigned by a deed executed abroad, and according to the forms of the country where it is made, is a question on which doubts have been entertained, but which will form a subject of inquiry more properly in the last book of these Commentaries.

⁵ 'Though liferents be more properly real rights, because constitute by infeftment, yet, seeing a liferenter cannot infeft another as a fiar can, assignation or disposition is sufficient; but it must be clad with possession.' Stair iii. 2. 6. See also Ersk. ii. 9. 41.

⁸ 42 Geo. III. c. 116, secs. 63, 65, 101.

6. By the entail improving Act of 10 Geo. III. c. 51, sec. 9 et seq., provision is made for assigning to executors or others a claim by the heir of entail in possession, who shall make improvements, for a proportion of the expense defrayed. This claim is in the nature of a personal debt against the succeeding heir, but accompanied by a declaration that the claimant shall have a preference for the rents of the entailed estate over all the other creditors of the heir of entail. This right is completed by the forms laid down in the Act of Parliament.

7. SERVITUDES, when of a positive nature, require possession to complete them; but negative servitudes are effectual without possession or registration.¹

8. A RIGHT OF REVERSION, or a DEBT HERITABLE, either by destination or by the use of diligence, etc., may be transferred, and the conveyance completed by intimation; and this is indeed necessary to the completion.

9. RENTS payable by tenants or by subtenants are frequently assigned in security, either by a simple assignation, or by disposition or heritable bond, containing assignation to rents. 1. Where the assignation is by personal deed, possession must be taken either by intimation or by decree of mails and duties; which proceeds on an action against the tenant, founding on the assignation, and concluding for decree adjudging the rents to be paid to the assignee. Erskine denies that such assignations have effect against singular successors,² and his doctrine seems to be law. 2. Where the conveyance is by disposition or heritable bond, the sasine is a sufficient completion of the creditor's right to the rents,³ upon this principle, that the rents are an accessory of the real right to the lands. The same principle leads to this consequence, that personal assignations of rents, although effectual while the feudal right continues in the cedent, or common debtor, lose their force when the real right is transferred to another. The purchaser of lands, therefore, or an heritable creditor, completing a real right to the lands, carries the rents in competition with assignations, however completed.⁴ The only security over rent, effectual against sasine in the lands, is one which [758] is not confined to the rents themselves, but takes them as an accessory to the feudal right.

SECTION II.

JUDICIAL SECURITIES.

Rights which are heritable, but not feudal, may be attached judicially by decree of adjudication duly recorded, without any further completion. Adjudication in implement is also a competent form of diligence, where subjects of this description have been imperfectly conveyed; or where an obligation to convey has been granted, which has not yet been ful-

² Ersk. iii. 5. 5. The decisions by which assignation to subleases has been sustained, on intimation to subtenants, touch not Erskine's doctrine.

³ Lady Kelhead v Wallace, 1748, M. 2785. In a competition between a widow holding an infeftment in security of an annualrent or annuity of 2000 merks and an arrestor of the rents, the latter contended that possession, or a decree of pointing the ground, was necessary to complete the right to the rents; but the Court preferred the annuitant.

Webster v Donaldson, 1780, M. 2902. Here, in competition between an arrestor of rents and a creditor by heritable bond, on which infeftment followed, but neither possession of rents, nor even intimation to the tenants, the Court considered the infeftment on the heritable bond as equal to an intimation of the assignation to the mails and duties; and that the heritable creditor was preferable to the arrestor, not only for the annualrents, but for his principal sum also.'

⁴ Ersk. iii. 5. 5. Huntly v Hume, 1628, M. 2764. The above was found against an assignee to rents in competition with an appriزر infest, although the former had, in consequence of his assignation to the rents, been some years in possession.

Morrison v Tenants of Orchardson, 1635, M. 2815. It was found also against creditors named expressly in the lease, as the persons to whom the rent was to be paid.

Mactavish v MacLachlin, 1748, M. 15248. Where the tack contains a power of retention in payment of debt due by the landlord, it is held ineffectual against singular successors.

Lady Borthwick v Tenants of Catkine, 1632, M. 2815. A factory granted to a creditor to uplift rents for his payment is not effectual against singular successors.

filled. The difference of the remedies lies in the former being subject to pari passu preference, while the latter confers at once a preference on the creditor entitled to it.

In general, it may be observed, relative to adjudications of the estate simply heritable:

1. That a decree of adjudication, of which the abbreviate has been duly recorded within the sixty days, as prescribed by the statute,¹ is effectual and preferable upon the estate simply heritable.² 2. That by the rule of pari passu preference (as applicable to these adjudications, as well as to the adjudications of feudal subjects), all adjudgers share in the preference of the first effectual adjudication, whose decrees of adjudication are prior, or posterior, and within year and day of the decree; and that under this rule the Crown comes without any preference.³ Although the intention of the Legislature in passing the statute of 1661 was to prevent, by a general law, any individual creditor from acquiring, by the mere accident of better information, or by collusion, an unfair preference over his fellow-creditors; so unhappily is the statute expressed, that serious doubts were entertained whether it did not apply exclusively to apprizings of complete feudal rights, leaving those estates which were not feudally vested to the unequal rule of the old common law. But it has long been settled, that the rule applies to all cases of appricing and adjudication for debt.⁴ 3. That the rules for abridging proceedings—the intimation of the first adjudication, the power of demanding a conjunction, etc.—are applicable to these adjudications, as well as to those against the feudal property. 4. That the creditors of the ancestor are entitled to preference over those of the heir, if they have used the proper diligence within the three years.

In adjudging particular subjects, it is to be considered whether the adjudication proceeds on an imperfect conveyance, or obligation to convey a subject; or on a debt; and whether, in consequence of the death of the debtor, or of his successors, the proceedings are to be regulated by the statutes relative to the charges to enter, and by the law introducing a preference to creditors of the ancestor. In the former case, adjudication in implement is as competent as in the case of feudal subjects. In the latter, the following observations, applicable to different subjects, may be attended to:—

[759] 1. That to subjects in their nature heritable, but not feudal, as well as to feudal subjects of which the right to be carried is merely personal, the completion of the heir's title is by general service, and the charge to be given a general special charge.⁵ 2. That leases and other rights which run out by the course of time, vest in the heir ipso jure, and so may be directly adjudged without a charge.⁶ 3. That in rights which, though moveable as to succession, are adjudgeable, as BANK STOCK,⁷ it would seem that the adjudication must be preceded by a charge, in terms of the Act 1695, c. 41, to confirm executors within twenty days;⁸ and that the certification of the Act 1540, c. 106, would take place on such a charge. 4. That in rights having a tract of future time, as ANNUITIES, a general special charge is to be given, and general service carries the right. 5. In the adjudication of LIFERENTS, it is to be remembered that it is not the liferent itself which is to be attached, but the beneficial use or possession merely; and that therefore no sasine or charge is necessary or competent, the diligence being completed by the recorded decree of adjudication.⁹ 6. In the attachment of RENTS and INTERESTS, a competition frequently arises between creditors by heritable bond or disposition, adjudgers with sasine or a charge, simple adjudgers, and arrestors. The rules for determining those cases seem to be: First, That where the feudal property has been adjudged, and the adjudication completed into a real right, it carries, as accessories, the rents of the subjects either in arrear or in future ; or the interests of heritable bonds from the date of the infeftment or charge ; although they should have been assigned, and the assignee's right completed by intimation and possession ; or although they should have been arrested currente termino, and before the adjudication.¹ Secondly, That a decree of adjudication, even without a sasine or charge, carries, as a judicial or legal disposition, a right to the rents falling due after the date of the decree ; and, as a legal conveyance, it requires no intimation to complete the right. The rents are thus carried to the adjudger, preferably to posterior arrestees or assignees.² Thirdly, That, in the common case, adjudication carries no arrears of rent due prior to its date ; but an adjudication for the debt of the ancestor, contra hæreditatem jacentem, carries all rents from the ancestor's death, as being the only diligence that can be used by the ancestor's creditors. And this rule, which had long been fixed, was in 1740 found applicable also to the case of an adjudication on a special charge ;³ and in 1760 it was extended to the case of arrears of interest on an heritable bond, posterior to the death of the person last infeft.⁴ But, Fourthly, If a competition arise between the creditors of the ancestor adjudging the hæreditas jacens, and those of the apparent heir attaching the arrears of rent as part of their debtor's moveable estate, it would seem that the creditors of the heir would be preferable on their arrestments, on the principles adopted in the decision of the cases of Lord Banff, and Hamilton against Hamilton.⁵
